

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. AMENDMENT TO RULES

CIRCUIT COURT OF SOUTH CAROLINA

Amended at Convention of Judges, December 19, 1906

RULE XI.¹

The first paragraph is stricken out and the following inserted in lieu thereof:

"Counsel shall not attempt to argue or explain a case, or any matter arising therein, after he has been heard and the opinion of the court has been pronounced: Provided, no argument shall be had on any objection to the admissibility of evidence unless especially requested by the presiding judge; nor shall one attorney interrupt another in the course of his argument, without first obtaining the permission of the court."

RULE XXI.

Amended to read as follows:

"On the trial of issues of fact, one counsel only, on each side, shall examine or cross-examine a witness, and not more than one counsel, on each side, shall sum up or be heard in any cause; and during such examination the examining counsel shall stand; and the testimony, if taken down in writing, shall be written by some other person than the examining counsel; and upon the trial of all causes, at law and in equity, and upon the hearing of all motions, arguments shall be limited to one hour for each side. Time for argument may be extended beyond one hour, but only on motion, and before any argument commences."

A new rule was adopted, to be known as:

RULE LXXVII.

The point that there is no evidence to support an alleged cause of action shall be first made, either by a motion for nonsuit or a motion to direct the verdict; and the point that there is no evidence to support a defense shall be first made by motion to direct a verdict.

THE SOUTHEASTERN REPORTER

(127 Ga. 285)

BLACKBURN v. LEE et al.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 15, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. TRIAL (§ 142*)—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where the question was whether a married woman conveyed land to her son so as to furnish him a basis of credit or to enable him by a conveyance of the land to secure the payment of his debts, or whether the transaction was merely colorable and a scheme, in which the creditors participated, to make her in fact, though not in name, a surety for the debt of her husband, it was error to direct a verdict, where it could not be properly declared that, under the evidence introduced, and all reasonable deductions or inferences therefrom, a particular verdict was demanded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 337; Dec. Dig. § 142.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 657*)—RECORD—CORRECTION.

Where no motion for a new trial was made, but a brief of the evidence was approved and made a part of the record, as provided by Civil Code 1910, § 6141, and the bill of exceptions specified it as a part of the record to be sent to this court, and where the original brief of evidence was attached to the bill of exceptions and transmitted therewith, this court, upon having the fact brought to its attention, will order its clerk to send the original record to the clerk of the superior court and direct the latter to certify and transmit a transcript as required by law, and, upon receipt of it in due time, will decline to dismiss the writ of error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2830-2833; Dec. Dig. § 657.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 588*)—RECORD—BRIEF OF EVIDENCE.

The brief of evidence was somewhat subject to criticism as to the manner in which it was prepared, but it did not constitute so gross a disregard of the statute as to authorize this court to refuse to consider it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 588.*]

Error from Superior Court, Ware County; T. A. Parker, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth Blackburn against Lee He Lee and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

A. E. Cochran and Z. D. Harrison, for plaintiff in error. Wilson-Bennett & Lambdin, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, J. A married woman owned a lot of land. By deed dated September 30, 1904, she conveyed it to her son, reciting a consideration of a thousand dollars. On February 13, 1905, the grantee in this deed and his father, the husband of the grantor, executed a deed to a corporation, to secure certain promissory notes signed by the makers. This deed included certain turpentine leases, mules, horses, naval stores, etc., and also the land covered by the former deed. The land was described as the individual property of the son. This deed contained a power of sale upon default, and also authorized the grantee in it to purchase at any such sale. After default, the power was exercised, the land sold, and the creditor became the purchaser. Subsequently the woman who had conveyed to her son brought suit to recover the land. She alleged that the conveyance by her to her son and the making of the security deed constituted a mere scheme to avoid the statute, which prevented her from becoming surety, and that the agent of the defendant knew this and agreed that the defendant would make advances in connection therewith. On the trial the presiding judge directed a verdict for the defendants, and the plaintiff excepted.

[1] 1. Under our statute, a wife cannot bind her separate estate by any contract of suretyship, nor by any assumption of the debts of her husband, and any sale of her separate estate, made to a creditor of her husband in extinguishment of his debts, is void. Civil Code 1910, § 3007. A married woman may give land to her son. She may convey it to him in order that he may have a basis of credit, or for the purpose of enabling him, by a conveyance of the land, to secure the payment of his debts. If she does so, and does not herself become liable for the payment of the debt, she is bound by her deed, and must abide the loss of the land arising from her maternal generosity. But if the deed is not what it purports to be, but is a mere colorable transaction and part of a scheme, in which the creditor participates, to make her in fact a surety for the debt of her son or husband, though not nominally bound for its payment, the transaction is contrary to law and void. National Bank of Athens v. Carlton, 96 Ga. 469, 23 S. E. 388.

A judge cannot properly direct a verdict because he may think that the strength or weight of the evidence is on one side, or because he might grant a new trial if a verdict should be returned against what he thinks is the preponderance of the evidence. Under the Code, this can be done only where there is no conflict in the material evidence, and where that introduced with all reasonable deductions or inferences therefrom demands a particular verdict. Civil Code (1910), § 5926.

Applying the principles above enunciated to the evidence in this case, the court erred in directing a verdict. The evidence was somewhat confused as to the existence of a former firm or corporation and the relation of it to the defendant company, and whether the agent who negotiated with the father and son represented the former or latter company when the negotiations began; but the same person represented the defendant company when the security deed was made, and it was made to the defendant, not to the other company. The evidence of the witnesses for the plaintiff was by no means clear on other points. Nevertheless there was enough to prevent the direction of a verdict. The plaintiff testified: "In signing the deed, my misunderstanding was that he [her son] mortgaged the property to West-Flynn-Harris Company [the defendant company] as security for my husband for some money that the West-Flynn-Harris Company had loaned him. That was the understanding." Referring to a preliminary conversation with the agent, the son testified: "He wanted to know what we could put up as security, and what I proposed to invest in the business; and I told him and my father told him. I just simply stated to him how it stood. I told him that it was my mother's property, and that she was willing to put it up to secure my father's interest." Again: "Yes, I told him I was putting in cash, and that my mother was putting in the home place to secure my father's interest." Still further, he stated that he first saw the deed to him when he and his father met the agent again; that his father then handed him the deed, saying, "Your mother has made the deed to you"; that the witness looked at it and passed it to the agent; that the latter took it and went out, and after about 30 minutes returned and said, "We will take you up." The husband testified similarly, and also stated that the preliminary interview was with "the representative of the West-Flynn-Harris Company."

It is unnecessary to go further into the evidence. We are not deciding how the jury should find, or what the judge should do on a motion for new trial. We merely hold that the case was not one for the direction of a verdict.

The defendant demurred to a certain paragraph of the petition. The presiding judge announced that he would sustain the demurrer unless the plaintiff would strike the paragraph. The plaintiff amended by striking the objectionable paragraph and making other allegations in lieu of it. She then excepted to the judge's announcement. There was no judgment striking the paragraph. The plaintiff herself struck it, and there was nothing to which exception could be taken.

[2] 2. A motion to dismiss the writ of error was made. The plaintiff had a brief of evidence approved by the court and ordered filed as a part of the record. This may be done, instead of incorporating the evidence in the bill of exceptions, although no motion for a new trial is made. Civil Code 1910, § 6141. In specifying the parts of the record which should be sent up to this court, the bill of exceptions named "the brief of evidence, incorporated herein and made a part of this bill of exceptions, and order of approval of same by the court, and the entry of filing." Attached to the bill of exceptions by a paper fastener, after the certificate of the judge, the acknowledgment of service by counsel, and the certificate of the clerk, appeared what was evidently the original brief of evidence, with the approval and order for filing, signed by the judge, and the entry of filing by the clerk. It was not made an exhibit or identified as such. This court ordered such original paper to be returned by the clerk to the clerk of the superior court, with direction to certify and send up a transcript of such record. This has been done. Civil Code 1910, §§ 6149, 6181. The motion to dismiss the writ of error because the evidence was not properly brought to this court is overruled.

[3] 3. It was also urged that there was no sufficient effort to comply with the law as to making a condensed and proper brief of the evidence, and that what purported to be a brief of the evidence ought not to be considered. The paper is not a model of brevity or lucidity. But we cannot say that it presented so gross a disregard of the statute as to be treated as no brief. This court has said that it looks to substantial, rather than to technically or literally exact, compliance with the law on that subject. Crumbley v. Brook, 135 Ga. 723, 70 S. E. 655.

MEADOR, Ordinary, et al. v. CENTRAL GEORGIA POWER CO.

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. NUISANCE (§ 83)—PUBLIC NUISANCE—ABATEMENT—JURISDICTION.

Where a dam was erected across a stream in a certain county for the purpose of generating electric power and producing lights, and water was backed up in the stream and its tributaries, so as to extend into another county, the ordinary of the latter had no jurisdiction to proceed summarily, under Civil Code 1910, § 5333, for the purpose of abating the alleged public nuisance so caused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Nuisance, Dec. Dig. § 83.*]

2. PROHIBITION (§ 10*)—WHEN GRANTED—EXCEEDING JURISDICTION.

Where such ordinary, upon affidavit of certain freeholders, was taking steps to cause a jury to be summoned and to try the question of the existence of the alleged public nuisance, there was no error in the granting by the superior court of a writ of prohibition to prevent him from proceeding further.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Prohibition, Cent. Dig. §§ 37-56; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

Error from Superior Court, Newton County; L. S. Roan, Judge.

Prohibition, on the relation of the Central Georgia Power Company, against A. D. Meador, Ordinary. Writ of prohibition granted, and defendant and certain residents of Newton county bring error. Affirmed.

Rogers & Knox, for plaintiffs in error. Walter T. Johnson and Greene F. Johnson, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. The Central Georgia Power Company built a dam across the Ocmulgee river in Jasper and Butts counties, for the purpose of generating electricity by water, to be used in lighting towns and cities, and supplying light, heat, and power to railroads and the public generally. Certain residents of Newton county instituted proceedings before the ordinary of that county, under Civil Code 1910, § 5333, providing for abating a public nuisance in certain cases, alleging that the dam caused water to back up in the Ocmulgee river and its tributaries in Newton county, and created a public nuisance. The ordinary was proceeding to summon a jury and have a trial of the question, when the superior court of the circuit granted a writ of prohibition, and he and the movants before him excepted.

[1] 1. The section of the Code under which action was sought to be taken declares that, "if the nuisance complained of is a grist or saw mill, or other water machinery of valuable consideration, the same shall not be destroyed or abated, except," etc. Evidently this contemplated abating or destroying the dam or machinery itself, in a proper case, as the cause of the injury, not merely seeking to attempt to abate the backwater resulting from a dam in another county. Section 5340, touching the fees of the sheriff for summoning a jury and for removing "any nuisance, machinery, or milldam," sustains this view. The proceeding to abate a public nuisance in the manner provided is a summary remedy, and the law must be strictly construed. The ordinary of Newton county had no jurisdiction over abating or destroying as a nuisance a dam or machinery in another county, if it should be held to be a nuisance. Authorities cited as to the venue of an indictment for creating a nuisance by polluting a stream, or as to actions by individuals damaged by the casting of foul matter upon their property, are not applicable to the summary abatement of a public nuisance under the statute.

[2] 2. It follows, from what has been held above, that the writ of prohibition furnished a proper remedy to stay further action by the ordinary of Newton county. South Carolina R. Co. v. Ellis, 40 Ga. 87; Doughty Pearson & Co. v. Walker, 54 Ga. 595; Flite v. Black, 85 Ga. 413, 11 S. E. 782; Strong v. La Grange Mills, 112 Ga. 117, 37 S. E. 117; Ormond v. Ball, 120 Ga. 916 (12), 48 S. E. 383; McGriff v. State, 135 Ga. 259, 69 S. E. 115. In Turner v. Mayor, etc., of Forsyth, 78 Ga. 683, 3 S. E. 649, the attack was rather upon the validity of a municipal ordinance of a penal character than upon the jurisdiction of the court to pass upon it.

Other questions have been argued, such as whether the dam and machinery of the plaintiff in error fell within the description of the statute sought to be enforced, and whether, under the legislative authority to erect such structures for furnishing light and power to the public, it could be declared that they were nuisances per se, if properly constructed and operated, whatever might be the rights of persons suffering consequential damages therefrom. But, as we have held that the ordinary of Newton county had no jurisdiction to deal with the matter at all, we deem it unnecessary to discuss what should be the ruling of a court of competent jurisdiction.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

(a) Where the boundaries of lands devised by

Error from Superior Court, Baldwin County; Jas. B. Park, Judge.

Action by Mrs. L. A. Little and another against Mrs. I. R. Napier. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

This was a suit for land brought in the statutory form in Baldwin superior court by Mrs. Laura A. Little and Miss Mary Lizzie Williams against Mrs. Isabella R. Napier for the recovery of a certain tract of land, together with mesne profits, in Baldwin county, containing 275 acres, more or less, and described in the petition as follows: "Bounded by lands of the said Mrs. I. R. Napier, known as the 'picket field,' by lands of James Dismukes, by lands belonging to the estate of Mrs. L. V. Farrar, and by lands of Samuel Evans estate. Said tract of land is a part of what constituted the John Williams estate, and is known as the 'chicken house field.'" The plaintiffs were granddaughters of John Williams, Sr., and claimed title to the above-described land under the sixth item of the will of their said grandfather, which was as follows (omitting the personal property devised): "Also the lands adjoining the lands willed to G. T. Dismukes and Mrs. Napier, and the lands of J. H. Lawrence to the public road from Eatonton to Clinton, and the lands given to their mother, Mrs. Martha M. Williams, of the above lands given to said children which contains five hundred (500) acres more or less—I allow my grandson, John S. Williams and his wife, Essie Williams, to use the Clayton field and 'Sprout Spring Field' said to contain 225 acres for a support during the life of my wife, Frances Amanda Williams, at her death then to go into the possession of the said grandchildren, Laura Amanda and Mary Lizzie Williams, I give said lands as willed with all the rights, members and privileges in any wise appertaining or belonging forever." The defendant in her answer contended that she was not in possession of any lands belonging to the plaintiffs in the case, that the description of the lands sued for, as contained in the petition, did not in any wise fit the description of the real estate she is in possession of, and that belonged to her father's estate, and she was unable to decide whether the plaintiffs intended to allege that the land she is in possession of is that sought to be described by them, but admits she is in possession of a tract of land that belonged to her deceased father, and which was by him devised to her. She claimed title to this land under the fifth item of the will of her father, John Williams, Sr., and averred that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover said land, or the mesne profits thereof. The fifth item of said will reads as follows: "I give, bequeath and devise to my daughter, Mrs. Isabella Rountree Napier, all the lands situated and lying in Baldwin county, Ga., adjoining the lands of Dr. Snead, the lands willed to G. T. Dismukes, and the lands of J. H. Lawrence, up the branch to where one hundred acres was surveyed off, said to contain (350) Three Hundred and Fifty acres more or less, with (160) acres one hundred and sixty acres of land also lying in Gilmer county, Ga. She is to have said lands with all the rights, members and privileges to said lands in any wise appertaining or belonging forever." Before the trial the defendant amended her plea, and alleged that in a bill filed in Jones superior court at the October term, 1900, in the case of L. H. Andrews, Administrator of the Estate of John Williams, Sr., v. John S. Williams et al., which was a bill for direction, etc., the terms and provisions of the will of John Williams, Sr., were fully adjudicated by the court, and that all the parties thereto were estopped by the decree rendered in said case, and that, under said decree, the defendant was entitled to all the land in Baldwin county devised to her under the will of said John Williams, deceased, etc. The decree referred to in the defendant's answer is as follows, so far as relates to Mrs. I. R. Napier, Mrs. Laura Amanda Williams, and Miss Mary Lizzie Williams, to wit: "(2)

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

That Mrs. Isabella R. Napier takes under the will, and that the lands described in item 5 of said will do vest in her, the said I. R. Napier, subject only to the debts of the estate, in the event all the other property of said estate shall be insufficient to pay said debts. * * * (5) That Mr. M. M. Williams, Laura Amanda Williams, and Mary Lizzie Williams and the other legatees and devisees take under the will, and that the title to the property, real and personal, to them bequeathed and devised vest in them subject to the debts of the estate." The defendant also set up a prescriptive title to the above lands, contending that under the above decree (subdivision 2) she went into possession of said lands in dispute, and has since been in the open, notorious, adverse, exclusive, and uninterrupted possession of said land for over seven years. Upon the evidence submitted and the charge of the court the jury found the premises in dispute for the plaintiffs, with mesne profits, and judgment was entered accordingly. The defendant made a motion for a new trial on the various grounds therein stated, which motion was overruled by the court, and she accepted.

Allen & Pottle, for plaintiff in error. Johnson & Johnson, E. T. Dumas, and Hines & Vinson, for defendants in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The decision of this case rests largely upon the proper construction of the testator's will. The plaintiffs and the defendant both claim title to the land sued for under a common source—the will of John Williams, Sr. Mrs. Napier, his daughter, claims under item 5 of said will, and Mrs. Little and Miss Williams, his granddaughters, under item 6. As item 4 has some bearing upon the case, we give here each of these items:

"4th Item. I give, bequeath and devise to my step-son, G. T. Dismukes, (125) One Hundred and Twenty-five acres of land situated and lying in Baldwin County adjoining Dr. Snead and Mrs. Farrar with all the rights, members and privileges to said land in any wise appertaining or belonging forever.

"5th Item. I give, bequeath and devise to my daughter, Mrs. Isabella Rountree Napier, all the lands situated and lying in Baldwin County, Ga., adjoining the lands of Dr. Snead, the lands willed to G. T. Dismukes, and the lands of J. H. Lawrence, up the branch to where one hundred acres was surveyed off, said to contain (350) Three Hundred and Fifty acres more or less, with (160) acres one hundred and sixty acres of land also lying in Gilmer County, Ga. She is to have said lands with all the rights, members and privileges to said lands in any wise appertaining or belonging forever.

"6th Item. I give, bequeath and devise to my granddaughters, Laura Amanda and Mary Lizzie Williams [here follows a bequest of personal property], also the lands adjoining the lands willed to G. T. Dismukes and Mrs. Napier, and the lands of J. H. Lawrence to the public road from Eatonton to Clinton, and the lands given to their mother, Mrs. Martha M. Williams, of the above lands given to said children which contains (500) five hundred acres, more or less. I allow my grandson, John S. Williams and his wife, Essie Williams, to use the Clayton field and Sprout Spring field said to contain (225) two hundred and twenty-five acres for a support during the life of my wife, Frances Amanda Williams, at her death then to go in the possession of the said grandchildren, Laura Amanda and Mary Lizzie Williams, I give said lands as willed with all the rights, members and privileges in any wise appertaining or belonging forever."

It is insisted by the plaintiffs in error that the language in the fifth item devising "all the lands situated and lying in Baldwin County, Ga., adjoining the lands of Dr. Snead, the lands willed to G. T. Dismukes, and the lands of J. H. Lawrence, up the branch to where one hundred acres was surveyed off, said to contain (350) Three Hundred and Fifty acres more or less," conveys all the land that testator had in Baldwin county to her, except that devised in the fourth item of said will to G. T. Dismukes. In support of this view, and on the theory that this clause of the will was ambiguous, the defendant offered on the trial of the case in the court below to show by the scrivener who wrote the will that it was the intention of the testator to devise to his daughter, Mrs. Napier, all the lands belonging to the testator in Baldwin county, except those devised to G. T. Dismukes. This the court declined to allow, and we think properly. Able counsel insisted that the witness should have been allowed to testify "by declaring what the intention of the testator was, and what his [the scrivener's] intention was," namely, that the testator intended by said devise to convey all his land in Baldwin county, except that devised to Dismukes, to his daughter, Mrs. Napier, and also what instructions were given by the testator to the scrivener at the time he drew the will of the testator as to the devise of the property to his daughter, Mrs. I. R. Napier.

The plaintiffs claimed a tract of land which extended from the line between Jones and Baldwin counties to the line of what was known as the "Dismukes tract." The defendant contended that under the sixth item of the will the plaintiffs were not entitled to any land in Baldwin county. The sixth item of the will declares that the land devised to the testator's grandchildren is bounded by the lands given to Dismukes and Mrs. Napier. One leading question in the case is whether the description in the sixth item of the will calls for the land of Dismukes as one of its boundaries. The land given to Dismukes in the fourth item of the will was in Baldwin county, and some distance from the Jones county line. If, therefore, the Dismukes land formed one boundary of the lands devised in the sixth item of the will, it was impossible for such lands to lie wholly in Jones county, and not to extend into Baldwin county. It was contended that the will was so ambiguous that this could be shown by parol to be the fact. We hold, however, that upon the face of the will itself one of the boundaries of the lands devised to the testator's grandchildren was the land given to Dismukes, and another boundary was the land given to Mrs. Napier. We think unequivocally this was the meaning of the will. This being so, it follows that it was not competent to introduce parol testimony of the scrivener of the will to show that the testator instructed him to devise to the grandchildren lands lying only in Jones county. Still less would it be competent to permit him to testify in round terms what the testator meant, and what he himself meant. To allow the scrivener to change the boundaries of the land devised when they are patent upon the face of the will itself would put it in the power of the scrivener to make the testator's will. If, then, this boundary is fixed, it is competent to adjust by parol testimony the description of the land to the boundary, or boundaries, but it is not competent to disprove by parol testimony the boundary or boundaries fixed by the will itself. See Gillespie v. Schuman, 62 Ga. 252, 257; Donehoo v. Johnson, 120 Ala. 438, 24 South. 888. The defendant insists that all of the land devised to the plaintiffs lies in Jones, and not in Baldwin, county. But the language of the sixth item is "also the lands adjoining the lands willed to G. T. Dismukes, and Mrs. Napier, and the lands of J. H. Lawrence to the public road from Eatonton to Clinton," etc. The land willed to G. T. Dismukes was in Baldwin, and not in Jones, and the Dismukes boundary could not touch the land devised to the plaintiffs if it were all located in Jones county. It appears that the testator devised by the sixth item of his will to the plaintiffs the tract of land known as the "Clayton field," which the testimony shows included what was known as the "Sprout Spring field." This he sold before his death. If the insistence of the defendant is correct, the devise of lands to the plaintiffs under the will would fail in toto. This hardly seems consistent with the evident purpose and general scope of the will of the testator. He was providing by these items for his child and his grandchildren, and it would be unnatural indeed, after providing for the one, he did not provide for the others also. We think he did; and a careful reading and study of the will and the testimony convinces us that the land in dispute was devised by the sixth item of the testator's will to his granddaughters, Mrs. Little and Miss Williams, the plaintiffs in this case. To allow the construction of the will contended for by the plaintiff in error would be to materially add to the amount of the land estimated by the testator as being devised to his daughter Mrs. Napier, and to materially decrease the amount which according to his estimate he devised to his granddaughters, Mrs. Little and Miss Williams. In fact, there is testimony going to show that it would leave them without any land at all; the devise to them of other lands which are not in dispute have failed by reason of their disposition by the testator prior to his death. The jury trying the case found that the premises in dispute were devised by item 6 of the will to the plaintiffs, the presiding judge refused to disturb their verdict, and, as we find no errors requiring a reversal, we think the judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

[2] 2. The defendant also relied upon prescriptive title to prevent a recovery of the land in dispute. She avers that she had been in possession of the same under color of title for over seven years; that under a decree rendered in Jones superior court at the October term, 1900, to which both of the plaintiffs and the defendant were parties, she was put in possession of the lands and has continued in possession of same until this suit was brought. The record discloses that said decree provided "that Mrs. Isabella R. Napier takes under the will, and that the lands described in item 5 of said will do vest in her the said I. R. Napier." So that it appears from the language of the decree that it describes the land in dispute no more accurately than the will itself. We do not think that it describes it at all. For color to be the basis of prescription, the instrument by which it is asserted must purport to cover the land in dispute. Powell on Actions for Land, § 295, p. 382, and authorities cited in note 4. The decree, in order to be a color for prescription to run, must on its face cover a description of the property in dispute. But the land is not so described either in that part of the decree or that item of the will under which the defendant asserts color of title.

In this connection, we consider, also, the ground of the motion for a new trial complaining that the trial judge committed error in charging the jury that "if you believe from the testimony in the case, and all these are questions of fact for you to pass upon, that this action was commenced by these plaintiffs at any time within the statute after the youngest became of age, they would not be barred." We think this charge of the court was error, and that the reverse of the rule charged is the law. The statute began to run against each of the plaintiffs, respectively, at the time she became of age, and the one whose right of action had become barred, had it been barred, could not avail herself of the rights of the other against whom the statute had not operated a sufficient length of time to become a bar. The action, being a joint one, was not maintainable as such where the defendant showed a prescriptive title against one of the plaintiffs. Powell on Actions for Land, § 29; Williamson v. Youmans, 71 S. E. 138. While the charge referred to would have been reversible error had it appeared that there was a sufficient foundation for the prescriptive title asserted by the defendant, it could not harm her under the facts of this case, for the reason that she did not show any color of title which could be the basis of prescription so as to put the statute in operation against either of the plaintiffs.

[3] 3. Another ground of the motion for a new trial was the admission in evidence of a certain plat or drawing of the premises in dispute and other property owned by the testator at the time of his death, made by H. P. Cowan, a surveyor, which was objected to on the ground that it was a private drawing, not made according to the provisions of law, and that, with the entries thereon, it contained an expression of opinion as to what constituted the premises in dispute and other parcels of land, etc. This plat was not offered under the rule of court requiring certain surveys to be made under order of court on notice, and which would import verity on its face, but was a plat or drawing made by a surveyor, and was accompanied by other testimony showing its correctness; and was allowed by the court, we take it, for the purpose of illustrating the other testimony in the case and throwing light on the location of the land in dispute. We do not think the court erred in so doing. Georgia Railroad Co. v. City of Atlanta, 134 Ga. 871 (2) 68 S. E. 708. Especially, as the court instructed the jury to entirely disregard all statements on this plat, if any, as to what land was left to either party in the case, or the processions' line appearing thereon, and they were to consider from all of the testimony in the case whether the map was correct or not. The map of a county surveyor, while not evidence, under the circumstances of this case, is admissible to go to the jury as a mere diagram to illustrate other testimony in the case. See Brantley v. Huff, 62 Ga. 532 (1), 534. There were no errors in the other grounds of the motion which require a new trial in this case, and the evidence was sufficient to support the verdict.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except BECK, J., absent.

MYRICK v. LIQUID CARBONIC CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 12, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

SALES (§ 480*)—CONDITIONAL SALES—REMEDIES OF VENDOR.

The vendor in a conditional sale, having reserved title to the property so sold in the bill of sale, which is duly recorded, may, where the conditions of the sale have not been fulfilled so as to pass title to the vendee, assert title in an action of trover against a purchaser of the property at a bankruptcy sale, where the trustee sells the property of the bankrupt free from liens and incumbrances; it not appearing that the vendor has done any act which would estop it from such assertion of its title.

(a) Mere failure by the vendee to claim the property or assert its title thereto would not operate as such estoppel.

(b) Nor would the proof of an unsecured claim founded upon an open account operate as an estoppel; it not appearing that the vendor participated in the proceeds arising from the sale of the property which it sold to the bankrupt with a reservation of title in the vendor, the conditions of the sale not having been fulfilled.

Error from Superior Court, Baldwin County; Jas. B. Park, Judge.

Action by the Liquid Carbonic Company against D. P. Myrick. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Hines & Vinson, for plaintiff in error. R. S. Wimberly, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. The record in this case discloses the following facts: The Liquid Carbonic Company sold to the Winebrew Company the personal property in dispute, consisting of a carbonator, wash, and shafting, under a written contract whereby the Carbonic Company retained title until the property was paid for. This contract of purchase and sale was duly recorded. Later the creditors of the Winebrew Company forced that company into bankruptcy. The trustee in bankruptcy petitioned the court for leave to sell the entire estate of the bankrupt, free of liens. The referee in bankruptcy accordingly granted such order, and mailed to each of the creditors scheduled by the Winebrew Company a notice of the intention to sell all the assets of the estate free of liens. In addition to the property sold to the Winebrew Company on the terms above stated, the Carbonic Company was a creditor of the bankrupt company for supplies. After advertising as required by law, the trustee sold at public outcry all of the estate of the bankrupt, including the property above mentioned, title to which was retained by the Carbonic Company. The Carbonic Company interposed no objection to the sale. After this sale had been made, the Carbonic Company proved to the bankrupt court its unsecured claim for supplies, and sought to participate to that extent in any dividend to be declared from the proceeds of the sale. The Carbonic Company also proceeded by an action in trover against Myrick, who had purchased the carbonator, wash, and shafting from the trustee in bankruptcy, to recover said property, as being the property title to which was retained by the plaintiff in its contract of sale made with the Winebrew Company. Upon the trial of the trover suit the jury returned a verdict in favor of the Carbonic Company for $100 principal, and $49 as hire. Myrick made a motion for a new trial; and, this being overruled, he excepted.

Without reference to the amount recovered by the plaintiff against the defendant, of which no complaint is made, it seems to us that no other verdict than the one returned by the jury on the trial could have been rendered under the facts of the case. The plaintiff sold the personal property in controversy to the bankrupt and reserved the title thereto until compliance with the conditions of the sale. Those conditions had not been complied with. One of the conditions was complete payment for the property, and there were installments of the purchase-price still due. Under these circumstances, the property never became the property of the bankrupt, but the title to the same was in the bankrupt's vendor, and consequently the trustee in bankruptcy did not acquire a title thereto. The vendor in a conditional sale evidenced by a writing, and followed by timely and proper recordation, is not a mere lienor. The order authorizing the trustee to sell the bankrupt's property free from liens and incumbrances could not affect the property to recover which this suit was brought. The plaintiff was not seeking to enforce a lien or incumbrance in his favor, but to reach property which had belonged to it, and with the title to which it had never parted. The citation of authorities relating to the consignor of goods, or to the holder of a lien on the goods, which may be in the possession of a bankrupt at the time of the filing of a petition in bankruptcy and the adjudication of bankruptcy, was beside the purpose when the question is one of the right of the trustee in bankruptcy to sell property which had come into the bankrupt's hands under a conditional sale. So far as the rights of the vendor are concerned in the case of a conditional sale, he stands in the position of any absolute owner of property which happened to be in the bankrupt's hands at the time of the filing of the petition against the latter. The trustee in the present case possessed no greater interest in the property, nor had any better title thereto, than the bankrupt had, and the rule of caveat emptor obtains in this case as in other judicial sales. 2 Remington on Bankruptcy, § 1959.

While it is clear that the plaintiff might have asserted its title to the property while it was in the hands of the bankrupt or its trustee before the sale, it may also assert it against the purchaser at the bankruptcy sale, unless it had estopped itself by its conduct from so doing. And we do not find in the record in this case, either in the evidence admitted or in that which was excluded, anything which would authorize the application of the doctrine of estoppel. The fact that after notice that the property of the bankrupt would be sold free from liens and incumbrances the plaintiff filed no objection to the sale of this property, and that it did not assert title to it before the sale, would not work an estoppel against the right to assert title against the purchaser, inasmuch as nothing in the notice indicated that this particular property would be sold; the notice in effect being that the property of the bankrupt would be sold free from liens and incumbrances, and no adequate description of this property being given in the notice referred to. The vendor had already, in the registry of its bill of conditional sale, given to the world all the notice which it was required to give that the property belonged to it. In this connection see Collier on Bankruptcy (7th Ed.) 825.

Again, the plaintiff was not estopped by the fact that it, as a creditor of the bankrupt, had proved in bankruptcy, after the sale was made, an unsecured claim based upon an open account. There was no proof in the evidence either admitted or rejected that the plaintiff had participated in any division of the proceeds arising from the sale of the property to which it now asserts title; and the question as to what would have been the effect of its sharing in such proceeds does not arise.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

ETNA STEEL & IRON CO. et al. v.
HAMILTON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 15, 1911.)

1. MORTGAGES (§ 468*)—FORECLOSURE BY ACTION—RECEIVERS—PLEADING.

An equitable petition by a bondholder to foreclose in his own name the trust deed, wherein is alleged that permission for him so to do is given in the trust deed upon the trustee's refusal to bring the action on demand, and that the trustee has refused to foreclose on demand made upon him, and that there exists an emergent condition requiring the immediate interposition of a court of equity to prevent serious loss from an impending tax sale of a part of the mortgaged property, does not show on its face that the plaintiff is not entitled to a pendente lite receiver in aid of the relief sought.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 1374, 1375; Dec. Dig. § 468.*]

2. MORTGAGES (§ 468*)—FORECLOSURE BY ACTION—RECEIVERS.

Where a bondholder files an equitable petition for the foreclosure of a trust deed, and to protect the mortgage property from an impending tax sale, and a temporary receiver is appointed, who procures a bank to pay the executions, which are assigned to the bank, and where, on the interlocutory hearing for a permanent receiver, it appears that the bondholder is not entitled to foreclose the mortgage (the right to foreclose being in the trustee, and there being no refusal on his part to act), and the mortgagor offers to pay the tax executions which were proceeding against the property, it is error to refuse such offer, and appoint a permanent receiver.

Error from Superior Court, Polk County; Price Edwards, Judge.

Action by Harper Hamilton against the Etna Steel & Iron Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants bring error. Reversed.

The Etna Steel & Iron Company, a domestic corporation, on January 1, 1907, executed to the Empire Trust Company of New York, as trustee, a deed of trust to secure the issue of $600,000 of bonds. The bonds were of the denomination of $1,000 each, due at 20 years, with interest payable semiannually. It was covenanted in the deed of trust: That the Etna Steel & Iron Company would promptly pay the bonds and interest coupons as they severally matured. That it would pay all taxes assessed against the mortgaged property, take care of and preserve the same, keep the property liable to be destroyed by fire insured in some good company, and, in case of loss before the maturity of the bonds, the money received from the insurance company by the trustee at the written request of the Etna Company shall be paid over to it and by it used in payment of expenses of repairing, rebuilding, or replacing the property burned or damaged by fire. That the board of directors of the Etna Company shall have the right to sell property which may become worn, damaged, or otherwise unsuitable to be used in the operation of its property, provided an equivalent in value be substituted in lieu thereof, without liability or responsibility of the trustee for the acts of the Etna Company in this respect. The deed conferred upon the trustee a power of sale in case of default by the Etna Company in any condition or covenant in the trust deed, or in the payment of any bond at maturity or interest coupon when due, or any other default which should continue for a year thereafter. It was further provided, in case of default in any of the covenants of conditions, that the trustee, instead of exercising the power of sale, should be entitled in its discretion to proceed by bill in equity and other appropriate proceedings in any court of competent jurisdiction to foreclose the mortgage or trust deed, and enforce the rights, liens, and securities of the trustee and bondholders; provided that no foreclosure proceedings should be commenced, by reason of the nonpayment of the interest, until one year after default in the payment of the interest. It was stipulated that it was no part of the duty of the trustee to see to or effect insurance against fire, to keep itself advised or informed as to the payment of taxes, or to require such payment to be made, or to see that the Etna Company fulfilled any of its covenants. The deed also contained these stipulations: "The trustee shall be under no obligation or duty to perform any act hereunder, or to defend any suit in respect hereof, except upon the request of the company, or of the bondholders of a majority in value of the bonds outstanding hereunder, and unless fully indemnified to its satisfaction, and the trustee shall not be bound to recognize any person as a bondholder unless and until his bonds are submitted to the trustee for inspection if required, and his title thereto satisfactorily established, if disputed. * * * The exclusive right of action hereunder shall be vested in the trustee until the refusal on its part to act, and no bondholder or bondholders shall be entitled to enforce performance of these presents until after demand made on the trustee accompanied by a tender of indemnity satisfactory to the trustee as aforesaid, and the refusal of the trustee to act in accordance with such demand as hereinafter provided."

On February 28, 1910, Harper Hamilton filed an equitable petition against the Etna Company and the Empire Trust Company, praying for a foreclosure of the trust deed and the appointment of a receiver in aid thereof. He alleged that he was the owner of 33 bonds, and brought the petition in behalf of himself and all the bondholders of the Etna Company; that the Etna Company had defaulted in the payment of interest coupons for more than a year; that it had broken its covenant in respect to effecting insurance; that it had failed to keep the property in repair, and had allowed the same to be wasted; that it had sold off property, and had not replaced the same as it covenanted to do; that it had failed to pay the taxes upon the property to the extent of $1,600; that it had collected approximately $6,000 from loss on fire insurance policies, and had not reinvested same according to the terms of the trust deed; that in writing he had called the attention of the trustee, the Empire Trust Company, to the default in the payment of interest and of taxes, and to the fact that default in the payment of interest had continued for more than a year, and also advised it that default had been made in the keeping up of the insurance, and had demanded of the trustee that it proceed to enforce the mortgage or trust deed according to its terms for the protection of the bondholders, and had offered to furnish to the trustee such indemnity as it required under the terms of the trust deed; and that he had especially called the attention of the trustee to a threatened sale of the mortgaged property for taxes on the first Tuesday in March, and demanded of the trustee that it take legal proceedings to foreclose the mortgage and have a receiver appointed in time to prevent the sale of the property for taxes, but that the trustee had refused to institute such proceedings. The prayers were for the appointment of a receiver, the foreclosure of the mortgage, and a distribution of the proceeds of the foreclosure sale among the bondholders. A temporary receiver was appointed, and he was authorized to borrow sufficient money with which to pay off the fi. fas., and a rule nisi was granted, fixing a date for a hearing of the application for the appointment of a permanent receiver.

Certain holders of 61 bonds were allowed to intervene, and in their intervention they alleged that T. N. Barnsdall, the president of the Etna Company, was the owner of a majority of its common stock, and also owned or controlled a majority of its bonds; that at the request of Barnsdall the trustee had instituted in the United States court a suit to foreclose the trust deed, wherein it was alleged that there were $500,000 bonds outstanding, whereas there were not so many bonds issued, and that Barnsdall had not applied the proceeds of the bonds which he claimed to have sold to himself to any beneficial use of the Etna Company; that the trustee has recognized Barnsdall as the holder or representative of the holders of the bonds, and will not attack the right of any holder to collect the same. These interveners alleged the property to be of much less value than the amount of the bonds secured by the trust deed, and prayed for an accounting of the bonds issued and that such as were illegally issued be declared null and void. On September 20th the court passed an order providing for the service of the Empire Trust Company by publication agreeably to the statute. On September 24th the Etna Company interposed their demurrers, general and special. The application for permanent receiver came on to be heard on December 13, 1910, and on that day the Empire Trust Company entered its special appearance for the purpose of objecting to the jurisdiction of the court on the ground that it had not been properly served. This motion was overruled. The Etna Company filed its answer, denying the right of the plaintiff to sue, because of the failure to comply with the stipulations of the trust deed. It admitted its default in the payment of interest, and the right of the Empire Trust Company to have a foreclosure of the trust deed. It admitted that the taxes were not fully paid, but alleged that the greater part of the 1908 taxes had been paid and the execution representing the balance had been transferred to and was held by the Commercial Bank, and at the time the 1909 taxes matured all the property was in the charge of A. T. Hamilton, a brother of the plaintiff, and who is now temporary receiver. It admitted that all of its property was not insured, but denied that it was necessary to insure all the property; and alleged that the property was under the management of A. T. Hamilton for nearly 12 months, and all the defaults as to the failure to keep the property insured had been known to the plaintiff for some time, without any objection on his part. While admitting its default in the payment of interest, and keeping up the insurance, and not operating the property, because it did not believe it could be profitably operated as it had been done, the Etna Company denied that there had been any waste to the property, and alleged that the money collected from fire insurance was properly applied to the obligations of the company. It further answered that it was on March 1, 1910, and is now, ready, able, and willing to take over and control the tax executions, and does now repeat this offer and willingness, and makes a continuing offer and tender to take up the executions and relieve the temporary receiver thereof at any time by permission of the court, and permission to do so was applied for; that the tax executions had not been paid by the temporary receiver, but were held by the Commercial Bank under a transfer made to the bank; that the bank holds no other security for the payment of the taxes except the property of the company, which is subject to the lien of the tax execution independent of the receivership; that the company would have taken up the tax executions on March 1, 1910, if its representative had not been informed early in the morning that a temporary receiver had been appointed. It was further alleged that the trust company had filed its original bill of foreclosure in behalf of all the bondholders under and in pursuance of the terms and conditions of the trust deed against the Etna Company in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Georgia, and that the mortgage had been foreclosed and a receiver appointed. The Etna Company pleaded the pendency of the foreclosure proceedings in the Circuit Court of the United States as a bar to the alleged right of the plaintiff to maintain this action in this court, which depends upon and must be determined by the terms of the trust deed, which the plaintiff is seeking to foreclose. The Etna Company, in answer to the intervention, admitted that T. N. Barnsdall owned a majority of the stock, and also owned or controlled a majority of the bonds of the company. It denied that the board of directors or the individual members thereof were under the control of Barnsdall, and alleged that the plaintiff in this case could obtain adequate and complete relief regardless of the board of directors in the pending suit brought by the trustee to foreclose the mortgage. It denied that its bonds had been disposed of unlawfully and without authority, or that par value had not been paid for them, and alleged that the proceeds thereof had been used in the acquisition of property, both real and personal, for the equipment and maintenance thereof. The trust company filed its answer, in which it averred that only $450,000 par value of bonds had ever been certified and issued. It admitted that the Etna Company had made default in the performance of some of the covenants and conditions in the trust mortgage, and that the right accrued to the trustee to have a foreclosure of the trust mortgage according to the terms of its provisions, but denied that any such right accrued and existed in favor of the plaintiff, either at the time of filing his petition or since. It denied that either the plaintiff or any one for him had ever made demand upon it as trustee to foreclose the mortgage in accordance with the terms and provisions of the mortgage. It alleged that all the communications between the parties relative to this subject are in writing, and it submitted that the writings affirmatively showed that no such demand and refusal thereof, such as would entitle the plaintiff to foreclose the mortgage, had ever been made. It denied that it ever refused after demand to proceed to foreclose the mortgage. It set up that on the 4th day of April, 1910, as trustee under the trust mortgage, it filed its bill in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Georgia against the Etna Steel & Iron Company, alleging default under the terms and conditions of the trust mortgage, and prayed for the foreclosure of the mortgage and for a receiver in aid thereof, being thereto duly requested by a majority in number of the outstanding bonds of the company, and being furnished indemnity in compliance with the provisions of the mortgage in that regard; that on the hearing a receiver was duly appointed, who had duly qualified, and that subsequently the Etna Company had made an appearance by answer, admitting its defaults and insolvency, and consenting, in so far as with propriety it might do so, to the appointment of a receiver; and that on June 20, 1910, a decree of foreclosure was granted by the court, and citation was duly issued and published to all creditors claiming under the mortgage to appear and submit their claims to the court, an exemplified copy of the suit being attached. The trustee further alleged that it was effectively proceeding to exercise its discretion and discharge its duties under the trust deed for the benefit of all bondholders, and pleaded the pendency of the suit in the United States court in bar of the plaintiff's action. On the last-named day the court overruled the de-murrer of the Etna Company and the motion to dismiss made by the Empire Trust Company, and, after hearing evidence, appointed a permanent receiver. The exceptions are to the interlocutory grant of a receiver, to the overruling of the demurrers and motion to dismiss, and to certain rulings on evidence.

W. W. Mundy and W. A. Wimbish, for plaintiffs in error. King, Spalding & Underwood and Bunn & Bunn, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. The petition alleged the maturity of the bonds by default in the payment of interest for more than a year and the right of a bondholder under the terms of the trust deed to foreclose it, and also an emergent condition requiring the immediate interposition of a court of equity to prevent serious loss from an impending tax sale, and it cannot be said that on its face it did not present a case for the appointment of an interlocutory receiver in aid of the relief sought.

[2] 2. On the hearing the plaintiffs submitted the correspondence between themselves and their attorneys, and the trustee and its attorneys, upon which they relied to establish their right to foreclose the mortgage under the terms of the trust deed. This correspondence began 18 days before the plaintiff filed his petition. The initial letter was from the plaintiff to the trustee, dated February 10, 1910, to the effect that the plaintiff was the holder of 33 bonds; that the interest was in default for more than a year, and requested the trustee to proceed to foreclose the mortgage, offering such indemnity as the trustee might require under the terms of the deed of trust. The receipt of this letter was acknowledged on the 16th of February by the secretary of the trustee, who stated therein that the trustee would be glad to do anything it should do under the mortgage, and had referred the matter to its counsel, and would communicate with the plaintiff as soon as advised; and that the trustee would require, in case it instituted proceedings, a deposit of such sum in money as might be agreed upon to indemnify against expenses. On February 24th the plaintiff telegraphed the trustee: "Property Etna Steel and Iron Company advertised for taxes. Be sold March first. Authorize me to file bill in your name, or shall I proceed in my name for bondholders." On the same day counsel for the trustee wrote to plaintiff that it would be glad to foreclose the mortgage, but they would like to have the plaintiff to do certain things; that the trustee would require indemnity before instituting such proceedings, and he thought that this should be in the sum of at least $1,500, to cover possible costs and expenses, and would prefer that the indennity be provided by deposit in cash, but, if this was not convenient, to inform him what other form of indemnity plaintiff would like to offer. He requested detailed information as to the nonpayment of taxes and noninsurance of the property, and referred them to the provision in the mortgage permitting a bondholder to pay the taxes and insure the property, and offered to advise the trustee to attend to this if the plaintiff would furnish it with funds necessary for the purpose. Reference was made to the provision in the trust deed relative to the default in the payment of the interest for one year after due demand for payment, and full information was asked as to whether demand for payment of the coupons alleged to be overdue had been made. It was further stated that the trustee, before beginning foreclosure proceedings, would require some proof as to the fact of the plaintiff's ownership of the bonds, either by the deposit of the bonds or by some way satisfactory to it; that the mortgage provided that the trustee was under no duty or obligation to act thereunder unless requested by a majority of the holders of bonds outstanding, but the writer did not believe that this interfered with the trustee's right to act upon the plaintiff's request, although he suggested it would be better to have a larger number of bondholders making the request. On the next day counsel for the trustee wrote to counsel for the plaintiff a similar letter. The foregoing epitomizes the correspondence between the trustee and the plaintiff prior to the institution of the suit. We do not think, under these circumstances, that the plaintiff brought himself within the terms of the mortgage, so as to give him the right of foreclosure under the contract because of a failure of the trustee to institute proceedings. The trust deed expressly stipulated that the exclusive right of action was vested in the trustee until refusal on its part to act, and no bondholder should be entitled to enforce performance of its covenants until after demand had been made on the trustee, accompanied by a tender of indemnity satisfactory to the trustee, and the refusal of the trustee to act in accordance with such demand. It appeared in the evidence that there was a prior mortgage of $100,000 upon the property, and the trustee was apprehensive that the proceeds arising from the sale of the property would not exceed this sum. Prior to the filing of his petition, the plaintiff did not intimate that the indemnity required by the trust company was exorbitant in amount, or in any wise oppressive. The plaintiff failed to offer the indemnity required, and there was no refusal on the part of the trustee to proceed to enforce the trust deed. Under the undisputed facts, the plaintiff had no right as a bondholder to institute the suit in opposition to the right of the trustee.

But it is contended that, inasmuch as the property was about to be sold for taxes, the conditions were emergent and justified the plaintiff for the protection of himself and other bondholders to protect himself against serious loss resulting from a sale of the property. On the hearing it was made to appear that in 1908 an execution for taxes for the sum of $525 had been issued against the Etna Company, and that this tax fi. fa. had been transferred to the Commercial Bank; that in 1909 a special fi. fa. and a general fi. fa., aggregating $1,025, had been issued, and, at the instance of the county attorney, were placed in the hands of the sheriff for enforcement. The sheriff levied upon certain personal property, when a brother of the plaintiff, who was the manager of the Etna Company, suggested that the levy on the personalty be dismissed, and that the land embracing the pumping station be levied upon. Accordingly the sheriff levied upon certain described realty and a pumping outfit located thereon. This land embraced the water supply, which furnished the chief value to the other mining property. Immediately after his appointment the temporary receiver procured a bank to take up the executions upon an assignment of the fi. fas. to the bank. The Etna Company offered to pay these taxes, provided the receivership was dismissed; and this offer was declined. Under the terms of the trust deed, the trustee was under no obligation to look after the payment of taxes. The Etna Company covenanted to pay the taxes; and its default, not that of the trustee, produced the emergent condition, to relieve which the bondholder filed his action. Where there is a duty on a trustee to act promptly to protect the mortgage property, and he fails or neglects to perform this duty upon demand, a bondholder may institute a suit in his stead for the preservation of the property. 3 Cook on Corporations, § 830. But it does not follow that a right to file a proceeding to protect the property from an impending peril will justify a bondholder to institute proceedings to foreclose the mortgage contrary to its terms. The Etna Company pleaded that, after the appointment of the temporary receiver, it had been ready, willing, and able to take up the tax executions, and would have done so on the day of sale but for the appointment of a temporary receiver and the grant of an order restraining it from interfering with its property or rights, and in its answer it made an offer to take up such executions and asked the permission of the court to do so. The court should have allowed the taxes to be paid, for, if they were paid, there would be no longer any necessity for the receivership to preserve the property. It did not appear what particular property was insured, and what was not insured, but the failure of the Etna's Company's covenant to insure would not be sufficient ground to deprive the trustee of his exclusive right under the contract to foreclose the mortgage.

The facts pleaded in the intervention do not affect the right of the trustee to bring the suit. The trustee has the right to foreclose the mortgage, and in that foreclosure suit the plaintiffs would have the right to intervene for the purpose of showing that any bonds presented to the trustee for payment had been illegally issued, or were otherwise not entitled to share with the plaintiffs in the distribution of the proceeds of the sale of the property. 3 Cook on Corp. § 848b.

There is no dispute that the mortgage is ripe for foreclosure, the Etna Company admits its defaults, and the contest is between the trustee and minority bondholders as to the right to maintain a foreclosure suit. We do not undertake to pass upon the propriety of the trustee to bring a foreclosure suit in the United States courts after the present suit by the bondholder was begun. That court is the proper tribunal to adjudicate its own jurisdiction. What we decide is that on the hearing the proof failed to support the plaintiff's allegations entitling him to foreclose the mortgage, and that upon the Etna Company's providing for the tax executions the receiver should be discharged and the property turned over to its owner.

1. CORPORATIONS (§§ 351, 357*)—ACTION (§ 50*)—OFFICERS—LIABILITY FOR CORPORATE DEBTS—REMEDIES.

Civil Code 1910, § 2220, declares that "persons who organize a company and transact business in its name, before the minimum capital stock has been subscribed for, are liable to creditors to make good the minimum capital stock with interest." Held: (1) That the liability imposed by this statute constitutes a fund for the benefit of all creditors, so far as the condition of the company renders a resort to it necessary for the payment of its debts. (2) That an action at law cannot be maintained by one creditor among many for the appropriation of the whole or any part of such liability to his own benefit, to the possible exclusion of all or any of the other creditors, but that the remedy is in equity by a petition brought at the instance of one or more creditors and in behalf of all other creditors who may come in and be made parties plaintiff to the action. Hornor v. Henning, 93 U. S. 228, 23 L. Ed. 879, and cases cited; also 8 Rose's Notes U. S. Rep. 947, and 1 Supp. Rose's Notes U. S. Rep. 1207; Winchester v. Mabury, 122 Cal. 522, 55 Pac. 393. See Schley v. (a) The decisions of this court to the effect that, under charters making each stockholder in banking corporations liable to redeem his proportionate share of the outstanding bills or indebtedness of the bank, a single creditor may sue at law any individual stockholder, are not in conflict with the ruling above announced; for there the liability of the stockholder is several, and is limited to the amount of his stock, a fixed sum easily ascertained. 2. CORPORATIONS (§ 351)—OFFICERS—LIABILITY FOR CORPORATE DEBTS—REMEDIES.

Accordingly, the court properly sustained a general demurrer to a petition brought by a copartnership for its sole benefit to enforce the liability imposed by the statute quoted in the first headnote, to the extent of the plaintiff's claim against the company; it appearing from the petition that there were other creditors of the company.

JOHN V. FARWELL CO. et al. v. JACKSON STORES et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 13, 1911.)

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 351*)—OFFICERS—LIABILITIES FOR CORPORATE DEBTS—REMEDIES.

An equitable petition was brought by a number of creditors of an insolvent corporation, in behalf of themselves and all other creditors of the corporation who might intervene as plaintiffs in the case, against the corporation and several individuals, who, as alleged, organized the company and transacted business in its name before the minimum capital stock had been subscribed for, praying for judgments against all the defendants, and seeking to require the individual defendants, who, it was alleged, organized the defendant corporation and transacted business in its name before the minimum capital stock had been subscribed for, to jointly and severally make good the minimum capital stock, with interest (under the provisions of Civil Code, § 2220), to the extent of the total sum of all of the indebtedness due the creditors of the company; it appearing from the petition that such indebtedness was less than the difference between the amount of stock actually subscribed for and the minimum capital stock of the company. Held, that the petition was not subject to general demurrer, nor to special demurrers on the ground of misjoinder of parties plaintiff and defendant, and of misjoinder of causes of action, in that it sought to recover of defendants distinct and independent claims of separate and distinct plaintiffs. Hill & Merry v. Jackson Stores, 73 S. E. 13, this day decided; Hornor v. Henning, 93 U. S. 228, 23 L. Ed. 879, and cases cited thereon in 8 Rose's Notes U. S. R. 947, and 1 Supp. Rose's Notes U. S. R. 1207; Burns v. Beck, 83 Ga. 471 (1), 10 S. E. 121. 2. BANKRUPTCY (§ 145*) — ADMINISTRATION OF ESTATE—ASSETS PASSING TO TRUSTEE—RIGHTS OF ACTION.

Where the corporation had been adjudged a bankrupt and proceedings in bankruptcy were pending, the right of action referred to in the preceding note was not in the trustee in bankruptcy. Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 70 (a), 30 Stat. 565, 1 Fed. Stat. Ann. 697 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3451). The liability imposed by the statute constituted no part of the assets of the corporation. See Lane v. Morris, 8 Ga. 468 (7); In re Crystal Bottling Co. (D. C.) 3 Am. Bankr. Rep. 194, 96 Fed. 945; In re Beachy Co. (D. C.) 22 Am. Bankr. Rep. 538, 170 Fed. 825; In re Jassoy Co., 23 Am. Bankr. Rep. 622, 178 Fed. 515, 101 C. C. A. 641. Section 2249 of the Civil Code, making the individual liability of a stockholder under the charter of the corporation an asset of such corporation, applies to those who have subscribed for stock, and not to the liability prescribed by section 2220, which is a liability to creditors imposed upon organizers of a company who transact business in its name, whether they be actual stockholders or not. This distinction is recognized in Commercial Bank v. Warthen, 119 Ga. 990, 994, 47 S. E. 536, in commenting on the case of Dutcher v. Marine Bank, 12 Blatchf. 435, Fed. Cas. No. 4,203.

3. CORPORATIONS (§ 342*) — OFFICERS — LIABILITY FOR CORPORATE DEBTS—TRANSFER OF STOCK.

Persons who organize a company and transact business in its name before the minimum capital stock has been subscribed for, but who afterwards sell and transfer their stock and interest in the company, are nevertheless subject to the liability prescribed by the statute (Civil Code, § 2220) for the satisfaction of debts subsequently contracted by the corporation. See Walters v. Porter, 3 Ga. App. 73 (3), 59 S. E. 452. The capital stock of a corporation is deemed a trust fund for the payment of its debts. See Fitzpatrick v. McGregor, 133 Ga. 332, and cases cited on page 342, 85 S. E. 859, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 50. The requirement of the statute that the minimum capital stock of a corporation shall be subscribed for before the organizers thereof shall transact business in its name is obviously for the purpose of creating a fund, when the subscriptions to the amount of the minimum capital stock shall have been paid, for the ultimate benefit of those who may extend credit to the corporation; and such persons have the right to presume that the statute has been complied with, and to rely, if necessary, upon the statutory liability of those failing to observe the law. Organizers of a company who transact business in its name before the minimum capital stock has been subscribed for are considered as committing a fraud upon those who may extend credit to the company, and the statute imposes a liability upon them for engaging in such fraudulent transaction, and they should not be allowed to escape the statutory penalty for such fraud by disposing of their stock.

4. CORPORATIONS (§ 342*) — OFFICERS — LIABILITY FOR CORPORATE DEBTS—TRANSFER OF STOCK.

The liability imposed by the statute above cited is so far penal in its nature as to require a strict construction. Banks v. Darden, 18 Ga. 318 (3); Wheatley v. Glover, 125 Ga. 710 (5), 54 S. E. 626; 8 Clark & Marshall, Priv. Corp. § 833(d); 1 Cook Corp. § 214; Steam Engine Co. v. Hubbard, 101 U. S. 188, 25 L. Ed. 786; Chase v. Curtis, 113 U. S. 452, 5 Sup. Ct. 554, 28 L. Ed. 1038; Park Bank v. Remsen, 158 U. S. 337, 15 Sup. Ct. 891, 39 L. Ed. 1008; Brunswick Terminal Co. v. National Bank, 192 U. S. 386, 24 Sup. Ct. 314, 48 L. Ed. 491.

(a) Accordingly, one who purchases stock in a corporation from one who aided in organizing the same, and who transacted business in its name before the minimum capital stock had been subscribed for, is not liable to creditors of the corporation for the statutory penalty in order to satisfy debts contracted in the name of the corporation, either prior or subsequently to the purchase of the stock. This is true for the reason that, to be liable under a strict construction of the statute, one must both participate in the organization of the corporation, and also transact business in its name before the minimum capital stock has been subscribed for. See, in this connection, Schley v. Dixon, 24 Ga. 273 (7), 71 Am. Dec. 121; Fuller v. Rowe, 57 N. Y. 23; Windham Prov. Inst., etc., v. Sprague, 43 Vt. 502; Stafford Nat. Bank v. Palmer, 47 Conn. 447; Steam Engine Co. v. Hubbard, 101 U. S. 188, 25 L. Ed. 786.

5. CORPORATIONS (§ 367*) — OFFICERS — LIABILITY FOR CORPORATE DEBTS—COSTS.

In an action brought by the creditors of a corporation to recover on the liability fixed by the statute in question (Civil Code, § 2220), expenses and attorney's fees for the bringing of the suit are not recoverable as against the defendants. If a fund should be brought into court in such an action, in which creditors other than those bringing the action should participate, then whether such other creditors should be required to pay their proportionate share of the expenses and attorney's fees for bringing in the fund is another question, and one not made in this case.

6. PLEADING (§ 216*) — DEMURRER — DETERMINATION—MATTERS CONSIDERED.

The petition for a charter for the defendant corporation and the order granting the same are not made parts of the petition in the present case, and therefore, in passing upon the demurrers to the petition, cannot be considered.

PETERSON v. LOTT.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 13, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

EQUITY (§ 195*)—PLEADING—CROSS-BILL.

Peterson conveyed a described parcel of land to Lott. The conveyance contained a condition subsequent to the effect that, if Lott should "offer [the land] for sale during his lifetime," then Peterson should have the right to have the land reconveyed to him upon his paying Lott a given sum (which was the purchase price Lott had paid Peterson), and in addition the value of whatever improvements Lott should make upon the land, to be ascertained in a prescribed manner. The conveyance was construed by this court in Wadley Lumber Co. v. Lott, 130 Ga. 135, 60 S. E. 836, where it was held that the instrument conveyed a fee in the land to Lott, subject to the right of Peterson to have it reconveyed to him if the condition subsequent should be broken by Lott, and upon Peterson repaying the original purchase money and the value of the improvements as above stated. See, also, Peterson v. Lott, 132 Ga. 366, 64 S. E. 263. Lott brought an action against Peterson for damages for the trespass of the Wadley Lumber Company in cutting the timber from the land under a lease made by Peterson to the lumber company subsequently to the conveyance made by Peterson to Lott. The cross-bill set up that there had been a breach of the condition subsequent contained in the conveyance made by Peterson to Lott, by reason of the fact that Lott had offered the land for sale. He further alleged that after such breach the value of the improvements placed upon the land by Lott had been ascertained in the manner prescribed in such conveyance, and that he had tendered the original purchase price, with interest thereon, and the value of such improvements to Lott, and requested him to reconvey the land to Peterson, and that Lott had refused to accept the tender and to reconvey the premises. It appeared from the cross-bill that the alleged breach of the condition by Lott was subsequent to the alleged trespass. The prayer of the cross-bill was that, upon the payment by Peterson to Lott of the original purchase price, with interest, and of the value of the improvements placed by him on the land, he be decreed to reconvey the land to Peterson. Held, that the cross-bill was properly stricken on demurrer, as it sought to introduce new and distinct matter not embraced in the original action. Josey v. Rogers, 13 Ga. 478; McDougald v. Dougherty, 14 Ga. 674; Johnson v. Stancliff, 113 Ga. 886, 39 S. E. 296; 2 Dan. Ch. Fr. 1548; Story's Eq. Pl. § 399. See, also, Carlton v. Southern Mutual Co., 72 Ga. 371, 392; Brownlee v. Warmack, 90 Ga. 775, 17 S. E. 102. At the time the timber was alleged to have been cut the fee to the land was in Lott, and the case set out in his petition was for the recovery of damages for the cutting of the timber at that time, the question thus raised being whether Peterson was liable for such trespass; while the question presented by the cross-petition of Peterson was whether Lott had, subsequently to such alleged trespass by Peterson, forfeited his right to the fee in the land by breaking the condition in the conveyance Peterson had made to him. The subject-matter of the cross-petition did not grow out of the original suit, and was therefore not germane.

CLARK, County Treasurer, v. CLARK, Sheriff.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 13, 1911.)

1. STATUTES (§ 76*) — LOCAL AND SPECIAL ACTS—CITY COURT.

An act of the General Assembly, approved September 22, 1881 (Acts 1880-1, p. 574), to establish a city court in the county of Richmond, in the fifth section thereof provided as follows: "The clerk and sheriff and their deputies of the superior court of Richmond county shall be ex officio clerk, sheriff, and deputies of said city court, and for services rendered in said city court shall be entitled to the same fees as are allowed them by law in the superior court, and shall discharge the same duties and be subject to the same obligations and penalties; and for services rendered where no compensation is provided by law, they shall receive such compensation as the judge of said court shall in his discretion grant." This act was amended by an act approved September 14, 1883 (Acts 1882-1883, p. 527), providing for the payment of the insolvent costs of the clerk and sheriff of the city court of Richmond county in the same manner as the payment of the insolvent costs that may become due said clerk, sheriff, and deputies for services rendered in said court, when examined and approved by the judge of said city court, and that such costs shall, upon presentation, be paid by the treasurer of the county out of any funds which may be in the treasury. On December 21, 1898, an act was approved (Acts 1898, p. 374) declaring that after its passage "the treasurer of Richmond county shall pay the sheriff of Richmond county, for insolvent costs in criminal cases in the city court of said county, upon presentation of itemized bills, when audited and approved by the presiding judge; provided, the sum so paid shall not exceed in any one year twelve hundred dollars." All laws and parts of laws in conflict with this act were repealed. None of these acts is in violation of the provisions of the Constitution of 1877 (article 1, § 4, par. 1), to the effect that "no special law shall be enacted in any case for which provision has been made by an existing general law."

Nor is there any restriction in the Constitution upon the Legislature in fixing the compensation of the officers of other city courts in a manner different from that prescribed for the officers of the city courts of Atlanta and Savannah, so as to render any of the acts above referred to unconstitutional. Clark v. Black, 136 Ga. 812 (2), 72 S. E. 251.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 78½; Dec. Dig. § 76.*]

2. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES (§ 29*)—COMPENSATION—"INSOLVENT CRIMINAL COSTS."

A sheriff is not entitled to pay for any services as costs unless payment for the same be expressly and specifically provided for by statute. Civ. Code 1910, § 4919; Peters v. State, 9 Ga. 109; Stamper v. State, 11 Ga. 643; Thomas v. Thomas, 61 Ga. 70, 72; Board of Commissioners v. Cox, 65 Ga. 80; Ward v. Barnes, 95 Ga. 103, 107, 22 S. E. 133; Floyd County v. Foster, 112 Ga. 133, 37 S. E. 90. See, also, 82 Cyc. 700 (5). The statutes have expressly provided for the amounts to which sheriffs are entitled as costs in criminal cases. Pen. Code 1895, § 1107; Pen. Code 1910, § 1134. Such fee bill, providing for the fees of sheriffs in criminal cases, does not include any fee or any cost as jury fees, nor for bringing convict witnesses to court, nor for serving sci. fas., nor for serving rules. It follows, therefore, that sheriffs cannot collect any amounts for services rendered in these respects as costs. Insolvent criminal costs are costs in criminal cases which the statute provides shall be due sheriffs as fees for services rendered in criminal cases, and which are expressly and specifically provided for as to the services rendered, and the amount to be paid therefor, and which are insolvent for the reason that they cannot be collected either on account of the insolvency of the party liable therefor or otherwise.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sheriffs and Constables, Cent. Dig. § 46; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

3. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES (§ 40*)—COMPENSATION—STATUTORY PROVISION.

Pen. Code 1895, § 1107 (Pen. Code 1910, § 1134), in setting forth in the fee bill the fees or costs to be paid sheriffs for specified services in criminal cases, and fixing the amounts to be paid in each case, provides that "the sheriffs are entitled to the following fees, to wit: * * * For conducting a prisoner before a judge or court to and from jail, $1.25." This provision of the statute means that the sheriff shall be entitled to $1.25 "for conducting a prisoner before a judge or court to and from jail" one time; that is, for conducting a prisoner from jail before a judge or court and returning him to jail, a sheriff is only entitled to $1.25 for the whole service. The ruling in Sapp v. Rozar, 70 Ga. 722, holds nothing to the contrary. The record in that case on file in the clerk's office of this court shows that in that case the sheriff was endeavoring by mandamus to collect the sum of 60 cents for each time he turned the key of the jail on the prisoner. The holding in that case was to the effect that the sheriff could only charge 60 cents for turning the key on the prisoner when he was received, and 60 cents for turning the key when he was finally discharged. In this connection see an act of the General Assembly approved March 2, 1875 (Acts 1875, p. 22).

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 936*)—REVIEW—PRESUMPTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

One of the items of insolvent criminal costs which the sheriff of the city court of Richmond county was endeavoring to collect by mandamus against the treasurer of that county in the present suit was for the sum of $183 for serving subpoenas where "it does not appear from whom issued or whether the witnesses were examined" at 50 cents each. The fee bills in the Penal Code (1895 and 1910), above referred to, provide that in criminal cases the sheriff shall be entitled "for summoning each witness, 50 cents." It appears from the record in this case that the judge of the city court of Richmond county examined the item, approved it, and ordered it paid in accordance with the statutes providing for the collection by the sheriff of such court of his insolvent criminal costs. It does not appear from the record that the sheriff was not entitled to the full sum of $183 for subpoenaing witnesses as stated, and we assume that the judge of the city court had before him the evidence necessary to authorize him, after examination of the items, to approve the same and order it paid by the treasurer.

5. COMPENSATION OF SHERIFF—MAKING MANDAMUS ABSOLUTE.

It follows from the foregoing that the court erred in making the mandamus absolute against the county treasurer for jury fees, for bringing convict witnesses to court, for serving sci. fas., and for serving rules, and he also erred in making the mandamus absolute for the sum of $2.50 for conducting each prisoner before the court to and from jail. The sheriff being entitled, as above stated, to $1.25 only in each case for such services.

Error from Superior Court, Richmond County; B. F. Walker, Judge.

Application by John W. Clark, sheriff of the city court in the county of Richmond, for mandamus to W. A. Clark, county treasurer. From a judgment making the mandamus absolute, the treasurer brings error. Affirmed, with directions.

FISH, C. J. Judgment affirmed, with direction. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

CLARK, County Treasurer, v. CLARK, Sheriff. (Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 13, 1911.)

1. STATUTES (§ 76*) — SPECIAL LAWS—COMPENSATION OF OFFICERS.

The act approved September 16, 1881 (Acts 1880-81, p. 533), in so far as it prescribes that the insolvent criminal costs of the sheriff of Richmond county may, upon recommendation of the grand jury, be paid out of any money in the treasury, is violative of article 1, § 4, par. 1, of the Constitution of this state (Civ. Code 1910, § 6391), which among other things declares that "no special law shall be enacted in any case for which provision has been made by an existing general law."

(a) The cases of Clark v. Reynolds, 136 Ga. 817, 72 S. E. 254, and Adam v. Wright, 84 Ga. 720, 11 S. E. 893, distinguished.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 78½; Dec. Dig. § 76.*]

2. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES (§ 29*)—COMPENSATION—PAYMENT.

The act approved March 2, 1874 (Acts 1874, p. 365), construed in connection with existing laws, as prescribed in sections 3696, 3675 and 4631 of the Code of 1873, does not authorize the payment of "insolvent criminal costs" to sheriffs from funds in the county treasury derived from taxation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sheriffs and Constables, Cent. Dig. § 46; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

3. GRANTING WRIT OF MANDAMUS ABSOLUTE—ERROR.

Under the pleadings and evidence, the judgment granting a writ of mandamus absolute, compelling the county treasurer to pay insolvent criminal cost bills to the sheriff, was erroneous.

Error from Superior Court, Richmond County; B. F. Walker, Judge.

Application by John W. Clark, as Sheriff, for writ of mandamus to Walter A. Clark, as Treasurer of Richmond County. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

W. K. Miller and Salem Dutcher, for plaintiff in error. Wm. H. Barrett and E. H. Callaway, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. John W. Clark, as sheriff, applied for a writ of mandamus to compel Walter A. Clark, as treasurer of Richmond county, to pay him out of the county funds raised by taxation the sum of $1,141.40 for "insolvent criminal costs" recommended to be paid by a majority of the grand jury of Richmond county. The treasurer resisted the application on the ground, among others, that the plaintiff was not entitled to the relief sought. In support of his position, it was insisted that a special act approved September 16, 1881 (Acts 1880-81, p. 533), under which the plaintiff relied, was unconstitutional for a number of specified reasons, among them being that it violated article 1, § 4, par. 1, of the Constitution, which inhibits the adoption of special laws for which there is provision by an existing general law, as set forth in section 4631 of the Code of 1873 (now embodied, in substance, in Pen. Code 1910, §§ 1113, 1114); also, that another special act, approved March 2, 1874 (Acts 1874, p. 365), under which the plaintiff relied, was not to be construed within itself, or in connection with any other statute on the subject, as furnishing grounds for the payment of the plaintiff's insolvent criminal costs out of the general fund of the county. This act also was attacked as unconstitutional. The case was heard by the judge under the pleadings and an agreed statement of facts; and the writ was granted. The defendant excepted.

[1] 1. The act of 1881 (Acts 1880-81, p. 533), which was attacked as unconstitutional, provided: "Whenever at any term of the superior court of Richmond county a majority of the grand jury shall so recommend, the judge of the superior court shall grant to the clerk of said court and the sheriff of said county an order upon the county treasurer for the payment of any account for insolvent criminal costs so recommended to be paid, and it shall be the duty of the county treasurer of said county to pay the same out of any money in the treasury thereof; provided, nothing in this act shall be deemed or considered mandatory to the grand jury, but they shall have full discretion to recommend or not, as they see proper, the payment of said criminal insolvent costs." This act relates to the sheriff of one county only, and purports to make provision for payment of his "insolvent criminal costs" in a particular way. At the time of its adoption there was an existing general law which provided: "A person against whom a bill of indictment shall be preferred, and not found true by the grand jury, or who shall be acquitted by the petit jury of the offense charged against him or her, shall not be liable to the payment of the costs; and in all such cases, as also where persons liable by law for the payment of the costs shall be unable to pay the same, it shall and may be lawful for the officers severally entitled to such costs to present an account therefor to the judge of the court in which the said prosecutions were depending, which account being examined and allowed by him, it shall and may be lawful for said judge, by an order of said court, to authorize and direct the sheriff or clerk to retain for his own use, and to pay to the attorney or Solicitor General, and other officers of the court, the amount of their respective accounts, out of any moneys by him received for fines inflicted by the said court, or collected on forfeited recognizances." Code 1873, § 4631. This general law comprehended a plan for collection of "insolvent criminal costs" applicable to all the sheriffs in the state. Accordingly, the special act attempting to make provision for the collection of "insolvent criminal costs" applicable only to the sheriff of Richmond county, differing from that specified in the general law, was obnoxious to the Constitution, which inhibits the passage of special laws for which provision has been made by an existing general law. A case much in point is Atkinson v. Bailey, 135 Ga. 336, 69 S. E. 540. In the cases of Clark v. Reynolds, 136 Ga. 817, 72 S. E. 254, and Adam v. Wright, 84 Ga. 720, 11 S. E. 893, the acts assailed were held not to be in violation of the provision of the Constitution above mentioned; but each of the acts under consideration was adopted prior to the Constitution of 1877, and at a time when the Constitution did not contain such an inhibition.

[2] 2. Independently of the special act of 1881, it was contended on behalf of the sheriff that under authority of a special act approved March 2, 1874 (Acts 1874, p. 365), and other laws not designated, he was entitled to have his insolvent criminal costs paid out of funds in the hands of the treasurer. The act last mentioned was also attacked as unconstitutional; but, under a proper construction of the act, it does not apply to the case at hand, and accordingly the objection to the constitutionality of the act will not be considered. The act in full is as follows:

"An act to provide the mode of fixing the pay of the sheriff, clerk of the superior court, and bailiffs, for services in said court, so far as refers to the county of Richmond, and for other purposes.

"Section 1. Be it enacted, etc., that from and after the passage of this act, the compensation of the sheriff, clerk, and bailiffs, for services rendered in the superior court of Richmond county, shall be fixed by the judge of said court."

Section 2 repeals conflicting laws.

By its terms the act does no more than authorize the judge to "fix" the "pay" or "compensation" of the sheriff for services rendered in the superior court. Other existing laws, applicable alike to the sheriff of Richmond county and all other sheriffs of the state, provided fee bills in civil and criminal cases. Code 1873, § 3696. The fees specified were thus "fixed" by law, not by the judge. In civil cases they were payable by the parties cast in the suit. Code 1873, § 3675. In criminal cases they were payable as costs by the party convicted (Code 1873, § 4699), or, in other instances, out of the fines and forfeitures (Code 1873, § 4631), but in no case out of the general funds of the county raised by taxation. The special act of 1874 is to be construed in connection with these general laws. When so construed, whatever else might be said as to what "services rendered in the superior court," the act contemplated that compensation therefor should be "fixed" by the judge, and, from what source they should be paid after being so fixed, the act is not to be construed as authorizing the judge to fix the fees to which the sheriff might be entitled as his costs, provided for in the statutory fee bill, or to order that they be paid out of the county funds. The act approved December 12, 1862 (Acts 1862-63, p. 24), authorized payment to the sheriff out of any money in the treasury for summoning grand and petit jurors, and other extra services in attending upon the courts, as in the opinion of the judge might be reasonable and just; and the subsequent act approved December 13, 1871 (Acts 1871-72, p. 51), authorized payment to the sheriff out of special taxes to be levied by the county authorities for "services in relation to which existing laws provide no adequate compensation, or no compensation at all, and in all cases in which compensation is provided to be given by order of the judge of this state," on recommendation of the grand jury, such allowance to be in lieu of all other provisions for such officer, except his "regular fees prescribed by law." This latter act was repealed by another act approved March 2, 1874 (Acts 1874, p. 365). It was contended on the one hand that the act of 1871, referred to above, repealed the act of 1862, which was mentioned; and by the opposing side that, if such was the effect, the repeal of the act of 1871 by the act of 1874, last mentioned, restored the act of 1862. Whether it did or not is immaterial, and need not be considered, for the reason that neither the act of 1862 nor that of 1871 is to be construed as relating to payment of the sheriff's "insolvent criminal costs." They related to "extra services" and duties to be performed connected with the holding of the court, and are not to be construed as displacing the other statutes which prescribed fee bills for costs payable to the sheriff and the sources from which such costs were payable. Under such construction, neither the act of 1874, upon which the plaintiff relies as authority for collecting his bills, nor the other statutes on the subject, furnish authority for the collection of his insolvent criminal costs out of funds in the county treasury derived from taxation.

[3] 3. The bills which the sheriff sought to collect were for his "insolvent criminal costs," and for the reasons stated in the foregoing divisions of the opinion his claim of right to have them paid from the funds in the county treasury derived from taxation was unfounded. Accordingly, irrespective of any other question made in the case, the judge erred in granting the writ of mandamus.

INFANTS (§§ 87, 89*)—ACTIONS—SERVICE OF PROCESS—GUARDIAN AD LITEM.

The statute prescribing the character of service in suits where minors are interested or are parties does not strictly apply, where there is a seizure of property under foreclosure proceedings, and the minor whose property is seized makes the process in rem (otherwise final) mesne, by making the counter affidavit. The issue before the court is not made by service, but is made by seizure and the filing of the counter affidavit. In such case the absence of a prochein ami or guardian ad litem as a party is an irregularity, amendable before, and cured by, the verdict.

Error from City Court of Covington; W. H. Whaley, Judge.

Action by the Covington Buggy Company against L. R. Sams. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Rogers & Knox, for plaintiff in error. C. C. King, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. The plaintiff in error was the owner of an automobile, which he had repaired by defendant in error. He did not pay for the repairs, and the defendant in error foreclosed its lien as a mechanic against him for the sum of $30 for materials furnished and repair work on the automobile. He filed a counter affidavit, setting up that the amount sworn to be due was not due, and alleging that the plaintiff did not complete and perform its contract according to the agreement, and he had been thereby damaged in the sum of $50, and he also executed a replevy bond. When the issue thus made was called for trial, he was absent and not represented by attorney, and the jury found a verdict against him for $30, upon which a judgment was entered. During the same term he presented to the court a petition to set aside the verdict and judgment, alleging that he was a minor when the verdict and judgment were rendered, and had a statutory guardian (giving his name), and that this guardian was not served in the case or made a party thereto, and no guardian ad litem was appointed by the court. The judge's refusal to set aside the judgment is the error assigned.

Section 5565 of the Civil Code of 1910, requires that service upon minors under the age of 14 years shall be perfected personally on the minor, and, in cases where there is a statutory or testamentary guardian or trustee representing the interest of the minor to be affected by the legal proceedings, service must also be made upon such guardian or trustee; and if the minor is over 14 years of age, service may be made by delivering to him personally a copy of the writ. And it is further provided that, in the absence of guardian or trustee, it shall be the duty of the court to appoint for the minor a guardian ad litem, who must be made a party to the proceedings before the minor shall be considered a party. In the case of Miller v. Luckey, 132 Ga. 581, 64 S. E. 658, it was held that where suit is brought against a minor, and he is not personally served, a plea in abatement setting up the want of personal service should be sustained.

In this case it does not appear how old the minor was, whether over the age of 14 or not; but there is no allegation that he was not personally served with process. The contention is that his statutory guardian was not served, and not made a party to the suit, and no guardian ad litem was appointed by the court for him and made a party to the proceeding. In suits in personam the law as thus claimed would be applicable; but we do not think it applicable to a case such as the one now under consideration. Here was a proceeding in rem, to foreclose a mechanic's lien. It did not become a suit, in the technical sense of that word, until the defendant had made a counter affidavit; and until the counter affidavit was made and filed there was no case or suit pending in the court, no issue to be tried. There are two ways by which parties are brought before the court. One is, in suits in personam, by personal process, or in the case of minors by such process as the statute requires; and the other is where property is seized by process of court, and the proceeding is resisted by a claim to the property, or some issue in reference to the process by which the property is seized. Now, in this case the minor voluntarily made a counter affidavit. He made the proceeding, which otherwise would have been final, a meane process, on the suit pending, in which he was the substantial plaintiff, though not nominally so, for his counter affidavit was the beginning of the suit, in so far as the issue to be tried by the court was concerned. Giddens v. Gaskins, 7 Ga. App. 221, 66 S. E. 560. In other words, the issue was made and brought into the court by the minor by the filing of his counter affidavit. Now, the law in this state is well settled that a minor can bring suit or voluntarily intervene in a suit without any prochein ami or guardian ad litem, and a failure to have such a representative as a party is a mere irregularity, which, before verdict, is amendable, and is cured by the verdict. Civil Code 1910, § 5524, and decisions of the Supreme Court cited in Michie's Enc. Digest, p. 312.

The minor having brought or filed the suit by his counter affidavit and made the issue to be decided by the court, strictly speaking, should have been represented therein by his statutory guardian or guardian ad litem; and if the matter had been called to the court's attention, or to the attention of the other party, this formal requirement of the statute would doubtless have been complied with by proper amendment. But the minor, in his defense to the suit originally, did not disclose his minority. He silently permitted a judgment to be entered against him without disclosing the fact, and therefore the irregularity was cured by the verdict. For this reason we think the court very properly refused to set aside the judgment.

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. EVIDENCE (§ 373)—CONTRACTS.

The execution of a contract for advertising, on behalf of an ordinary mercantile corporation, purporting to be signed by one as general manager, is sufficiently proved to authorize its introduction in evidence, when it is shown that it was signed by the person purporting to have signed it, and that he was in fact the general manager of the corporation. Further, if the person so signing was not the general manager, but signed as such in the presence of the president of the corporation and with his knowledge and consent, the corporation is prima facie bound.

POWELL, J. The plaintiff (a corporation) sued another corporation upon an account for the furnishing of certain advertising service. In support of its case the plaintiff offered in evidence a written contract, purporting to be signed by one Satterwhite, as manager of the defendant corporation. A witness for the plaintiff swore that Satterwhite was manager, that he, in fact, signed the paper, and that one Mr. Reid was present and directed the signing. It was shown by aliunde testimony that Mr. Reid was the president of the defendant corporation. One of the defendant company's letter heads was in evidence, and on this letter head Reid appeared as president and secretary and Satterwhite as general manager.

[1] Upon proof, direct or circumstantial, that Satterwhite was general manager, and that he signed the contract, its execution as the act and deed of the corporation was at least prima facie proved. Raleigh & Gaston R. Co. v. Pullman Co., 122 Ga. 700, 50 S. E. 1008. If Satterwhite was not manager, but signed the contract on behalf of the corporation as such, and signed it in the presence of the president and under his direction, it would likewise have been, prima facie, the company's act. Phillips v. Hudson, 9 Ga. App. 779, 72 S. E. 178. It is true that Satterwhite and Reid were afterward put upon the stand by the plaintiff, and testified that Satterwhite was only a salesman in the defendant's place of business, and that he had signed the contract without any authority from the corporation, and that Reid was not present or consenting thereto. The fact that there is a conflict in the testimony of the witnesses introduced by the plaintiff is no reason for granting a nonsuit. The issue of fact, nevertheless, goes to the jury. This proposition has been so repeatedly stated by this court and the Supreme Court as to need no further elaboration here.

[2] The court erred in excluding the written contract, and, having erred in this respect, the judgment awarding a nonsuit must be reversed. Proctor & Gamble Co. v. Blakely Oil & Fert. Co., 128 Ga. 606, 57 S. E. 879.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by the Puffer Manufacturing Company against J. H. Rivers and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The Puffer Manufacturing Company sold the defendants a soda fount and apparatus for $530, of which sum the defendants paid $25 cash and $25 on delivery of the fount, executing for the balance a series of monthly promissory notes containing the usual clause that, in the event of default in the prompt payment of one note, the holder might at his option elect to treat the entire series as due and collectible. The defendants paid in all $150, and, on their refusal to pay the balance, the plaintiffs instituted suit in a justice's court on the five notes past due at that time, aggregating $75. The defendants pleaded that the consideration of the notes had totally failed in that the apparatus was utterly unsuited for the purpose for which it was bought. They further pleaded, by way of recoupment, that through leakage in certain parts of the apparatus they had sustained a loss of $50 worth of syrups and mineral waters. Judgment was asked for $100 against plaintiff for breach of contract, and also for $150 as the amount paid on the purchase price of the apparatus. On appeal to the superior court the jury found a verdict in favor of the defendants. Subsequently the plaintiff instituted suit on the other notes, by levying a purchase-money attachment on the apparatus. The defendants pleaded res judicata, and, on the trial of this issue, introduced the pleadings and the verdict and judgment in the former suit. There was no other evidence, and the judge thereupon directed the jury to return a verdict sustaining the plea of res judicata. The plaintiff excepts to this ruling.

Jos. D. Greene and Dorsey, Brewster, Howell & Heyman, for plaintiff in error. Thos. L. Bishop, for defendants in error.

RUSSELL, J. We think the court properly ruled in favor of the plea of res judicata. There was one entire contract between the parties, growing out of the purchase of a soda fount and apparatus, and the serial notes merely evidenced the time and manner of payment. When sued on one of the serial notes, it was proper to give in evidence, under a plea of total or partial failure of consideration, that one or more of the notes has been paid. Crouch & Son v. Spooner, 9 Ga. App. 695 (5), 72 S. E. 61. Likewise it would be relevant to show that there were other notes outstanding, not yet due or paid. The issue, therefore, on the first trial, was whether the soda fount and apparatus was worth more than the sum which had already been paid, namely, $150. The defendant contended that it was utterly worthless, and asked, not only a return of the amount paid, but also special damages in the sum of $100. The jury found a verdict in favor of the defendant, without allowing the special damages, thereby adjudicating necessarily one or the other of two things, to wit, that the soda fount and apparatus was worth either $150 or $250, and no more. If the jury believed that the defendant had really suffered the special damages sought to be recouped, and that under the charge of the court it could properly be allowed, then their verdict indicates that the soda fount and apparatus was worth in their belief $250, and no more. If no such special damage were allowed, then the verdict indicates that the apparatus was worth the sum already paid, namely, $150, and no more. This was the controversy between the parties, which the jury settled in favor of the defendant.

[1] A judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction is conclusive between the same parties and their privies as to all matters put in issue, or which under the rules of law might have been put in issue, in the cause wherein the judgment was rendered. Civil Code 1910, § 4336. Any conclusion which the court or jury must evidently have arrived at in order to reach the judgment or verdict rendered will be fully concluded. Kelly & Jones Co. v. Moore, 128 Ga. 683, 686, 58 S. E. 181. However, if the defendant had not pleaded the failure of consideration in the first case, thereby raising the question the principle of the case of Worth v. Carmichael, 114 Ga. 699, 40 S. E. 797, would have been applicable; and there would have been no estoppel.

The case at bar is very similar in principle to that of Kennedy v. McCarthy, 73 Ga. 346, in which an employé under contract for a year, with salary payable monthly, was discharged during the year, and, at the end of the first month thereafter, sued for the salary of that month. The employer defended on the ground of the incompetency of the employé, and claimed he had a right to discharge him. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff. Subsequently the employé sued for other months during the year, and the employer sought to interpose the same defense; but the court held that the decision in the first case was conclusive as to the same defense in the second. The only substantial difference between that case and this one is that here the shoe pinches the other foot. Here the seller held a lot of notes, all of which were parts of the same contract, and all of which were, at his option, due and collectible. He elects to sue merely on some of the notes, and the defendants assert a defense which goes to the very heart of the entire contract, and the issue terminates in their favor.

[2] Now, by instituting suit on other notes under the same contract, the plaintiff seeks to reopen the old controversy, and force the defendant again to assert the same defense of failure of consideration. If this could be done, then the plaintiff could have instituted a separate suit on every one of the 35 notes, and thus have forced the defendant to assert and prove the same defense as to every one of them. The law of res judicata is intended to put an end to litigation, and where one controversy between the same parties has been fully heard on the merits and determined, the matter should be dropped.

There was no error in directing a verdict in favor of the defendant.

Error from City Court of Nashville; J. G. Cranford, Judge.

Garnishment proceedings by W. W. Stovall & Bro. against W. D. Joiner, administrator. From a judgment dismissing the proceedings, plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

The plaintiff in fi. fa., through his attorney, made affidavit and bond for garnishment in ordinary form, and the process of garnishment issued thereon was served on the administrator of the deceased ancestor of the defendant in fi. fa. The administrator, at the first term thereafter, answered that the defendant was entitled to a share in the estate, the exact amount of which could not at that time be given, but would be set up thereafter. At a later term of the court the administrator moved to dismiss the garnishment proceedings, because the affidavit failed to allege that the defendant was insolvent, or that he was a nonresident, as required by Civil Code 1910, § 5304. Thereupon the plaintiff offered to amend the affidavit, by adding thereto the allegation that the defendant was insolvent. The court refused to allow the amendment, and sustained the motion to dismiss the garnishment proceedings.

Hendricks & Christian, for plaintiffs in error. Chastain & Gaskins and Alexander & Gary, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. 1. It is provided by Civil Code 1910, § 5706, that all affidavits that are the foundation of legal proceedings "shall be amendable to the same extent as ordinary declarations, and with only the restrictions, limitations and consequences now obtaining in the case of ordinary declaration and pleas." This provision of the law changed the rule as it previously existed into harmony with the statement of Judge Bleckley that in this state the doctrine of amendment is as broad as the plan of universal salvation. Ellison v. Georgia Railroad Company, 87 Ga. 691, 13 S. E. 809. The statute, being remedial in nature, is to be liberally construed, to the end that the vice aimed at may be fully cured. Levin v. American Furniture Co., 133 Ga. 670, 671, 66 S. E. 888. Any amendment which is aimed to make the affidavit conform to the actual conditions existing at the time of its making is in the interest of truth and justice, and should not be disallowed for purely technical objections not going to the merits of the controversy. Collins v. Taylor, 128 Ga. 789, 790, 58 S. E. 446. The failure to allege that the defendant was insolvent was necessary to confer jurisdiction on the court; and, in the absence of such an allegation, either originally or by way of amendment, before prejudice therefrom to the rights of third parties, the garnishment proceedings are void, and the court has no jurisdiction to render judgment against the administrator. National Lumber Co. v. Turner, 2 Ga. App. 750, 59 S. E. 15. Construing the foregoing Code section relating to the amendment of affidavits, however, in connection with section 5691, providing that the omission to give the court jurisdiction in the pleadings is amendable, it appears that the omission to give the court jurisdiction by the allegations of the original affidavit may be cured by amendment. By the former section affidavits are expressly made amendable in all respects like pleadings, and by the latter section pleadings are expressly made amendable by supplying facts conferring jurisdiction, from which it follows that affidavits are amendable by supplying necessary jurisdictional facts.

A case similar in principle to the case at bar is that of Johnson v. Johnson, 113 Ga. 942, 39 S. E. 311. There suit was brought in a justice's court upon a promissory note for $100 principal and 10 per cent. attorney's fees. Such a suit is not within the jurisdiction of that court; but nevertheless the Supreme Court held that the suit could be amended, so as to show that the amount really due upon the note at the time suit was begun was less than $100, inclusive of attorney's fees. The actual facts existing at the time the suit was brought made the case one within the jurisdiction of the court, and the omission of the pleader to set forth all these facts can be supplied by amendment. In the case at bar the actual facts existing at the time the garnishment suit was begun show that the plaintiff held an unsatisfied execution against the defendant, and that the garnishee held property belonging to the defendant which in justice ought to go toward the satisfaction of the execution, and that the defendant is insolvent. These facts give the court jurisdiction, and, under the law as we understand it, one of the facts, to wit, the insolvency of the defendant, can be supplied by amendment, which relates back and becomes a part of the original proceedings. Brumby v. Rickoff, 94 Ga. 429, 21 S. E. 232. To hold otherwise would be to go contrary to the whole policy of our law and to the evident purpose and intent of the statutes referred to above. If the suit as originally begun contains the skeleton, the meat may be put on the bones by way of amendment. Penn & Watson v. McGhee, 6 Ga. App. 635, 65 S. E. 686. We hold, therefore, that the court erred in refusing to allow the amendment, and in dismissing the garnishment proceedings.

1. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 155*)—MATERIAL FURNISHED—RECORDING OF CLAIM.

The recording of a materialman's claim of lien on the proper book in the office of the clerk of the superior court in the county where the property upon which the lien is claimed is situated, within three months after the material is furnished, substantially in the form prescribed by the statute, is a sufficient record, although the entry of filing and recording, and the actual inscribing of the claim of lien, may have been done by an employé of the clerk, charged specially with such clerical work in the office. It is the fact of record, and not the mere ministerial or mechanical act of recording, that is essential.

In the matter of the distribution of certain funds in the hands of the sheriff. From an order giving the fund to the Patillo Lumber Company, the Calhoun Brick Company brings error. Affirmed.

Thomas & King, for plaintiff in error. E. A. Stephens and Walter McElreath, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. The questions in this case arose on a rule against the sheriff for distribution of the fund in his hands realized from the sale of property under execution. There were two claimants of the fund; the Patillo Lumber Company claiming it under a materialman's lien, and the Calhoun Brick Company under a general execution. The judge, by agreement, heard the case without the intervention of a jury, and decided that the materialman's lien had priority.

It is admitted that if the materialman's lien was valid, it was entitled to priority of payment, and there was no contention that this claim of lien was not in due form, or that it was not recorded in the proper office on the proper book. But its validity is challenged on two grounds: First. Because the entry of filing and recording was not made by the clerk of the superior court, but was made by a clerk employed in his office and not in his presence; that the entry of filing and recording, as well as the recording of the claim of lien, was made by this employé, he writing the name of the clerk; that this clerk was employed in the office of the clerk of the superior court in doing the actual work of writing on the books of the clerk's office. Second. That the claim of lien was not filed for record in the office of the clerk, or recorded, within three months after the material had been furnished. The evidence showed that some of the material for which the lien was claimed was furnished within three months before the filing for record of the claim of lien, but it was insisted this material was not included in the material furnished in the original contract, but was extra material, ordered from time to time, and was not a part of the account, and therefore could not be included in the claim of lien. The judge found against this contention, holding that these items of the account constituted a part of the running account furnished from time to time under one and the same contract, and that the record of the claim of lien was made three months from the delivery of the material constituting several of these last items.

[1] 1. The recording of the materialman's claim of lien in the office of the clerk of the superior court in the county where such property is situated, within three months after such material is furnished, substantially in the form as designated in the statute, is legally sufficient. Civil Code 1910, § 3353, par. 2. A claim of lien must not only be filed for record, but must be recorded within three months after the material shall have been furnished, to meet the requirements of the statute. If the claim of lien is actually recorded on the proper book in the clerk's office, in so far as the record is concerned, the creation of the lien is established. Jones v. Kern, 101 Ga. 309, 28 S. E. 850. The omission of the clerk to enter the fact of the record on the original paper, if the record was actually made, would not invalidate or affect its regularity. Grice & Ryan v. Haskins, 73 Ga. 701. In other words, it is the fact that the claim is duly recorded in the proper office and on the proper book that is necessary, and it is immaterial whether the clerk himself, or some one in his office and in his employ, does the physical act of recording, for the writing of the lien upon the record is a mere ministerial or mechanical duty, and can be properly performed by any one employed in the office by the clerk who is charged with the duty of making such recordation. The act of recording does not require the exercise of any judgment or discretion on the part of the clerk. It is purely a mechanical or executive act, and can be delegated by the clerk to an employé in his office, unless this is expressly prohibited by statute. Mechem on Public Offices, § 567; Horton v. State, 120 Ga. 307, 47 S. E. 969. The decisions relied upon by counsel for the plaintiff in error relate to cases involving some act which the statute expressly requires shall be performed by the officer in person, or which necessitates the exercise of some judgment or discretion or to cases referring to the signing of something in the nature of judicial writs, such as the issuance of subpoenas, or executions, and official documents of like character. We think, therefore, that the learned trial judge very properly held that the claim of lien was valid, notwithstanding the fact that the entry of filing and recording had been made by an employé in the clerk's office who was specially charged with that work; the claim of lien having been duly recorded in the proper office on the proper book.

[2] 2. The second objection to the validity of the lien involves a question of fact, largely to be determined by an inspection of the items of the account, and there was ample evidence to sustain the finding on this point. The documentary evidence clearly showed that the claim of lien was recorded within three months from the delivery of some of the items of the material which constituted as a whole the claim of lien, and it is well settled that, if the recording was within three months from the delivery of the last item of the material constituting the lien, this requirement of the statute

The evidence is weak, contradictory, and unsatisfactory, but legally sufficient to authorize the inference of guilt.

2. INSTRUCTIONS.

When the judge's charge is considered in connection with the defendant's contentions as disclosed by the evidence, no sufficient reason for granting a new trial appears.

Perry, Foy & Monk, for plaintiff in error. J. H. Tipton, Sol., for the State.

PER CURIAM. Judgment affirmed.

RUSSELL, J. (dissenting). In the head-notes I have announced the conclusion of the majority of the court. Personally I am of the opinion that the plaintiff in error was entitled to a new trial, upon the assignment of error that the court failed to instruct the jury as to the degree of proof required where the conviction depends upon circumstantial evidence alone. I think that the jury should have been instructed that the guilt of the accused should have been manifest, to the exclusion of every other reasonable hypothesis save that of his guilt. I am aware that it is very difficult to fix the exact line of demarcation in many cases between direct and circumstantial evidence. To my mind, however, the inference of guilt which is authorized from the receipt of money, and the delivery shortly thereafter of intoxicating liquor, is purely circumstantial in its nature. I think, too, that the plaintiff in error rightly complains of the use of the word "purchaser" as descriptive of the person to whom the whisky was delivered, in view of the fact that the defense rested upon proof that there was no purchase at all, and that he was sent merely to bring to the person who was shown to have received the whisky his own property, which he had previously acquired from a different person. The phrase employed by the court (no doubt unintentionally, but in my opinion effectually) eliminated the defendant's defense.

BUTLER v. ATLANTA BUGGY CO.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Dec. 19, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 234)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—DEFECTIVE APPLIANCES—KNOWLEDGE OF SERVANT.

It appearing from the evidence in behalf of the plaintiff that, even conceding that his employer was guilty of negligence, as alleged in the petition, in furnishing him a defective instrumentality with which to do his work, yet his opportunities of discovering this defective condition were equal, if not superior, to those of the employer, and that this defective condition was patent to superficial observation, and was in fact observed by the plaintiff before he was injured by his voluntary use of the defective instrumentality, a nonsuit was properly granted.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by J. T. Butler against the Atlanta Buggy Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Butler sued the Atlanta Buggy Company for damages on account of personal injuries. The court overruled a demurrer to the petition, and after the introduction of testimony for the plaintiff, granted a nonsuit, and the latter judgment is here for review. The allegations of the petition are in substance as follows: Butler was an employé of the defendant as a woodworker, and had been so employed for over two years, and while he was at work endeavoring to saw a piece of wood with a rip or buzz saw furnished him by the defendant for that purpose, his left hand was jerked against the saw, and two of his fingers were cut off, and he was otherwise injured. He claims that the saw was not in a proper condition to be used, because several of the teeth were improperly set; that is, some of the teeth to the saw were bent more than the others. This defective condition caused the plank that he was pushing against the revolving saw to jerk back, and, when these imperfect teeth came against the plank, his hand was jerked against the saw. He did not know of the defective condition of the saw, and had no opportunity of discovering its defective condition before he used it, and he was not guilty of negligence in attempting to use it in this condition. The defendant had an employé whose duty it was to keep this saw in proper condition, and this duty had not been discharged, and an inspection by the defendant through this employé would have discovered this defective condition of the saw. It is alleged that the employer was negligent in failing to furnish the plaintiff with proper machinery with which to work; that in its improper and defective condition the saw was not a safe instrument for him to use at his work.

The plaintiff proved his employment, the nature of his work, and that several of the teeth of the saw he was using were set out more than the other teeth; that the defendant kept an employé whose duty it was to keep the machine and tools in proper condition, and that while he was attempting to use the saw, being ignorant of its defective condition, his hand was injured in being thrown against the saw; that at the time he received the injuries he was pushing a piece of plank about 18 or 20 inches long, 5 or 6 inches wide, and three-fourths of an inch in thickness, against the revolving saw, for the purpose of having it cut or ripped; that the plank lacked only about 5 inches of being sawed or ripped through, and while he was pushing the timber against the saw the piece of timber would rise up and not go through and it became necessary for him to put his hand around the saw to hold down the timber; that, just as he got the plank or piece of timber almost cut through, the saw raised or jerked the plank, and his hand was thus thrown against the saw and injured; that he was sawing the plank in the usual and proper way, and the reason the plank rode the saw and jerked his hand against it was "because one of the teeth of the saw, that was bent too far out, instead of going through the slot which had been sawed in the plank, struck the plank by the side of the slot," thus raising the plank up and throwing his hand against the saw. The saw was about 12 inches in diameter, and revolved towards the plank where the timber was pushed against it. It was set in a table having a steel top, and almost a half of the saw revolved above the surface of the table. The timber to be sawed was pushed along the surface of the table to the saw.

The plaintiff himself testified that he had been working as an employé of the defendant for about two years, and that in connection with this work he made constant use of the saw in question; that he was an experienced workman; that he did not notice the condition of the saw on the day of his injury, and was doing his work that day in the proper and usual way; that it was necessary for him to put his hand in front of the saw to hold the plank down, as it flew up, in order to get it through the saw; that it was a piece of hard oak timber; that he was using a guide or gauge for the purpose of having a straight line sawed, and that a guide would keep the line straight if it was a good one, but this guide "would just wobble about"; that it was not of any account, and this made crooked the line he was endeavoring to saw; that he saw the guide "wobble"; that there was no way to tighten it, and that he went on and did the best he could with the "wobbly guide," because he had not noticed its imperfect condition until after he had started sawing the plank; that he saw that one of the teeth was bent too far out, but could not tell upon which side of the saw the bent tooth was; that he discovered the condition of the saw on that day, and before he was injured, and he had not seen the saw since that day. A fellow workman who testified in behalf of the plaintiff described the manner in which plaintiff's injuries were received, about as detailed by the plaintiff, and testified as to the condition of the teeth of the saw, stating that he did not give the saw a close examination, but "just glanced at it, and saw that the teeth were irregular"; that he made a further examination of it after the injury occurred, and "it was in about as good condition as they generally run it."

Moore & Branch, for plaintiff in error.
Smith, Hammond & Smith, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). The evidence, even when considered most favorably for the plaintiff, fails to show that he successfully carried the burden which the law imposed upon him. It was incumbent upon him to prove, not only that the defendant was guilty of negligence as alleged in the petition, but that he himself was free from fault. The evidence leaves it doubtful whether the plaintiff's injuries resulted in fact from the defective condition of the saw as described. His fellow servant, who testified as to the condition of the saw, said that "it was in about as good condition as they generally ran it." If this was true, its defective condition could not have furnished a basis of negligence on the part of the defendant, in view of the fact that plaintiff was an experienced workman, and had been for over two years familiar with the saw as it was generally used by him in his work. But, even conceding that the saw was in a defective condition, and that it was the duty of the defendant to have had it inspected and to have remedied these defects, yet these things alone would not have entitled the plaintiff to recover. The law raises an implied warranty on the part of the master that he will keep and maintain the instrumentalities with which his employes are required to work free from any hidden defects so far as he knows of, or in the exercise of ordinary diligence can anticipate or discover. It also implies an agreement on the part of the servant to assume the risk of all dangers that are within his knowledge, or can be discovered by him in the exercise of ordinary diligence on his part. The obligation is mutual. The degree of diligence is the same, and, before a recovery can be had, the servant must show that the master violated his implied obligations, while he himself fully performed the obligation which the law imposed upon him. This principle is well settled and is universal, and this court, as well as the Supreme Court of Georgia, has made many decisions emphasizing the rule of mutual obligation which the law imposes upon both the employer and the employe. Some of these decisions pertinent to the facts of the case sub judice are Brown v. Rome Foundry Co., 5 Ga. App. 143, 62 S. E. 720; Attleton v. Bibb Manufacturing Co., 5 Ga. App. 777, 63 S. E. 918; Flury v. Hightower Box & Tank Co., 132 Ga. 300, 64 S. E. 72; Hendrix v. Vale Royal Mfg. Co., 134 Ga. 712, 68 S. E. 483; White v. Kennon & Co., 83 Ga. 343, 9 S. E. 1082; Ingram v. Hilton Dodge Lumber Co., 108 Ga. 197, 33 S. E. 961; Smalls v. Southern Ry. Co., 115 Ga. 137, 41 S. E. 492; Manchester Mfg. Co. v. Pope, 115 Ga. 542, 41 S. E. 1915; DeLay v. Southern Ry. Co., 115 Ga. 934, 42 S. E. 218; Worlds v. Georgia R. Co., 99 Ga. 283, 25 S. E. 646; Zipperer v. S. A. L. Ry. Co., 129 Ga. 387, 58 S. E. 872.

The whole law on the subject, however, is comprehensively and clearly contained in the two sections of the Civil Code of this state. Section 3130 of the Civil Code of 1910 declares that "the master is bound to exercise ordinary care * * * in furnishing machinery equal in kind to that in general use, and reasonably safe for all persons who operate it with ordinary care and diligence. If there are latent defects in the machinery, or dangers incident to an employment, unknown to the servant, of which the master knows or ought to know, he must give the servant warning in respect thereto." Section 3131 declares that "a servant assumes the ordinary risks of his employment, and is bound to exercise his own skill and diligence to protect himself. In suits for injuries arising from the negligence of the master in failing to comply with the duties imposed by the preceding section, it must appear that the master knew or ought to have known * * * of the defects or danger in the machinery supplied; and it must also appear that the servant injured did not know and had not equal means of knowing such fact, and by the exercise of ordinary care could not have known thereof." When we apply these sections of the Code, which simply embody well-settled principles of law, to the facts proved by the plaintiff, it is obvious that, even conceding that the master may have been negligent in furnishing to him a defective saw with which to do his work, it is also perfectly obvious that this defective condition was either actually or constructively known to the plaintiff. His own witness testified that he discovered the defective condition by a mere glance at the saw. The plaintiff was an experienced workman. He had worked with this identical saw repeatedly. He had been working with it that very day. According to his testimony he did actually notice that it "wobbled" and was not proceeding in its normal way. If his employé, by a glance, discovered that its teeth were deflected from their normal position, could not the plaintiff, when he was about to use it, and was actually using it, also have seen its defective condition, which he described, and which he says caused his injuries? Indeed, he must have seen it, because he fully described its condition, and testified that he did not see the saw for months after his injuries. His own evidence affirmatively shows that he not only had an equal opportunity with the master to discover the defective condition of the saw, but had a better opportunity than the master to make this discovery.

Learned counsel for the plaintiff insists that, as a general demurrer had been overruled, his right to recover, if he proved the allegations of his petition, was settled. But did he prove the allegations of his petition? The principal allegations of his petition, on proof of which alone he was entitled to recover, were that the saw was defective, that its defective condition was unknown to him, and that this condition could not have been known to him by the exercise of ordinary diligence and care. It was necessary for him to show these things, even after he had proved that the master was guilty of negligence in furnishing him a defective tool with which to work. But the evidence in his behalf utterly fails to show this. A faithful employé, who is injured in the zealous service of his master, is entitled to compensation for any injuries that he may receive, caused by his master's negligence, and which could not have been avoided by him in the exercise of ordinary care and prudence; and this court will not be diligent to detect the negligence of a faithful and zealous servant. But where that rule of justice, to wit, the rule of mutual obligation, is clearly violated by the failure of the servant, either through recklessness or negligence, to avail himself of his senses, aided by his experience, in discovering defects in the instrumentalities with which he is working, and which are discoverable even by a glance of the eye, and cannot possibly be hidden from the view of any one who looks at the instrumentality in the light of day, the zeal and fidelity of the servant is not sufficient to overcome such manifest negligence. A careful study of the evidence for the plaintiff, giving to it every reasonable inference that would support his claim to recover damages, leads us to the conclusion that the question of his negligence, under well-settled principles of law, was not even issuable, and the judge properly awarded a nonsuit.

On the trial of an accusation in a city court, the solicitor, after the accused had been arraigned and the jury stricken and sworn, but before any evidence was introduced, made a formal amendment to the accusation, which was not then objected to by the accused. Subsequently, when testimony was offered to prove the truth of the amendment, the accused objected to the evidence, and then made an oral demurrer to the amendment to the accusation. Held, the objection to the amendment came too late. If good at all, the objection should have been interposed when the amendment was offered, and not delayed until after testimony had been offered in support of the allegation covered by the amendment. The delay in making the objection to the amendment operated as a waiver thereof.

BROKERS (§ 46*) — COMMISSIONS — SALE BY OWNER—EVIDENCE.

An owner of real estate, by employing an agent to effect the sale thereof under a written contract under seal, does not preclude himself from selling it, provided he makes the sale in the utmost good faith, without any purpose to defraud the agent of his right to commissions under the contract. The fact that the contract provides that the agency created thereby is irrevocable for the term of three months is not of itself sufficient to prevent the owner from himself selling the property within that time, if he does so, as above stated, in the utmost good faith, to a person with whom the agent has had no prior negotiations relating to the sale or purchase of the property.

Action by J. W. Moore against C. D. May. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Hendricks & Christian, for plaintiff in error. J. P. Knight and W. G. Harrison, for defendant in error.

HILL, O. J. The sole question in this case arises on the following contract: "Georgia, Berrien County. Know all men by these presents, that I have this day appointed J. W. Moore my agent to negotiate the sale of the following lands [described]. I obligate myself to make warranty deeds to said lands to any party named by my said agent upon the payment of $700, payments to be made as follows: $100 cash; balance $100 quarterly at 8 per cent. interest from date. And I allow my said agent $100 as a remuneration for his services and expense in getting purchaser—all amounts he or they, the said agent, may contract for over and above the sum of $700. This agency is created for the term of three months, and is irrevocable. Witness my hand and seal this the 4th day of April, 1910. [Signed] C. D. May. [Seal.]"

Moore brought suit against May to recover his commission as real estate broker under the terms of this contract. He alleges that he found and obtained a purchaser for the lands described in the contract, who was willing, able to buy, and desirous to purchase said lands upon the terms and conditions set forth in the contract, and that the defendant was requested to execute a deed to the purchaser named, and he (plaintiff) tendered to the defendant the net purchase price for which the defendant had agreed to sell the described real estate, within the time designated by the contract; that the defendant refused to execute a deed to the purchaser, and refused to pay plaintiff his commission. He further alleges that the defendant, after making this contract and within three months from the making of the same, himself sold the described lands "to another party other than petitioner or any party named by him." The trial judge sustained a general demurrer, and dismissed the petition, and this judgment is here for review.

Section 3587 of the Civil Code of 1910, contains the following language: "The fact that property is placed in the hands of a broker to sell does not prevent the owner from selling, unless otherwise agreed." It is insisted by plaintiff in error that the contract was in terms exclusive and was substantially an agreement that the owner of the property who made the contract relinquished absolutely to the real estate broker for the term of three months his right to sell the real estate. In support of this contention this clause in the contract is relied upon: "This agency is created for the term of three months, and is irrevocable." It is said that the word "irrevocable" is equivalent in meaning to the word "exclusive," and that the intention of the maker of the contract in the use of this word was to give to the agent or real estate broker for the three months the sole right to sell the real estate; that neither the owner of the real estate nor any other agent had the right during the three months to make a sale of the real estate that would prevent the broker from recovering his commission.

We do not agree with this construction of the language of the contract. The word "irrevocable" simply means that the agent would have the three months in which to make the sale on the terms stipulated, and that during three months the agency was not revocable by the maker of the contract, and possibly that during the three months no other agent or real estate broker would have the right to sell the real estate described in the contract. We do not think that the language relied upon is sufficient to constitute an agreement by the owner surrendering his right to sell his property himself. The statute gave him this right, notwithstanding the contract, unless by the contract it was otherwise agreed. And the mere stipulation that the contract of agency was irrevocable was not sufficient to prevent the owner from the exercise of his right as owner, unless clearly expressed to the contrary, to make a personal sale of his property. In the case of Kidman v. Howard, 18 S. D. 161, 99 N. W. 1104, it was held that the contract conferring agency to sell real estate, which contained the clause that the agency was to exist until the property therein described was sold by the agent, did not exclude the right of the owner of the real estate personally to make a sale of the property; and it has been frequently held that the owner of real estate, by employing a real estate agent or broker to effect the sale of property, does not preclude himself from employing other agents for the same purpose, or from effecting a sale himself, provided that in making the sale himself he acts in good faith; "good faith" meaning that the owner would not be allowed, after making a contract with a real estate broker, to avail himself of the broker's services, where the broker had procured a purchaser, and to effect the sale himself, thereby depriving the broker of his commission. The agent is entitled to his commission "when, during the agency, he finds a purchaser ready, able, and willing to buy, and who actually offers to buy on the terms stipulated by the owner." Civil Code (1910), § 3587. But if, before the broker finds a purchaser, the owner himself sells the property to a person with whom the broker has had no negotiations relating to the property, and the broker has had nothing to do with procuring the purchaser to whom the owner has sold, and the owner has acted entirely in good faith, and not endeavored in any manner to defraud the broker in reference to the contract, the agent would not be entitled to his commission. Gresham v. Connally, 114 Ga. 906, 41 S. E. 42; Mechem on Agency, § 967.

In this case there is no allegation of bad faith by the owner of the property in connection with the sale. On the contrary, it is alleged that the owner sold the property to another party, and not to the party found or named by the broker. We therefore conclude that the judgment of the lower court must be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

Where the act of the employé in committing the homicide was one for which the master was not responsible, because it was an individual personal act of the employé, not within the scope of his employment, the fact that the employé was of high and ungovernable temper and habitually carried a pistol, would be wholly immaterial and irrelevant. The test for determining a master's liability for an act of the servant is not the servant's bad disposition or vicious habits, but whether the act was within the scope of his employment and was connected with the prosecution of the master's business.

Action by Pearl Hudson against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Hudson was a night yard conductor of the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company, whose duty it was, among others, to receive cars delivered by a connecting carrier to the railroad. Jackson was a night engineer, employed by the defendant railroad companies, to wit, the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company and the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, as lessees, and it was his duty among others, to deliver the cars of his employer to the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company. On November 1, 1909, at night, Jackson, in the discharge of his duties, delivered 23 cars to the last-named company in its yards in Richmond county. When Jackson and his crew reached the yards for the purpose of making a delivery of these cars, he asked Hudson where he wanted the cars placed, and Hudson replied, "On track No. 1." When Jackson called the switchman on that track, Hudson signaled Jackson to stop, whereupon the conductor who was with Jackson and his crew signaled Jackson to go ahead, and Jackson endeavored to move the line of cars. He could not move them, and, seeing that he could not do so, requested his fireman to get down and help him find out the trouble, and both Jackson and his fireman got down off of the engine, and began to inspect and examine the cars for the purpose of finding out the trouble. They claimed that the air was "cut out," and Jackson accused Hudson of cutting it out. Hudson replied that he knew nothing of it, and that, if Jackson said that he did it, he lied. Immediately Jackson jumped on his engine, got a revolver out of his box, and wrongfully, willfully, and unlawfully shot Hudson, killing him almost instantly.

Suit was brought to recover for this homicide, on two grounds: (1) That Jackson in committing the homicide was acting within the scope of his duty as the agent of his employer, the railway company, and that the act was committed by him while he was in the actual performance of and in connection with the discharge of his duties as such employé, and therefore that the railway companies were responsible for this tort of their agent; and (2) that Jackson was an unfit and improper person to act as an engineer; that he habitually carried a pistol while on duty, had an ungovernable temper, and was an incompetent man to discharge the work of an engineer, was a dangerous man, who was apt to use his pistol without provocation or justification, and did use it many times while in the employ of the defendants, and these facts were fully known to the defendant railway companies, who, notwithstanding, employed him and continued to keep him in their employment. A general demurrer filed to the petition was overruled, and the case came to this court on exception to that judgment.

Jas. B. & Bryan Cumming and J. M. Hull, Jr., for plaintiff in error. A. L. Franklin, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). The courts generally have found some difficulty in holding the master liable for a homicide intentionally committed by his servant, in the absence of any express command on the part of the master, and the majority of adjudications seem to favor the theory that in the absence of express authority the master is not liable in damages for the deliberate, intentional, and willful homicide committed by his servant. 1 Thomp. Neg. § 571. But, whatever may be the adjudications in other jurisdictions on this subject, it is settled by the statute law of this state that the master would be liable where the homicide was committed by the servant in the prosecution and within the scope of the master's business, whether it was actually committed by the command of the master, or was the result of negligence on the part of the servant, or his voluntary act.

[§] Civil Code, § 4413, provides that "every person shall be liable for torts committed by his servants by command, or in the prosecution or within the scope of his business, whether the same be by negligence, or voluntary." And section 2780 declares that "a railroad company shall be liable * * * for damage done by any person in the employment or service of such company, unless the company shall make it appear that their agents were in the exercise of reasonable care and diligence, the presumption in all cases being against the company." A corporation, under the law, is a "person," in the meaning of the first section quoted, and the terms of the section apply to corporations as well as to natural persons, and the principle of law there announced is well settled by the adjudications of the courts. The difficulty is in the application of the general principle of law to the particular facts. In the great multitude of decisions made by the courts, applying the facts of the cases to the principle of law just announced, there is found much diversity of opinion and room for doubt; and, after all, the solution of the question is to be determined largely by the facts of each particular case, aided by the very best judgment of the court in making the application of the principle to those facts.

The master is not an insurer against wrongs perpetrated by his servants. It would be unjust to hold him responsible for these wrongs, unless they were done by his servant while he was in the performance of his master's business and was acting within the scope of his employment. The rule of liability in the case is based upon the old maxim, "Qui facit per alium, facit per se." and if the servant, instead of doing that which he is employed to do, does something which he is not employed to do at all, and the act is not properly within the scope of his employment, it cannot be said that the master does the act by his servant. Mr. Thompson, in his work on Negligence (section 526), lays down the test by which to determine whether a servant acts within the scope of his employment. "The test is not that the act of the servant was done during the existence of the employment, that is to say, during the time covered by the employment, but whether it was done in the prosecution of the master's business; whether the servant was at that time engaged in serving his master, for, if the servant steps aside from his master's business for however short a time, to do an act not connected with such business, the relation of master and servant is for the time suspended, and the servant alone is responsible for his act committed by him during this period." In the case of Savannah Electric Company v. Hodges, 6 Ga. App. 470, 65 S. E. 322, Judge Russell, speaking for this court, quoted approvingly the foregoing test of liability of the master for the servant's act, and held that "if the servant steps aside from his master's business, for however short a time, to do an act entirely disconnected from it, and injury results to another from such independent voluntary act, the servant may be liable, but the master is not liable."

[1] The decision of this court in the case just cited would seem to control the case now under adjudication, for the facts of the two cases are not so different as to afford substantial room for any different application of the rule of law. The question here to be decided, under this rule of law, is whether the killing of Hudson by Jackson was done by Jackson in the prosecution or furtherance of his employer's business, or whether in the killing Jackson turned aside from his master's business and committed an act wholly disconnected therefrom, and for the consequences of which he, and not his master, would be liable. While repeated adjudications in analogous cases leave the solution of this question not entirely free from doubt, still it seems to us, restricting our view to the facts of this transaction, and not looking beyond, or permitting ourselves to become perplexed in the maze of contradictory rulings, that we should adopt, as the most reasonable conclusion, the view that when Jackson committed this homicide he had turned aside for that purpose from his master's business and was engaged in his own personal matter. Jackson made, against Hudson, an implied accusation of improper conduct. Hudson resented this accusation by in effect denouncing Jackson as a liar, and Jackson immediately ran to his box on the engine, secured his pistol, and instantly shot and killed Hudson. He shot Hudson, because Hudson called him a liar. It was to resent what he deemed a personal insult. He did not shoot and kill Hudson because in his opinion Hudson had been guilty of cutting off the air brakes and thus interrupting him in the proper discharge of his official work; and, even if he had done this, it is not clear that the master would have been liable. But the killing was due solely to an insulting epithet used by Hudson. Jackson was acting for his master in delivering the cars to the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company, and if Hudson had interfered with this work, and Jackson had resented such interference, and made an assault and battery, or killed Hudson for such interference, it might be claimed that the tort was committed by Jackson in connection with his master's business; but it cannot be doubted that the killing of Hudson was due solely to the insulting epithet, and that but for it the homicide would not have occurred. If the truth of this proposition is not sufficiently apparent from the mere statement of the facts, we are sure it cannot be rendered any more manifest by argument, or by citation of authority. We therefore do not deem it profitable to extend the discussion on this point. See Henderson v. Dade Co., 100 Ga. 568, 28 S. E. 251, 40 L. R. A. 95.

The cases relied upon by counsel for defendant in error (Savannah Electric Co. v. Wheeler, 128 Ga. 550, 58 S. E. 38, 10 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1176, and Mason v. Nashville, Chattanooga, & St. Louis Ry. Co., 135 Ga. 741, 70 S. E. 225, 33 L. R. A. [N. S.] 280) are distinguishable by the facts from the present case. Both of these were cases of passengers where the rule of extraordinary diligence applies, and the master is under a duty through his agents of personally protecting the passenger from any insult, either by one of his own employees or by third persons. In the Wheeler Case the conductor drew a pistol and fired at a passenger, missing the passenger and killing an innocent woman passing on a public street through which the car was running, because the passenger had asked the conductor for his change. The Supreme Court held that this tort of the conductor was within the scope of his business in collecting fares. The Mason Case was where the passenger was drunk and disorderly, and used foul and abusive language to the conductor, which brought on a difficulty, and the conductor was in the discharge of his duty in attempting to eject the disorderly passenger. The case was decided in favor of the company by the lower court, and the Supreme Court granted a new trial on a ground not involving the question in the present record. Mr. Justice Lumpkin, in the opinion in the Mason Case, reviews many previous decisions of the Supreme Court relating to the liability of railroad companies for the conduct of their employees, and modifies to some extent the rulings previously made. But there is nothing in the opinion in support of the proposition that the master in the present case was liable for the act of the engineer in killing the decedent.

[2] If the act of the engineer in the present case was, as we have held, his personal act, and not one for which the master was responsible, it would be wholly immaterial, on the question of the master's liability, whether the servant was of ungovernable temper, or habitually carried a pistol while on duty. If the master was liable because the act was performed by the servant within the scope of his employment, the employee's temper, or unfitness, or the fact that he carried a pistol with the master's knowledge, might be circumstances to be considered on the question of exemplary or punitive damages; but these facts of themselves cannot make the master liable for an act done by his servant outside the scope of his employment and for which the master is not otherwise responsible. In other words, we do not think that the fitness, or the temperament or disposition, of the employé, or his private habits, are material facts to be considered, except on the question of aggravation, where the master is otherwise liable for the act of the servant.

For the foregoing reasons, we think the demurrer to the petition should have been sustained by the lower court.

Judgment reversed.

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1023*)—FINAL JUDGMENT—RIGHT TO APPEAL.

An order refusing to allow a demand for trial in a criminal case to be spread upon the minutes of the court is not such a final judgment as will support a bill of exceptions.

Error from City Court of Reidsville; E. C. Collins, Judge.

S. I. Sharpe was indicted for misdemeanor. From an order refusing a demand for trial at the second term after indictment found, he brings error. Affirmed.

H. H. Elders, for plaintiff in error. Robt. E. De Loach, Sol., for the State.

RUSSELL, J. The defendant, under indictment for a misdemeanor, made a demand for trial at the second term after the indictment was found. The judge refused to allow the demand, and from the order refusing to allow the demand, the defendant sued out a bill of exceptions.

We are of the opinion that the bill of exceptions is premature. The remedy of the defendant was to except pendente lite, and then assign error in a bill of exceptions sued out from the final judgment. Couch v. State, 28 Ga. 64; Civil Code 1910, § 6138. Even if the demand had been allowed, that would not have been a final disposition of the case, for it would only have entitled the defendant to a trial at that term or at the subsequent term, provided that at both terms there were juries impaneled and qualified to try him. Penal Code 1910, § 983. It does not appear that the refusal to allow the demand has harmed the defendant. Harm from such refusal cannot be shown until after the expiration of the next succeeding term thereafter; for, even though the demand be refused, he may nevertheless be tried within the time which the state would have had, if the demand had been allowed.

The case of Dacey v. State, 15 Ga. 286, which apparently announces a contrary doctrine, was decided prior to the Code of 1863, at which time our present law limiting the Supreme Court to the review of final judgments first came into existence. Prior to that time the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court as to bills of exceptions was not confined to a final, or a conditionally final, adjudication in the lower court, as it is now. As to the original act of 1845 organizing that court (Acts 1845, p. 18), it was said: "This grant of jurisdiction was designed to be and is very broad. It attaches upon any decision, sentence, judgment, or decree which may be had before the superior courts in any case, criminal or civil. Unlike the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States, it is not confined to final judgments. It contemplates unquestionably writs of error upon interlocutory judgments." Carter v. Buchanan, 2 Ga. 338; Jones v. Dougherty, 11 Ga. 308. By comparing the decision cited above with the present law, it appears that our jurisdiction is limited to bill of exceptions sued out from final judgments. An order refusing to allow a demand for a trial to be spread upon the minutes is not a final judgment.

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 762*)—INSTRUCTIONS—EXPRESSION OF OPINION.

On a criminal trial the judge cautioned the jury as to certain testimony which he had admitted in evidence, as follows: "The evidence of Mr. Killebrew as to certain statements made to him by James Brown cannot be considered by you in determining the question of whether or not the defendant is guilty, but can only be considered by you for the purpose of determining whether or not the witness has been impeached." The following portion of this charge, viz.: "The evidence of Mr. Killebrew as to certain statements made to him by James Brown"—is not subject to the criticism that it was an expression or intimation of opinion by the court as to what had been testified in such case.

2. HOMICIDE (§ 236*)—CAUSE OF DEATH—EVIDENCE.

Where one is charged with a homicide, proof that the homicide as charged was actually committed by him must be clear and unequivocal. Yet this fact can be proved by circumstances, and by inferences reasonably deducible from the facts in evidence, as well as by direct testimony. In this case the evidence was clear that the accused struck the decedent a blow with a deadly weapon, and the jury were authorized, although there was no expert testimony, and death did not result until several days thereafter, to find that the homicide was caused by the blow inflicted by the accused with the deadly instrument.

The statutory presumption of negligence, raised by proof that the plaintiff's cow was killed by the running of the locomotive and cars of the defendant railroad company, was fully rebutted by the undisputed evidence; and, other than the presumption, there was no evidence whatever of negligence. The evidence that the accused on four separate and distinct occasions procured whisky for four separate persons is not disputed. Whether in each case he carried the burden which the law imposed upon him of showing to the satisfaction of the jury that the unknown negro from whom he said he bought the whisky was the seller, and that he himself acted simply as a matter of accommodation to the purchasers and as their agent, and had no interest otherwise in the sale, or whether this defense was resorted to as a subterfuge to cover up the illegal sales made by himself, or in which he had some interest, were matters to be determined by the jury, and the conclusion at which they arrived seems to have been fully supported by circumstances and reasonable deductions therefrom.

The defendant was making a statement to the jury, under Penal Code 1910, § 1036. Instead of talking about the matter in issue and things relating to the case on trial, he went into a long and rambling statement concerning a number of wholly irrelevant matters. After he had thus been indulged for a great length of time, and while he was speaking of a matter wholly foreign to the issue involved in the case on trial, the judge interrupted him and said to him: "Mr. Jordan, the law allows you great latitude in making your statement; but I cannot permit you to go into matters wholly at variance with your case, and not connected with the case. What has cross-ties, or Mr. Simmons, or Christmas dinners, to do with the case? I beg of you to confine yourself to matters connected with the issues involved. 5. WORDS AND PHRASES—"JEWELRY."

Articles of jewelry have been generally defined by the courts to be such articles as are made of precious metal, silver, gold, diamonds, sapphires, rubies, pearls, etc. (citing 4 Words & Phrases, 3811).

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; W. D. Ellis, Judge.

Action by William Fine & Bro., against the Southern Express Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

C. B. Rosser, Jr., for plaintiff in error. Robert C. and Phillip H. Alston, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. William Fine & Bro. (engaged in the novelty jewelry business in Atlanta, Ga., and Chattanooga, Tenn., under the name of the Radius Jewelry Company) delivered a package containing 145 articles of their novelty jewelry to the Southern Express Company in Atlanta for transportation and delivery to the Radius Jewelry Company in Chattanooga, under a contract made with the express company. The package was lost by the express company, and the shipper brought suit against it in a justice's court to recover the value of the contents of the package. The justice rendered a judgment for the defendant, and, on appeal to a jury in the justice's court, a verdict was returned for the plaintiffs for the proved value of the contents of the package—$46.20—with interest. The case was taken by certiorari to the superior court, which, on the hearing, sustained the certiorari, and set aside the verdict and the judgment rendered thereon, and entered up a final judgment in favor of the express company; and to this the plaintiffs excepted.

On the trial in the justice's court the plaintiffs proved the contract of shipment made with the express company, and the delivery to it of the package containing the 145 articles specified, to be transported to Chattanooga and there delivered to the Radius Company, proved the value of the contents of the package, and proved that the package was lost while in the possession of the express company. Indeed, there was no substantial controversy on the evidence, and it would seem that the verdict in behalf of the plaintiffs was demanded. Counsel for the express company submits to this court four legal reasons, covered by the petition for certiorari, in support of the contention that the verdict against the express company was contrary to law: (1) That the justice's court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the suit, the same sounding in trover, and not in contract; (2) that, the proposition involved being solely one of law, the magistrate, on the hearing of the appeal in the justice's court, should have directed a verdict in favor of the defendant; (3) that, the freight charge of 25 cents never having been paid, the verdict for the full amount of the goods, to wit, $46.20, was without evidence to support it; (4) that, this being a shipment of jewelry, and the nature of the shipment not being disclosed to the express company, and it being offered through the ordinary freight channels instead of the money department, the shipper committed a constructive fraud upon the Southern Express Company, which would prevent them from recovering.

We do not know upon which one of these grounds the learned judge of the superior court sustained the certiorari and entered up final judgment in favor of the express company. It is stated in the argument, and in the brief of counsel submitted to this court, that he did so on the ground that the suit was ex delicto, and the justice's court was without jurisdiction. The judgment of the superior court, however, is general, and, if for any reason it is right, it should be affirmed without reference to the ground upon which it was based. We cannot agree with the judge of the superior court in his conclusion upon any ground that we have been able to find in the record. On the contrary, we are clear that under the undisputed evidence and the well-established principles of law applicable thereto the Southern Express Company was liable to the plaintiffs for the value of the contents of the package, and that the verdict in their favor was right. Indeed, the reasons in support of the judgment of the superior court are in our opinion so manifestly without merit as hardly to justify any extended consideration. But, since they are made and earnestly insisted upon, we will briefly consider them.

[1] 1. It is well settled that in a justice's court technical pleading is not required. In the present case, however, the plaintiffs, by formal petition, set forth their cause of action. An examination of this petition shows that in form and substance it is a suit on a contract, alleging a breach of that contract, and suing for the value of the goods which were to be delivered by the defendant under the contract, and which were lost to the plaintiffs by reason of defendant's breach of contract, and that the plaintiffs expressly waive any tort. The only ground upon which the defendant supports its view that the case was one ex delicto is the allegation in the petition that the defendant "failed, neglected, and refused to deliver said package to the consignee as aforesaid, and has likewise failed and refused to pay the value thereof to plaintiffs, although often requested so to do." It is insisted that this is a direct charge of a conversion of the property intrusted to the Southern Express Company, and therefore that the suit was in the nature of trover. We do not agree with this construction of this part of the petition. The language used is, in our opinion, clearly susceptible of the construction that it charges a breach of contract. If there was any doubt as to the construction of the petition, it was the duty of the justice's court to adopt the construction which would hold the action and not defeat it. This rule applies especially to suits in a justice's court, and especially where the question of jurisdiction is not raised by demurrer. Payton v. Gulf Line Ry. Co., 4 Ga. App. 762, 62 S. E. 469; Central Railroad Co. v. Pickett & Blair, 87 Ga. 734, 13 S. E. 750. But we think this suit is so clearly one arising ex contractu that there is no reason why this rule of construction should be invoked. The plaintiffs in their petition set forth the contract, charge a breach thereof, allege the value of the goods and the refusal to pay, distinctly declare their purpose to waive any tort and to sue on the contract, and, under the express provision of the Constitution of this state (article 6, § 7, par. 2), the justice's court had jurisdiction of the amount claimed; it not exceeding $100. Southern Express Co. v. Hilton, 94 Ga. 450, 20 S. E. 126; Bates v. Bigby, 123 Ga. 729, 51 S. E. 717; Southern Express Co. v. Briggs, 1 Ga.

App. 300, 57 S. E. 1066; Jenkins v. Seaboard Air Line Ry. Co., 3 Ga. App. 381, 59 S. E. 1120; Southern Ry. Co. v. Maddox, 7 Ga. App. 650, 67 S. E. 838.

[2] 2. The second reason asserted in support of the soundness of the judgment of the superior court is that, the proposition involved being solely one of law, the magistrate should have directed a verdict when the case was appealed to a jury in the justice's court. We do not know of any law which would authorize a magistrate to direct a verdict in a justice's court. But, if there were such a rule of law, we are certain that if the magistrate had directed a verdict for the defendant in this case, under the admitted facts, it would have been a gross abuse of his discretion, as, in our opinion, the undisputed facts demanded a verdict for the plaintiffs.

[3] 3. The contention that the verdict for $46.20 was too large and was without any evidence to support it, because the defendant was entitled to at least a deduction from this amount of 25 cents due to it as freight charges, is without any merit. If it was meritorious, the amount of 25 cents could be directed to be written off from the amount of the judgment. But we are somewhat at a loss to understand why the express company should have been entitled to its freight charges when the evidence showed that it had failed to perform its contract of transportation. The package was lost, and not delivered in a partially damaged condition. It was totally lost, presumptively by the negligence of the company, and the presumption was not conclusively met. It would be a remarkable proposition of law that, under these facts, the plaintiffs would not be entitled to recover the proved value of their property which had been lost by such negligence, because they had failed to pay the freight charges. Wilensky v. Central Ry. Co., 136 Ga. 889, 72 S. E. 418, and cases cited. Besides, this question of freight charges was not raised in the justice's court on the trial, and could not properly have been raised in the superior court or this court. Civ. Code 1910, § 5199; Perry v. Brunswick & Western Ry. Co., 119 Ga. 819, 47 S. E. 172; Callaway v. City of Atlanta, 6 Ga. App. 354, 64 S. E. 1105.

[4] 4. It is insisted in the fourth ground that the plaintiffs could not recover because in shipping the package in the ordinary freight department and not in the money department, and in not disclosing its contents to the express company, they were guilty of constructive fraud upon the express company. Under the facts of this case, we do not think that the plaintiffs perpetrated upon the express company any fraud, actual or constructive. What are the facts? The plaintiffs, who were merchants in Atlanta, were in the habit of frequently shipping articles of merchandise through the express company, and for this purpose used the printed blank receipt generally in use by the customers of the express company. The package in this case was sent to the express company by a colored porter. It was an ordinary pasteboard shoe box, wrapped in heavy brown paper, securely fastened with a string, and marked: "Radius Jewelry Company, 722 Market Street, Chattanooga, Tennessee." The receipt for the package to be signed by the company was, according to the general custom among the merchants of the city, prepared by the plaintiffs. The agent of the defendant signed this receipt and delivered it to the plaintiffs' agent, with the freight charge, 25 cents, entered thereon, and with the following additional entry stamped thereon with a rubber stamp: "Value asked, but not given. Accepted at owner's risk of breakage. Accepted as merchandise only. No money, jewelry, or valuables." The package contained 145 articles of merchandise or novelty goods, the same class of goods that are sold by dry goods stores, retail hardware stores, ten cent stores, drug stores, cigar and soda water stores. The receipt limited the liability of the express company in case of loss or damage to $50. The value of the goods shipped in this case was claimed to be $46.20, and proved to be of that value. The defendant knew the character of novelties or merchandise that the plaintiffs were dealing in. It accepted this package as merchandise, and made the minimum charge of 25 cents for it as merchandise, and the limit of its liability for merchandise, where the value is not stated, is $50. Whether the package contained jewelry in the technical sense, or whether it contained merchandise, the express company could in no event have been liable for more than $50. This fact was known to the shipper. Nothing was said or done by the plaintiffs to deceive the express company as to the contents of the package, and no effort is made by the shipper to recover more for the property than if the property had been in fact merchandise. It seems to us, therefore, that the question of whether the contents of the package were in fact valuable jewelry or merchandise was immaterial. The plaintiffs are endeavoring to recover for it, not as valuable jewelry, but simply as merchandise. The facts of this case do not bring it within the principles decided in Southern Express Co. v. Pope, 5 Ga. App. 689, 63 S. E. 809. In that case it was represented to the express company at the time of the shipment that the package was of the value of $5, and on this amount the express charge of 25 cents was paid. The shipper afterwards claimed that the package contained a valuable pearl pendant worth $150, and sought to recover the value of this pearl from the express company. The shipper having endeavored to conceal the true value of the contents of the package, this court held that such fraud was perpetrated upon the express company as would preclude a recovery of the value of the pearl, and that this fraud absolutely voided the contract. Besides, it does not appear from the evidence in this case that the package shipped as merchandise was anything else than merchandise. There were 145 articles. The aggregate value was $46.20. The articles, according to the evidence, were combs, purses, plated rings, Ingersoll watches, barlow knives, goods such as are sold by dry goods stores, retail hardware stores, drug stores, and the like. We think it was fairly open to question whether these articles were jewelry in the ordinary acceptation of that term; and we think they were in fact merchandise.

[5] Articles of jewelry have been generally defined by the courts to be such articles as are made of precious metal, silver, gold, diamonds, sapphires, rubies, pearls, etc. 4 Words & Phrases, p. 3811.

Fraud must never be presumed. It must be proved. Civ. Code 1910, § 4626. And while we do not think that under the undisputed facts of this case any fraud, either actual or constructive, was perpetrated on the express company by the shippers, certainly the most that could be claimed by the express company was that the evidence as to fraud was in conflict; and, as the question was squarely made and decided by the jury on the trial, the issue was settled by the verdict. To sum up the case we find no error of law, material or technical, in the case as presented to the superior court on certiorari, and the verdict in behalf of the plaintiffs under the undisputed evidence was demanded.

For these reasons, the judgment of the superior court in sustaining the certiorari and entering final judgment in favor of the express company was contrary to law.

Judgment reversed.

FLETCHER v. YOUNG et al. (No. 3,274.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Dec. 19, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PAYMENT (§ 67*)—EVIDENCE—GIVING OF NOTE BY CREDITOR.

The execution of a promissory note is evidence of a full settlement of all debts up to the date thereof, except such as are specially excepted at the time; and, where the maker sues the payee for a debt alleged to be due before the execution of the note, the giving of the note to the payee is presumptive evidence that he had paid the debt to the maker before or when the note was executed. This presumption can be rebutted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. §§ 189-198; Dec. Dig. § 67.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1051*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

The admission of secondary evidence is not generally ground for reversal, where otherwise there is sufficient legal evidence in proof of the fact to which the secondary evidence relates.

3. PAYMENT (§ 77*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the plea of payment is made, and there is evidence to support the plea, it is not erroneous to charge in effect that if the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant in fact paid the debt to the plaintiff the time and place when and where he had paid it are immaterial. Evidence of the time and place of payment might add probative value to the proof relied upon to establish the plea, but the act of payment is the essential fact to be shown.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Dec. Dig. § 77.*]

4. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—NO ERROR.

The evidence and inferences reasonably deducible therefrom were sufficient to raise the presumption that the debt sued for, if it ever existed, had in fact been paid by the defendant; and, no error of law appearing, the verdict in his behalf must stand.

Error from City Court of Ocilla; H. E. Oxford, Judge.

Action by T. Y. Fletcher against Love Young and another, as administrators of George Young. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Fletcher brought suit against Love Young and W. W. D. Branch, as administrators of George Young, alleging that on May 15, 1902, he and George Young signed, as sureties, the note of one J. B. Harris for $2,000; that Harris died without paying the note, and that subsequently he paid the note to the Bank of Tifton, and that by reason of this payment his cosurety, George Young, became indebted to him in the sum of $1,000, with interest from time of payment; that on December 6, 1908, George Young died without having paid him any part of the $1,000, and this suit was for the purpose of enforcing contribution. The defendants filed an answer, setting up that if any liability ever existed against their intestate, as surety upon the note sued on, the liability had been paid off and discharged by him during his lifetime, and that the defendants, as administrators, did not owe the plaintiff any amount whatever upon the note. In other words, they alleged that the intestate had paid to the plaintiff whatever amount he became indebted because of cosuretyship on the note, if, indeed, such indebtedness ever existed. On the trial the plaintiff proved by the cashier of the Bank of Tifton that the $2,000 note was given by J. B. Harris, as maker, with the plaintiff, Fletcher, and the decedent, George Young, as sureties, and that Fletcher "had paid the note in full to the bank." The plaintiff testified that the original note for $2,000 had been lost; that he had paid this original note by a renewal note to the bank, which renewal note he paid when the same became due.

In support of the plea of payment, it was shown by the defendants that in October, 1906, Fletcher and George Young had made a settlement of their financial matters, and in this settlement it was shown that Fletcher was indebted to Young in the sum of $440, for which amount Fletcher then gave his duebill, or promissory note, to Young; that Fletcher, during the life of Young, made two payments on this duebill, and after George Young's death had paid the balance to the administrators; that at the settlement between Fletcher and Young, Fletcher made no mention whatever of the fact that he had paid this note of Harris', on which he and Young were cosureties, and made no claim against Young for any contribution on account of any alleged indebtedness arising from such payment; that Fletcher and Young resided about three miles apart, and were good friends; that prior to his death Young was sick about 15 months, and during that time the defendant Branch looked after Young's business, and Fletcher made no statement to Branch during this entire time as to any indebtedness which he claimed against Young on account of having paid the Harris note; and that nothing was ever said about it by Fletcher until 4½ years after Young had died, when, for the first time, he claimed the amount for which the suit was brought.

It further appeared that during all the time from 1902, when Fletcher claims to have paid the note to the bank, until 1908, when Young died, a period of six years, Young was entirely solvent; that his estate was worth from $17,000 to $18,000; and that he owed no debts at the time of his death, except his physician's bill for his last sickness, and $3.45, which he owed as a store account to Fletcher. It was further shown that during this same period between 1902 and 1908 Fletcher was practically insolvent, and in proof of the fact of his insolvency defendants introduced from the execution dockets two unsatisfied executions against him, amounting to $150, principal, and $221, principal, and they insisted before the jury that all these circumstances were sufficient to raise a presumption that if Young ever did owe the amount to Fletcher for which he brought suit it had been fully paid off by Young in his lifetime, and that these facts, taken all together, were sufficient to warrant the jury in finding a verdict in favor of the defendants.

In his motion for a new trial, besides the usual general grounds, movant made the following special assignments of error:

(1) He moved the court, first, to exclude all the testimony of the defendant Branch, relating to the duebill given by Fletcher to Young in the settlement between the two, on the ground that the evidence was irrelevant and immaterial, and illustrated no issue in the case, which motion was overruled by the court.

(2) The court, over the objection of mov-ant, admitted the general execution docket of Irwin county, Ga., showing the executions in favor of the Holmes Savings Bank v. T. Y. Fletcher, for $150, principal, and that of Frank & Co. v. Fletcher, for $221, principal, both of which were dated April 15, 1907. He objected to the admission of this evidence, on the grounds that it was irrelevant, immaterial, and illustrated no issue in the case, and because the execution docket was not the best and highest evidence of the facts sought to be proved.

(3) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "The defendants' contentions have been stated to you in the beginning, and I charge you that the execution of a promissory note or duebill by one party to another is evidence in law that all prior past-due accounts owing from the payee of the duebill or note to the maker of the same is settled, without they are excepted." The ground of objection being that the charge was not applicable to the facts as developed by the evidence.

(4) The court erred in charging the jury as follows: "I charge you that if you should find that Fletcher gave to George Young, during his lifetime, a certain note or duebill, after the indebtedness sued for is alleged to be due, then that would be presumptive evidence that the debt, if any ever existed, was canceled; and if you should believe that this presumption has not been rebutted and explained by the facts or circumstances, or the evidence in the case, then you would be authorized to find for the defendants; it being a matter, however, entirely for you to say as to whether or not, considering the case as a whole, the presumption referred to has been explained or rebutted." It is insisted that this charge was not applicable to the facts as developed by the evidence, inasmuch as it was shown that the duebill in question was given as a part of a distinct and separate transaction from the indebtedness sued on, and entirely apart from it; and that it was error, for the further reason that it charged affirmatively that the evidence of the defendants had raised a presumption that payment had been made; and that it was incumbent on the part of the plaintiff to rebut or explain such presumption and overcome the same with evidence.

(5) The court erred in charging to the effect that payment may be established by facts and circumstances, without fixing the time and place of payment; "the question of payment being determined by you from the facts in the case."

R. D. Smith, J. J. Walker, and Elkins & Wall, for plaintiff in error. H. J. Quincey and L. Kennedy, for defendants in error.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. The exception, relating to the exclusion of the evidence of the settlement and the giving of a duebill by Fletcher to Young, and the charge of the court, relating to the effect of this evidence, may be disposed of together. If the evidence was admissible, clearly the charge was pertinent and correct. Unquestionably the evidence was admissible. In fact, the circumstance which tended to prove that the decedent Young, intestate of the defendants, did not owe the plaintiff, Fletcher, anything was admissible in support of the answer of payment. The fact that Fletcher and Young had a settlement of their matters, and as a result of this settlement Fletcher gave his duebill or promissory note to Young, was a circumstance of more or less probative value that Young did not owe Fletcher anything at that time; for, if he had been indebted to Fletcher, there would have been no reason why Fletcher should have given him his duebill or promissory note, and if there was a settlement between them it is fair to presume that all mutual accounts and claims would have then been made and adjusted, and a balance struck between them. That this in fact was done in the settlement, and the balance was in favor of Young, is indicated by the fact that Fletcher did give his duebill or promissory note.

As early as in the case of Mills v. Mercer, Dudley's Reports, 158, it was held that the execution of a promissory note is evidence in law of a full settlement of accounts up to the date thereof, except such as were especially excepted at the time of the settlement, and the excerpt excepted to is in the very language of this opinion. Of course, the presumption was not conclusive. The court correctly stated that it was an inference of fact, and subject to be rebutted by evidence.

In Baldwin v. Walden, 30 Ga. 829, it was held that a credit on a note, put there by the maker, is presumptive evidence that there was no account due by the holder to the maker. Both of these cases are referred to with approval in Broughton v. Thornton, 50 Ga. 571.

It is not objected here that these excerpts from the charge did not state a correct principle of law, but they are objected to for the alleged reason that they do not illustrate any issue in the case. It seems to us that they do illustrate the only issue in the case, to wit, whether or not Young owed Fletcher the debt for which the administrators were being sued; it being contended that if Young did in fact owe this debt to Fletcher, and it was in existence at the time of the proved settlement between them, it was either included in the settlement, or did not exist, because not then referred to by Fletcher; the witness testifying that he was present when the settlement was made, and no reference was made to this debt by Fletcher to Young. In Norton v. Aiken, 134 Ga. 24, 67 S. E. 425, it is said that "any circumstance which tends to make the proposition of payment more or less probable may be considered by the jury." Certainly the failure of Fletcher to mention this debt to Young at the time of the settlement was a circumstance which tended to establish the fact that Young did not owe Fletcher the debt.

It is insisted by learned counsel for the plaintiff in error that the testimony as to this settlement and the giving of this duebill or note was not relevant, and the charge of the court, relating thereto, was not pertinent, because the settlement was as to different matters between Fletcher and Young than that growing out of his right of contribution as a cosurety for Harris. This may affect the probative weight or value of the testimony, but does not destroy its relevancy, or make improper the charge referred to. Of course, if the duebill given by Fletcher to Young had been given expressly in reference to a claim of Fletcher against Young, growing out of his relation of cosurety on the note given by Harris to the bank and its payment by Fletcher, it would have been conclusive against Fletcher. But it was a circumstance, in any event, which tended to raise a presumption against him that Young did not owe him anything at the time of the settlement; for it must be conceded that, being an insolvent man, according to the evidence, Fletcher would hardly have been giving his duebill or promissory note to a creditor, if, at that time, this creditor was in his debt. He would have claimed the debt, and would then have insisted upon its payment. So we conclude on this part of the case that the evidence was properly admitted, and the charge was properly given.

[2] 2. In the ruling of the court in admitting in evidence the general execution docket, showing the entry of the executions against Fletcher, there was probably error. The evidence was secondary; the best evidence being an exemplified copy of these entries. This error, however, was not material, and hardly contributed to the verdict. The existence of the unpaid executions was only a slight circumstance against the plaintiff; and, irrespective of this evidence, in our opinion, the verdict is amply supported.

[3] 3. There was no error in the charge of the court that payment might be established by facts or circumstances, without fixing the time or place of payment; the question of payment being one for the jury to determine from the facts in the case. It is the fact of payment, and not the time or place of the payment, that is the essential fact to be proved; and if the evidence established the fact of payment it is wholly immaterial that it did not go further and prove the place and time when the payment was actually made. Proof of the time and place of payment might render the evidence of payment stronger, but certainly the failure to prove the time and place could not destroy the probative value of the proof that payment was in fact made.

[4] We think there was sufficient evidence to warrant the jury in coming to the conclusion that if Young, the intestate of the defendants, ever owed Fletcher the $1,000 he had paid the debt during his lifetime. Fletcher alleges that he paid this note on which Young was cosurety to the bank in 1902. For six years thereafter he made no claim upon Young for contribution, although during that time Young was entirely solvent and lived near Fletcher, and during that time Fletcher had had a settlement with Young, and had given Young his duebill for $440. During this time, also, Young was sick for 15 months, and Branch, one of the administrators, attended to his business, and yet Fletcher, with no written evidence that he had paid the surety debt of Harris' in his possession, for he testified that he had lost the note which he had paid, did not say one word as to the existence of this debt, either to Young or his agent, Branch. These facts and circumstances, taken all together, fully warrant the inference, either that Young had never owed the debt sued for, or, if he had owed it, had paid it during his lifetime, and this reasonable inference was not in any manner rebutted by evidence. No error appears to have been committed, the verdict is supported by the evidence, and the court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

POWELL, J. (specially concurring). I doubt that the presumption or inference of settlement of previous differences arising from the giving of a note or duebill is as broad as the opinion of the Chief Judge indicates, but, as applied to the facts of the present case, the charge was not misleading or erroneous. Besides, it should not be overlooked that the alleged indebtedness for contribution had become barred by the statute of limitations, before the death of the decedent, even if it had not been discharged. Though the statute of limitations was not pleaded, the very fact of the lapse of time, without claim of indebtedness, greatly enhances the inference arising from the giving of the duebill.

Judge RUSSELL authorizes me to state that he concurs with these views.

VERUKI v. SAVANNAH ELECTRIC CO.
(No. 3,420.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Dec. 19, 1911.)

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 161*)—APPEAL—PROCEEDINGS TO TRANSFER CAUSE.

Where an appeal was timely entered in a justice's court, and the appeal bond was taken and approved by the justice, who recited that the cost of the appeal had been paid by the appellant, these facts show that the appeal was properly entered; and, where the appeal was timely transmitted by the justice to the clerk of the superior court, the failure of the justice to make a formal entry of filing on the appeal papers, even if the statute required the entry to be made, was not, of itself, sufficient ground for the judge of the superior court to dismiss the appeal. The appellant, having done everything that the law required of him to entitle him to an appeal, should not be deprived of the right by the failure of the justice to perform the merely formal act of marking the proceedings filed, since they were in fact and in substance actually filed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Dec. Dig. § 161.*]

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; W. G. Charlton, Judge.

Action by the Savannah Electric Company against Eli Veruki. From a judgment of the Superior Court, dismissing an appeal from justice's court, the defendant brings error. Reversed.

Wilson & Rogers, for plaintiff in error. Edmund H. Abrahams and Osborne & Lawrence, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. This was an appeal from a justice's court to a jury in the superior court. When the case was called in the superior court, the plaintiff moved to dismiss the appeal, on the ground that the appeal had never been filed in the office of the justice of the peace, and the court sustained the motion in the following order: "Upon motion of the Savannah Electric Company, the foregoing appeal is hereby dismissed; it appearing never to have been filed in the office of the justice of the peace." To the judgment dismissing the appeal, the defendant excepted.

Section 4998 of the Civil Code of 1910 provides that "in all civil cases tried and determined by a county judge or a justice of the peace * * * where the sum or property claimed is more than $50, either party may as a matter of right enter an appeal to the superior court." Section 5000 requires that appeals shall be "entered within four days after the adjournment of the court in which the judgment was rendered." The record in this case shows that within the four days allowed for entering an appeal in the justice court the following proceedings were had in that court:

"Savannah Electric Company v. Eli Veruki. In Justice Van Giesen's Court. October Term, 1909. Suit on account. Judgment for plaintiff. And now, within the time allowed by law, comes Eli Veruki, and, being dissatisfied with the judgment in the above-stated cause and having paid the costs in said cause, enters this his appeal to a jury in the superior court, and the said Eli Veruki, as principal, and the undersigned, M. K. Jones, as security, hereby acknowledge themselves bound for the eventual condemnation money in said cause. Witness our hands and seals this twelfth day of October, 1909. Eli Veruki. [L. S.] M. K. Jones. [L. S.]

"Bond approved and all costs paid this October 25, 1909. F. S. Van Giesen, J. P. 2nd G. M. District, C. C. Ga. [Official Seal.]"

It would seem from this record that the appellant had complied fully with the requirements of the statute, and was entitled to have his appeal entered and transmitted to the superior court of the county. Having so entered his appeal, paid the costs, and given the appeal bond, there was nothing more for him to do; and when this had been done the law required the justice of the peace to transmit the same to the clerk of the superior court. Section 5013 of the Civil Code of 1910 provides that, "when an appeal from the judgment of a justice of the peace or notary public has been entered, it shall be the duty of such justice of the peace or notary public to transmit the same to the clerk of the superior court of the county in which proceedings may have been had, at least ten days before the next superior court of said county." Nothing is said in the statute about requiring the justice of the peace to formally mark the appeal papers filed in his office. It would seem that the filing could be presumed from the entering of the appeal in the office of the justice of the peace and the approval of the appeal bond by the justice of the peace, with the statement that the costs of the appeal had been paid by the appellant; and when the appeal proceedings made timely appearance in the superior court of the county it would be fair to presume that the record in the appeal case had been transmitted by the justice of the peace to the clerk of the superior court. It is immaterial how the justice of the peace transmitted the papers. If they were in fact transmitted and got into the possession of the clerk of the superior court in any manner, it was sufficient; and it must be presumed that the justice of the peace did transmit these papers to the clerk of the superior court; the presumption as to all officers, until the contrary appears, being that they have done their official duty.

We know of no law that requires a justice of the peace to mark appeal papers as filed in his office. If all of those things are done by the appellant which the statute says he shall do to entitle him to an appeal, in our opinion, he would be entitled to the appeal, although the justice of the peace had not marked the papers constituting the appeal proceedings as of file in his office. We cannot think that the mere failure of the magistrate to make a formal entry of filing, which is purely a ministerial act, should work such an injury to the appellant as to have his appeal dismissed, when the proceedings show that he had complied strictly with all that the law required of him in entering his appeal, in giving his appeal bond, and in paying the costs.

In Pearce v. Renfro, 68 Ga. 194, it was held to be no cause of dismissal of an appeal that the magistrate did not file the papers in the office of the clerk of the superior court within the time required by law, or did not send up the judgment rendered by him, or made no proper certificate that the appellant had, within the proper time, paid the costs and given the bond. "When an appellant has done his duty," says the court, "the mistake of the magistrate may be corrected."

In Holt v. Edmondson, 31 Ga. 357, it was held that when a party, desiring to appeal, pays the costs, tenders security, and demands an appeal from the clerk during the term at which the judgment was rendered, and, through fault of the clerk, the appeal is not entered, the court, on application, will order the appeal to be entered nunc pro tunc. It follows logically from this that if the justice of the peace was required to formally mark the appeal proceedings filed in his office, and he had failed to do so, and it appeared that the appeal had nevertheless been entered, and all the requirements of the statute entitling the appellant to appeal had been complied with by him, the justice could be required to mark this entry of filing nunc pro tunc, on the hearing of the appeal in the superior court. The right of appeal is an important right; and, where the appellant has done everything that the statute requires him to do in order to secure this right, it would be a great wrong to deprive him of this right through no fault of his own, but on account of the failure of the justice of the peace to make the formal entry of filing.

For these reasons, we think the learned judge erred in dismissing the appeal, because it appeared "never to have been filed in the office of the justice of the peace."

Judgment reversed.

"Where a bill of lading is attached to a draft drawn on a third person, it will be treated as security for the draft, and neither title to the goods, nor right to the bill of lading, will pass to the drawee until, as required therein, he accepts, or accepts and secures, or pays the draft, as the case may be."

3. CARRIERS (§ 83*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—PERFORMANCE OF CONTRACT—DELIVERY BY CARRIER—PRESENTATION OF BILL OF LADING.

While the general rule is that where one orders goods to be shipped by a common carrier, and the order is accepted and the goods shipped, a delivery to the carrier is a delivery to the purchaser, the carrier being the agent of the purchaser to receive them, and when this is done the title passes from the vendor to the vendee, this general rule, however, is subject to exception. If for any reason the seller, at the time of the shipment and delivery of the goods to the common carrier, takes a bill of lading to his own order, and attaches thereto a draft for the purchase money, he thereby expresses his intention to retain the title until the draft is paid, or accepted, and secured; and, where this method of shipment is adopted, the carrier becomes the agent of the seller or consignor, and would be authorized to deliver the goods only on a surrender to it of the bill of lading.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 308-315; Dec. Dig. § 83.*]

4. FORMER DECISION CONTROLLING.

This case is fully controlled by the decision of this court in Moss v. Sell, 8 Ga. App. 588, 70 S. E. 13, and the decision of the Supreme Court in Erwin v. Harris, 87 Ga. 335, 13 S. E. 513.

5. JUDGMENT UNAUTHORIZED.

The judgment in favor of the plaintiff was unauthorized, and a nonsuit should have been awarded.

Error from City Court of Savannah; Davis Freeman, Judge.

Action by Strozier & Waters against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Strozier & Waters sued the Southern Railway Company in trover in the city court of Savannah to recover bed lounges shipped by the Johnson Manufacturing Company at Fayetteville, N. C., to its own order at Savannah, Ga., with direction to notify Strozier & Waters. The facts are not in dispute, and, briefly stated, are as follows: Strozier & Waters gave an order for seven lounges, aggregating in price the sum of $47, to a salesman of the Johnson Manufacturing Company on February 17, 1910, the terms to be 60 days from March 1st. On receipt of this order the Johnson Manufacturing Company wrote to Strozier & Waters, requesting a deposit of $10 on account, and this deposit was made. Finding that Strozier & Waters had no commercial rating, the Johnson Manufacturing Company made a shipment of the seven lounges at Fayetteville, N. C., to itself at Savannah, with order to notify Strozier & Waters, attached a bill of lading to a sight draft drawn on Strozier & Waters, and placed it in the bank for collection. Strozier & Waters were then duly notified of the method of shipment and were requested to pay the draft. They refused to pay the draft, and the railroad company refused to deliver possession of the goods to them, unless the bill of lading was surrendered, and upon this refusal Strozier & Waters instituted proceedings in trover, claiming title to the shipment. The case is before us on exceptions to the refusal of the court to grant a nonsuit, and also to the final judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff. The questions raised by the record are as follows: (1) Can an action in trover be sustained without showing either title, prior possession, or the right of possession? (2) Where a vendor makes a shipment by means of a common carrier, to his own order, with directions to notify a third person at destination, and the bill of lading is attached to a sight draft for collection drawn on such third person, does any title pass to such third person until payment is made of the draft, or rightful possession of the bill of lading obtained? (3) Where a shipment is made to the order of the consignor, with direction to notify a third person, and a sight draft is deposited for collection, is not the carrier justified in refusing to deliver until presentation of the bill of lading; and can a recovery as for a conversion be had against the carrier for a refusal to deliver until presentation of the bill of lading under these facts?

E. H. Abrahams and Osborne & Lawrence, for plaintiff in error. A. L. Alexander and Alexander R. Lawton, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. It is well settled that to support a recovery in an action of trover the plaintiff must show either title in himself, prior possession, or right of possession. Mitchell v. Georgia & Alabama R., 111 Ga. 760, 36 S. E. 971, 51 L. R. A. 622. In this case the plaintiffs rely upon title to the shipment in question. They contend that the payment of the deposit of $10 and the delivery of the goods to the carrier operated to fix this title in them; that the contract of sale was fully executed and was not in any sense executory; and that the railroad company held possession of the goods as their agent and not as the agent of the consignor.

[3] Unquestionably it is a general rule that delivery to the carrier of goods purchased is delivery to the consignee; but this general rule may be varied by a manifest exception thereto made by the vendor at the time of shipment. At the time of shipment in this case the Johnson Manufacturing Company expressly reserved title to the shipment by taking a bill of lading to its order and attached a sight draft to the same for collection.

[2] Section 4134 of the Civil Code (1910) in such case expressly provides that no title passes until the drawee pays the draft thus drawn upon him. "When a bill of lading is attached to a draft drawn on a third person, it will be treated as security for the draft, and neither title to the goods, nor right to the bill of lading, will pass to the drawee until, as required therein, he accepts, or accepts and secures, or pays the draft as the case may be." When the Johnson Manufacturing Company consigned the shipment to itself, with order to "notify Strozler & Waters," this was equivalent to a positive statement that it did not intend to part either with the title to the shipment or the possession thereof until this draft was paid.

[4] The case of Erwin v. Harris, 87 Ga. 335, 13 S. E. 513, seems to us controlling on this point. In that case a sale of oats was offered by a party in Texas to the vendee in Georgia. The vendee replied, offering to take five car loads f. o. b. at a Texas point, and the offer was accepted. The vendor shipped the oats, sending a draft for collection, with the bill of lading attached, and the vendee claimed title. The court ruled as follows: "The general rule is that when one orders goods from a distant place to be shipped by a common carrier, and the order is accepted and the goods shipped, a delivery to the common carrier is a delivery to the purchaser, the common carrier being the agent of the purchaser to receive them; and, when this is done, the title, without more, passes from the vendor to the vendee." Now note the exception: "If, however, the vendor of the goods is not satisfied of the solvency of the purchaser, or is doubtful thereof, or wishes to retain the title in himself, he may vary this rule, when he makes the consignment and delivers the goods to the carrier, by taking a bill of lading from the carrier to his own order. When the vendor does this, it is evidence that he does not part with the title of the goods shipped, but retains the same until the draft which he sends with the bill of lading is accepted or paid; and, when the title is thus reserved in the vendor or consignor, the carrier is his agent and not the agent of the consignee, and the risk is the consignor's and not the consignee's. Erwin, the consignor, having taken the bill of lading to his own order and attached it to the draft drawn on Harris, and sent them to the bank in Macon, Ga., delivery to the carrier in Texas was not a delivery to Harris. Under these facts, the title remained in Erwin, the consignor, and the delivery to Harris was contemplated to be at his residence in Macon; payment of the price to be made by him there on delivery." See, also, to the same effect, F. C. & P. Railroad Co. v. Berry, 116 Ga. 19, 42 S. E. 371, and the decision of this court in Moss & Co. v. Sell, 8 Ga. App. 588, 70 S. E. 18. In the case decided by this court, referring to the conduct of the consignor in the method of shipment, it is said that "the seller thereby expresses his intention not to part with the title to the goods shipped to the buyer until his draft attached to the bill of lading is accepted and paid." The facts in the case sub judice are almost identical with the facts in the case of Erwin v. Harris, supra; the only difference being the payment of the $10 deposit by Strozler & Waters as required by the Johnson Manufacturing Company. This payment of $10 was simply a payment on account, and to this extent it gave to the purchasers an interest in the shipment, but it did not fix the title to the shipment in them in the face of the express declaration on the part of the consignors, as shown by their method of shipment, that the title to the shipment was reserved until the purchase price was fully paid by the consignees. Here the vendors were not satisfied of the solvency of the vendees. They found that the vendees had no commercial rating, and therefore the vendors exercised their right to protect themselves by consigning the shipment to themselves in Savannah and attaching a draft to the bill of lading. In the case of Mathewson v. Belmont Flouring Mills Co., 76 Ga. 359, it was distinctly held that, where goods were shipped with sight draft and bill of lading attached, the return of the draft accepted or paid was a condition precedent to fix the title, and until this was done no title passed.

We might rest the decision of the case here, since by the authorities cited applicable to the facts, which are not in dispute, the plaintiffs in the court below not only failed to show any title in themselves to the shipment, but expressly showed that the vendor, Johnson Manufacturing Company, had reserved title in itself until the draft was paid. The carrier had knowledge of the method of shipment. It had the absolute right to refuse to deliver the shipment, made, as it was, without a surrender of its bill of lading. If it had delivered the shipment to the consignees without the bill of lading, it would have been in law liable to the vendors for any consequent loss, for the carrier is bound to see that it delivers a shipment only to the proper person designated by the consignor. Where a bill of lading covering a shipment has been issued, the carrier may demand its production as a condition precedent to making delivery. Atlantic & Birmingham Ry. Co. v. Spires, 1 Ga. App. 22, 57 S. E. 973; Sellers v. Savannah, Florida & Western Ry. Co., 123 Ga. 386, 51 S. E. 398. It follows from the foregoing that a refusal by the railroad company to deliver the shipment to the consignees, under the facts as stated, did not amount to a conversion by the carrier, but that the carrier in refusing to deliver, without a surrender of its negotiable bill of lading, was standing squarely upon its rights.

[5] We conclude, therefore, that the trial court erred in not awarding a nonsuit, and that the judgment against the defendant was unauthorized.

Judgment reversed.

MARSHALING ASSETS AND SECURITIES (§ 9*)—FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGE—RIGHTS OF PARAMOUNT CREDITOR.

A. held a mortgage on two mules, and B. held a junior mortgage on one of them. The mortgagor, by the consent of A. and without the knowledge or consent of B., sold the one not covered by B.'s mortgage, and applied the proceeds to the payment of an open account which A. held against him. B. foreclosed his mortgage, and, under the execution, seized and sold the mule covered thereby. The amount realized from the mortgagor's sale of the mule covered by A.'s mortgage would have been sufficient to have paid the balance due on A.'s mortgage, as well as the mortgage fi. fa. held by B. Held that, in the distribution of the fund in the hands of the court, equitable principles should control, and, under the facts, there was no error in the judgment awarding the money to B.'s mortgage fi. fa.

Claim by R. D. Moore to the proceeds of a mortgage foreclosure by E. W. Cofield. Judgment for Cofield, and Moore brings error. Affirmed.

W. O. Dean, for plaintiff in error. A. C. Stone, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. The question in this case arose on the distribution of a fund in the hands of the sheriff, arising from the sale of mortgaged property under execution. Cofield held a mortgage on one mule. Moore held a mortgage on two mules; one of them being the same mule covered by Cofield's mortgage. Cofield's mortgage was junior in date to that held by Moore. He foreclosed his mortgage, and had the mule levied upon and sold, and the fund realized from this sale was claimed by Moore, under his senior mortgage. The undisputed evidence before the court, on the hearing of the rule, showed that Moore agreed that the mortgagor should sell the mule not covered by Cofield's mortgage, and apply the proceeds arising from the sale of this mule to the debt or account against him, which was held by the firm of which Moore was a partner, and the money arising from the sale of the mule was accordingly applied to the payment of this debt. Cofield did not know of this arrangement between Moore and the mortgagor. If the money realized from the sale of the mule on which Moore held a mortgage had been applied on this mortgage, it would have reduced this senior mortgage to only $15 or $20, and the money arising from the sale of the mule under the mortgage foreclosure by the sheriff would have been sufficient to pay off this balance and also the mortgage fi. fa. held by Cofield. Cofield contended that under these facts he was in justice and equity entitled to have the money realized from the sale of this mule, to pay off his mortgage fi. fa. The judge, without the intervention of a jury, tried the question of law involved, and rendered a finding in favor of Cofield.

We think the decision of the judge was within the well-settled principle, codified in section 3220 of the Civil Code of 1910, that, "as among themselves, creditors must so prosecute their own rights as to not unnecessarily jeopardize the rights of others; hence a creditor having a lien on two funds of the debtor, equally accessible to him, will be compelled to pursue the one on which other creditors have no lien." HOWE v. STATE. (No. 3,796.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Dec. 19, 1911.)

1. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 110*) — REQUISITES OF ACCUSATION — FOLLOWING LANGUAGE OF STATUTE.

An accusation which, following the general language of the statute, charges that the accused "did sell and barter, for a valuable consideration, alcoholic, spirituous, malt, and intoxicating liquors, intoxicating bitters, and drinks which, if drunk to excess, will produce intoxication," is not subject to special demurrer on the ground that the kind of drinks sold is not specified with sufficient definiteness. Hall v. State, 8 Ga. App. 747, 70 S. E. 211.

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 216*) — CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF ACCUSATION.

The specific point that, since some malt liquors are not intoxicating, the accusation should have expressly shown that the malt liquors referred to therein were intoxicating, is not meritorious. Stoner v. State, 5 Ga. App. 716, 63 S. E. 602.

4. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§§ 224, 236*) — CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

There was no error in the court's instructing the jury as follows: "On the trial of one charged with having violated the law by illegally selling intoxicating liquors, proof that the accused received money from another person, accompanied with a request to procure whisky for the latter, and shortly thereafter delivered whisky to such person, puts the onus on the defendant of explaining where, how, and from whom he got the liquor; and if the explanation offered by him is supported only by his own statement, the jury, if they believe it to be a mere subterfuge to cover up an illegal sale by himself, are authorized to find the defendant guilty." Mack v. State, 116 Ga. 546, 42 S. E. 776. A request to charge, stating a contrary doctrine, was properly refused.

2. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 206*) — TRANSACTIONS INVALID — PRIORITY OF CLAIMS—RUNNING ACCOUNTS.

When a running or continuous account extends over the date of a voluntary conveyance, the creditor, as to the part of the indebtedness contracted prior to the conveyance, is a prior creditor, and, as to the part contracted subsequent to the conveyance, he is a subsequent creditor.

3. PAYMENT (§ 43*)—APPLICATION—RUNNING ACCOUNTS.

If payments are made on a running or continuous account, without particular application of the same thereto by direction of the paying debtor or act of the receiving creditor, the law applies the payments to the oldest items of the account.

4. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 206*) — TRANSACTIONS INVALID — PRIORITY OF CLAIMS—RUNNING ACCOUNTS.

ROBINSON, J. This is a suit attacking conveyances to a wife as being in fraud of the husband's creditors. The chancellor found from the pleadings and proofs that the conveyances were not made in actual fraud, but that one of them conveying a lot of ground was voluntary and, therefore, void as to the debts contracted prior to its date; that all the debts claimed by the bill and petitions were contracted after this conveyance was made, except a debt of one of the petitioning creditors; that the wife furnished $1,800 of the money that paid for the lot and the improvements thereon from resources of her own, other than those of her husband; and that the improvements placed on the lot a considerable time after the conveyance are chargeable with the debts of the husband, claimed by plaintiff and the other petitioners, to the extent that his means went into those improvements, that is, to the amount of $1,325. Accordingly a decree was entered directing that the property be sold for the satisfaction of the debts to that amount, if not paid to that extent by the wife in a day given. From this decree plaintiff and other creditors have appealed. The main contention is that the court erred in not subjecting the property as a whole to the payment of the husband's debts.

The case is so similar to many that have received extended judicial discussion that it will serve no purpose to elaborate on facts like those which have time and again been reviewed in our cases and on well-settled principles in connection therewith. The books already contain full exposition of principles relating to voluntary and fraudulent conveyances. We have carefully weighed the evidence in connection with the familiar legal principles applicable thereto. It is enough to say that the evidence justifies the view of the case adopted in the decree. Therefore, the assignments and the cross assignment on this score are overruled. The decree is right as far as it goes. In one particular it should go further, but as to that we shall speak later.

[1, 2] Plaintiff claims that he is a prior creditor in relation to the conveyance of the lot. If it were so, his debt should have a better priority than that given in the decree; for the voluntary conveyance of the lot would then be void as to him. Because plaintiff's debt grows out of a running account extending from a date long before the conveyance to a date long thereafter, it is insisted that the balance finally remaining due on the account should be considered a debt prior to the conveyance, notwithstanding ing the various payments made on the account more than equal the items of indebtedness contracted prior to the date of the conveyance. Our statute settles this matter. Code 1906, c. 74, § 2. Judge Lucas, in Greer v. O'Brien, 36 W. Va. 277, 15 S. E. 74, gives a clear exposition of this statute. Therein it is held: "Under said act the courts of this state have no power to substitute subsequent creditors to the shoes of prior creditors, or to confound the two classes which the act was intended to make, and has made, absolutely distinct." In a running account extending over the date of a voluntary conveyance, part is contracted prior to the conveyance and part subsequent to the conveyance. The creditor is clearly a prior creditor as to part and a subsequent creditor as to part. The conveyance can only be considered void for voluntariness as to the part contracted prior to it. As to the other part it is valid, unless overthrown for actual fraud in relation thereto. As to this subsequent part, mere voluntariness will not avoid the conveyance. The statute defines the debts for which a voluntary conveyance must give way. It declares that a conveyance "not upon consideration deemed valuable in law, shall be void as to creditors whose debts shall have been contracted at the time it was made; but shall not upon that account merely be void as to creditors whose debts shall have been contracted * * * after it was made." The dividing line is clearly fixed; and, as heretofore held, the courts have no power to confound the two classes or to substitute the one for the other. Whether one is a prior or a subsequent creditor in relation to a voluntary conveyance must be determined solely by reference to the time the indebtedness was contracted. Of course we are now dealing only with the aspect of the mere voluntary, not fraudulent, conveyance of the lot. The improvements, it is true, have been held chargeable with debts made subsequent to the conveyance, but upon the ground that the husband, a considerable time after the conveyance of the lot, put his money in the improvements in fraud of the subsequent debts. That is another branch of the case, as to which even the wife is not seriously contending, it seems.

[3, 4] Having observed that plaintiff's account was of such a character as to make him prior creditor as to one part and subsequent creditor as to the other part, we must next inquire whether he still retains the position of prior creditor. The payments made on the account are sufficient to pay all the items that were contracted prior to the conveyance. How are those payments to be applied? Clearly, in the absence of any direction by the paying debtor, or any specific application of the payments by the creditor, the law will apply the payments to the oldest part of the account. The payments on the account due plaintiff were made and credited thereon without direction or particular application. They should be held to apply as payments ordinarily do under such circumstances—they should go to the payment of the oldest items of account. "In cases of long standing accounts, where debits and credits are constantly occurring, and no balances are struck otherwise than for the mere purpose of making rests, the payments ought to be applied to extinguish the debts according to priority of time." 11 Enc. Dig. Va. & W. Va. 124; 30 Cyc. 1244. There is nothing to show that the parties intended the payments to go to the items of account contracted after the conveyance, or that they intended them to be distributed over the whole account. We can only give the payments the application that the acts of the parties gave them at the time they were made. The debtor paid on the account without direction. The creditor made no particular application of the payments. Under these circumstances, the acts of the parties in the making and receiving of the payments caused the same to apply to the oldest items of the account. We cannot change all this now, in order to make plaintiff a prior creditor, when indeed his receiving the payments in the way that he did made him to lose his position of prior creditor. He is chargeable with knowledge of the effect of his act in receiving the payments. If he desired to maintain his position as prior creditor, he should not have accepted the payments in the way he did. Plaintiff, by his own dealings, long ago made his position in reference to the voluntary conveyance to be that of subsequent creditor. The only items of indebtedness remaining due to him were contracted after the conveyance. The doctrine of applying payments to the part of a debt least secured has nothing to do with this case, though urged by plaintiff. The law applied these payments when they were made.

In some jurisdictions continuous or running accounts beginning before the conveyance are considered prior debts. 20 Cyc. 422; Thomas v. Lye, 37 Ill. App. 482; Spuck v. Logan, 97 Md. 152, 54 Atl. 989, 99 Am. St. Rep. 427; Paulk v. Cooke, 39 Conn. 566; Wait on Fraudulent Conveyances, § 103; Bump on Fraudulent Conveyances, § 296. But, as we have stated, our statute defines who is a prior creditor and who is not. By the terms of the statute a creditor's relation to a voluntary conveyance is fixed only by the time of the contracting of the debt. It does not permit making a creditor what he has not made himself in this regard. It does not recognize the subrogation which other jurisdictions have invoked to make one a prior creditor.

[5] The contention by plaintiff that the decree is erroneous in recognizing the debts of the petitioning creditors is overruled. Plaintiff's bill invited these petitioners to come into the suit. They filed petitions fully setting up their debts and joining with plaintiff in the suit. Thereby they became responsible for costs. Not a word of objection to their petitions was entered in the court below. The debts claimed by them have been contested by no one, not even by the debtor or his wife who claims the property on which these debts are made charges. Several of these petitioning creditors were even allowed to join with plaintiff in this appeal.

The decree finds that plaintiff and petitioners, other than the petitioner decreed to be a prior creditor and whose debt is charged against the lot, shall share pro rata in the amount charged against the improvements on the property. But the decree does not go on, ascertain, and fix the amount of the respective debts of plaintiff and these petitioners. These amounts should be determined by decree before further proceedings are taken in the cause. The decree entered settles correctly the principles of the cause. But it should go further and ascertain each debt that is to be paid in pursuance of those principles. We presume this would have been done in the court below if plaintiff had called attention to the propriety of doing it. The debtor and the owner of the property are not complaining, and we shall not reverse for this cause at the instance of plaintiff and the other appellants, since they could have asked this additional decree below and there obtained it. We shall affirm the decree, and remand the cause with direction to the court below to ascertain and fix by further decree the respective amounts of the debts due plaintiff and petitioners, already directed to be paid under the former decree.

2. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 31*)—ENFORCEMENT—CONTRACT AS TO BOUNDARY.

If the parties to a contract for sale of land agree that certain boundary lines "are to be run as may be hereafter agreed upon," equity will not enforce it, until such open boundary lines shall have been agreed upon by the parties.

8. BOUNDARIES (§ 48*)—ACQUIESCENCE.

In the absence of fraud, if a vendee accept a deed, based upon a survey made pursuant to a contract for the purchase of a boundary of land, which was to be surveyed out of a larger tract by a certain surveyor mutually agreed on by the parties, and which was surveyed by such surveyor, and rests for nearly five years before making complaint, he will be presumed to have acquiesced in the boundaries located by such survey and described in his deed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pocahontas County.

Bill by Shelton L. Reger against William M. McAllister and others. Decree for complainant, and defendant McAllister appeals. Reversed, and bill dismissed.

Brown, Jackson & Knight, for appellant. Geo. E. Price, for appellee.

WILLIAMS, P. Shelton L. Reger, trustee, brought suit in the circuit court of Pocahontas county against William M. McAllister and others to compel specific performance of a contract for the sale of land, and from a final decree rendered in favor of plaintiff, on the 8th of October, 1908, defendant McAllister has appealed.

On the 8th of July, 1899, McAllister agreed in writing to sell and convey to Reger, trustee, two adjoining parcels of land at the price of \$4.50 per acre, \$500 of which was paid at the date of the contract, and the balance to be paid when the deed should be delivered. These parcels of land were to be surveyed out of larger tracts which McAllister owned, and, when surveyed, would constitute one contiguous body, or tract, of land. The agreement stipulated that McAllister should have "the lands surveyed at his own cost and charge, at the earliest practicable date, by B. M. Yeager, Uriah Bird, or some other competent surveyor, to be agreed upon by the said parties." He was to give Reger 10 days' notice of the time when the surveying would be done. A number of dates were agreed upon for making the survey, but in each instance, before the time arrived, either something occurred which made it inconvenient for Mr. Reger to attend, or the surveyor could not then do the work. Mr. Reger admits that the delay was chiefly on his own account. After several attempts to fix a date when it would suit the convenience of Mr. Reger to be present, he finally, on the 11th of October, 1899, wrote from Elkins, W. Va., to Mr. McAllister at Warm Springs, Va., the following letter, viz.: "I wired Mr. Bird to arrange with you as to a date to survey your land. I want it closed up, and I hope you and he can arrange dates satisfactory to both. I am now so I can meet you at any time after next week." On the 10th or 11th of October, 1899, Mr. Reger also wired Mr. Bird at Marlinton, W. Va., to arrange a date with Mr. McAllister, and to go on and do the surveying, whether he (Reger) was there or not. Pursuant to these directions, McAllister and Bird went upon the land, about the 20th of October, 1899, and Bird says he did the surveying according to the contract, as he understood it. Mr. Reger was not present, but he went upon the land a few days afterwards—within a week afterwards—but he says he did not then examine the lines that had been run. On the 27th of October, 1899, he wrote to McAllister to execute the deed according to their contract to Henry G. Davis, when he should receive Bird's report. McAllister did execute a deed for 523 acres, according to Bird's survey, to Henry G. Davis, which was rejected because it failed to grant certain rights of way over McAllister's other lands, which had been provided for in the contract, and another deed was prepared by a lawyer, in Elkins, which did include said privileges and easements, and was mailed to McAllister, and was executed by him and returned. This deed was accepted, and the land conveyed by it paid for, and both parties, no doubt, then supposed the matter was a closed transaction. But in the summer of 1904, Mr. Reger discovered, as he claims, that the survey made by Bird did not include certain land which was described in the contract of sale, and he thereupon notified McAllister that, on the 15th day of July, 1904, he would go upon the lands with E. E. Taylor, a surveyor of Elkins, W. Va., and would survey out the land according to the boundaries given in the contract. He did go upon the land with E. E. Taylor, and had him survey out 236 $\frac{3}{4}$ acres more of McAllister's land. This suit is brought to compel McAllister to execute a deed for that additional boundary of 236 $\frac{3}{4}$ acres.

[1] In addition to his claim of complete performance, McAllister asserts that the boundaries of the tract of land are not described in the agreement with sufficient definiteness to enable a court to specifically enforce it. Certainty in description of land agreed to be conveyed is an essential prerequisite to specific performance. Mathews v. Jarrett, 20 W. Va. 415. The description of the land which the bill seeks to have conveyed is given in the contract of sale as follows, viz.: "Also the following described additional tract or parcel of land, the quantity of which cannot now be estimated, adjoining the said first-mentioned tract, and adjoining the said Bruce & Chumley 713-acre tract, and adjoining the D. W. Hile and others 2514-acre tract. The lines of said last-mentioned tract are to be run so as to include all the pine timber off the upper end of said tract, on the northwest side of said Crooked fork, running with the lines of the said Bruce & Chumley tract, and the D. W. Hile and others tract, and so as to exclude all the land that is heavily timbered with locust, cherry, and other hardwood; that is to say, there is to be included in this tract all of the land, adjoining the Hile lands, upon which the pine timber predominates. The lines on the southeast side of this tract are to be run as may be hereafter agreed upon between the said Wm. M. McAllister and the said Shelton L. Reger, making as many corners as may be found necessary to carry out the terms of this agreement."

Counsel for appellee invokes the equity maxim, "Id certum est quod certum reddi potest," and insists that the land can be identified by the above description. There is no doubt that a boundary of land could be surveyed which would coincide with that description. But it is equally certain that it might be laid off by an indefinite number of different boundary lines, and each separate manner of laying it off would fit, in a general way, the description of the boundary named in the contract. That is what makes the contract indefinite as to boundary lines. The only facts stated in the agreement to fix definite boundary lines, on one side of the tract, are (1) that the land is on the northeast side of Crooked fork; (2) that the pine timber must predominate on it; and (3) that the land on which the hardwoods predominate is to be excluded. That the first fact is too uncertain is too patent to merit discussion. Crooked fork is not the boundary line, and the contract does not say how far the boundary lines are to be located from the stream. The second and third facts are so indefinite as description of boundary lines that no two surveyors, each working independently of the other, would lay the lines in the same place. This is verified by the fact that Bird, the surveyor mutually agreed on by the parties to lay off the lines, ran them in one place, and Taylor, the surveyor later employed by Reger, ran them in quite a different place. The bill does not charge McAllister with fraud of any kind, and it appears from the evidence that Bird ran the lines by the agreement as he interpreted it, and that he was not instructed by McAllister, otherwise than to follow the contract.

The element of uncertainty as to where the lines should be located is further complicated by the fact that the pine timber is not found on the land in a continuous body, but grows in patches; the pine predominating in some places, and the hardwoods in other places. The two varieties of timber shade off gradually into each other, and in some places it is difficult to tell which kind predominates; the two being so intermingled. Notwithstanding the contract provides that the land on which the hardwoods predominate is to be excluded, it is proven by plaintiff's own witnesses that Taylor's survey of the additional land, claimed by the bill, includes from 50 to 75 acres on which the hardwood predominates. It is very questionable whether or not the pine predominates on the 236 $\frac{1}{4}$ acres in question, taken as a whole. But, assuming that it does, still that alone is not sufficient to determine the case for plaintiff. Because the tract might have been laid off in a different shape, bounded by different lines, and containing a greater or a less quantity, and still have been a tract on which the pine would predominate, could the court adopt any one of such tracts as the one which the parties to the agreement intended? We think not, because to do so would be in effect to make an agreement for them.

[2] But why should we extend this discussion, when the contract expressly states that the boundary lines on one side of the tract are to be the subject of future agreement. It reads: "The lines on the southeast side of this tract are to be run as may be hereafter agreed upon," etc. But Mr. Reger failed to meet Mr. McAllister on the land at the time he himself appointed, and they never actually agreed where the southeast boundary lines should be run. This case clearly falls within the principle declared and applied in the following cases, and is governed by them, viz.: Mathews v. Jarrett, 20 W. Va. 415, Westfall v. Cottrills, 24 W. Va. 763, and Blankenship v. Spencer, 31 W. Va. 510, 7 S. E. 433. Each one of those cases was a suit for specific enforcement of a contract for the sale of land, and the description of the land in the contract of sale was no more uncertain in any one of those cases than it is in the case now under review, yet in each of them the court denied relief to the vendee on the ground of uncertainty of description. There is more danger of doing injustice, in cases involving uncertainty of description, by attempting to give relief, than there is in refusing it, because, if the vendee has paid nothing, and is denied relief, he has lost nothing but his bargain, and if he has paid in advance for the land, and fails to get it, he can recover his money in an action of assumpsit. On the other hand, if the court should undertake to enforce such contract, it is liable to compel the parties to perform that which they never agreed to.

cause of plaintiff's laches. Moreover, between the acceptance of the deed and the bringing of the suit the land has greatly enhanced in value. If the land had depreciated, instead of appreciated, in that time, it is more than probable that plaintiff would have been content. Must he not be content as it is? We think so. He has delayed so long in bringing his suit that he must be regarded as having acquiesced in what was done. To grant his prayer would be to give him a great advantage over the other contracting party, in view of the enhanced value of the land. Equity will not permit him to occupy a position in relation to his vendor, in the absence of fraud, where he may say, in case the land depreciates, I am satisfied, and, in case it enhances, I must have more.

Reger bought the land as agent for an undisclosed principal, and the rights of his principal can rise no higher than his own, so far as they affect the vendor. The principal, now most vitally interested, did not become known to McAllister until after this suit was brought.

The decree will be reversed, and a decree entered here dismissing plaintiff's bill.

INTERIOR & W. V. R. CO. v. EPLING et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 28, 1911.)

1. WILLS (§ 614*)—CONSTRUCTION—ESTATE CONVEYED.

A testator devised: "My real & personal property is to be equally divided between my three daughters (naming them) and then to their children forever." At testator's death all the daughters were living; two of them had children; the other one, though married, had then no children and never produced issue. After testator's death, mutual deeds in partition of the land were made by the two daughters then living and the children of the other daughter then deceased. Held:

I. The daughters took life estates with remainders in fee to their respective children, in their respective shares allotted in equal division of the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Dec. Dig. § 614.*]

2. WILLS (§ 634*)—CONSTRUCTION—VESTED AND CONTINGENT REMAINDERS.

II. As to the share of the daughter having no children at testator's death, the remainder was a contingent one—with possibility of vesting during her life on production of issue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1488-1510; Dec. Dig. § 634.*]

3. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION (§ 17*)—CONTINGENT REMAINDERS—FAILURE.

III. At the death of this daughter without issue, the contingent remainder failed; and, there being no residuary clause in the will, the partitioned share of the land to which that remainder pertained descended to the heirs-at-law of the testator.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Descent and Distribution, Cent. Dig. §§ 51, 52; Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

4. PARTITION (§ 9*)—BY PARTIES—EFFECT—ESTOPPEL.

IV. The children of the deceased daughter were not estopped by their deed in partition from claiming an interest as heirs-at-law of the testator, in the partitioned share as to which the contingent remainder failed.

5. WILLS (§ 591*)—CONSTRUCTION—DESIGNATION OF LEGATEES—"CHILDREN."

Where a will devised property to be equally divided among testator's three daughters, "and then to their children, forever," the word "children" is not used as a word of limitation, in the sense of "heirs," but is a word of purchase.

Error to Circuit Court, Monroe County.

Condemnation proceedings by the Interior & West Virginia Railroad Company against W. A. Epling and others. From the order, defendant W. A. Epling brings error, and the other defendants file cross-assignment of error. Cross-assignment sustained, and order reversed.

Rowan & Meadows, for plaintiff in error.
R. L. Clark, for defendants in error Pence.
J. H. Crosier, for defendants in error Williams' Heirs.

ROBINSON, J. The controversy grows out of the condemnation of a parcel of land for railroad right of way. No question, however, arises as to the direct condemnation proceedings. It is conceded that the land has been regularly taken and the money therefor paid into court. The question now submitted is: Who is entitled to the money paid for the land taken?

The answer to the question turns on a construction of the will of Andrew D. Crosier, made in 1878, and probated in 1886. He devised all his property to his wife for her natural life, and then further devised: "After the death of me and my wife my real & personal property is to be equally divided between my three daughters, Susan H. Matics, Paulina Williams & Mary J. Pence and then to their children forever." At the time the will was made, and at the death of the testator, each of the daughters was married and the two that are last named had children. The oldest daughter, Susan H. Matics, never had issue.

After the death of the widow, an equal partition of the land devised was made in pursuance of the will. Paulina Williams was then deceased, having left adult children. Later, deeds were executed by the two living daughters and the children of the deceased daughter, conveying the parcels as laid off in the partition. One parcel was conveyed to Susan H. Matics by Mary J. Pence and the children of Paulina Williams; another parcel was conveyed to Mary J. Pence by Susan H. Matics and the Williams children; and the remaining parcel was conveyed to the Williams children by the other two parties. These deeds were made in May, 1897. Each of the deeds erroneously recites that the land was devised by Andrew D. Crosler to his wife for life with remainder in fee simple to the daughters as joint tenants. In 1898, Susan H. Matics and husband conveyed to William Epling, the plaintiff in error, the parcel allotted to her by this partition. That parcel is the one from which has arisen the money now in contest. Before the condemnation proceedings were begun Susan H. Matics was deceased, and Mary J. Pence had departed this life, leaving children.

The condemnation proceedings evidently brought to the attention of the Williams and Pence children the claim which they now make. They claim that the three daughters by the terms of the will took only life estates. These children insist that they own the parcel of land which Susan H. Matics purported to convey to Epling. The circuit court held that the Williams and Pence children were entitled to this portion of the land after the death of Susan H. Matics. But the court seems also to have held that the Williams children were estopped by their deed in partition, and that, therefore, Epling had their interest in the land. An order was made giving to Epling, in the right of the Williams children, four-sevenths of the money, and to the Pence children three-sevenths thereof. Epling, insisting that he is entitled in fee simple to the land conveyed him by Susan H. Matics, has prosecuted this writ of error.

[1] By the plain import of the will, Epling must be denied any interest in the land. Susan H. Matics had only a life estate to convey to him and that life estate has now terminated. The will speaks for itself. We must give it the effect which the words used demand. The intention of the testator must be drawn from these words. There is no apparent ambiguity in the will to need clearing by resort to extrinsic evidence. The situation and surroundings of the testator as disclosed by the record do not tend to establish a meaning other than that disclosed by the words of the will.

[5] Nothing in the will indicates that the word "children" is used in a sense other than that which usually belongs to it. Nothing indicates that it is used as a word of limitation, in the sense of "heirs." It is ordinarily a word of purchase. The ordinary significance of the word is not changed by anything appearing in this case. 13 Enc. Dig. Va. & W. Va. 810.

The will gave to each daughter a life estate in the parcel that should fall to her in the equal division which the testator directed should be made among them. As to the parcel so allotted each daughter for life, her children were to take in remainder. What other import can reasonably be given the words "to be equally divided between my three daughters * * * and then to their children forever?" After an estate in each daughter ended, the land in which she enjoyed that estate was then to go to her children. The children of the daughters were then to take the parcels of their mothers, respectively. When the equal division of the land to the daughters had served them for their lives, then that division was to serve their children forever, or in fee. Clearly, remainders in the children are devised by the will. And clearly, those remainders reasonably refer to the parcels of land as allotted to the daughters. Since remainders in fee are given, the daughters could take only for life. The use of the word then bespeaks the ending of life estates in the daughters.

[2,3] The Williams and Pence children were living at the death of the testator. So they took, as a class, respectively, vested remainders in the parcels that should be allotted to their mothers. As to the Susan H. Matics parcel, however, the remainder was a contingent one, since she had no children at the death of the testator. The vesting of the remainder in the portion that should be allotted to her was contingent on her leaving issue. This remainder failed at the termination of her life estate, because she died childless. As to the parcel of the land which she took for life under the will, a remainderman never came into being. When her life estate ended, there was no one to take as the will devised. The will contained no residuary clause. The statute says that, in such event, the estate as to which the remainder fails shall go to the heirs-at-law of the testator. "Unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will, such real estate or interest therein as shall be comprised in any devise in such will, which shall fail or be void, or otherwise incapable of taking effect, shall be included in the residuary devise (if any) contained in such will; and if there be no residuary devise therein, such real estate or interest shall go to the heirs-at-law of the testator, as if he had died intestate." Code 1906, c. 77, § 18. Since the contingent remainder relating to the estate for life to Susan H. Matics failed, that estate went to the heirs-at-law of the testator. During all her life there was possibility of issue. Carney v. Kain, 40 W. Va. 758, 23 S. E. 650. The remainder, contingent upon her producing issue, did not fail until she died childless. When it did fail the estate to which it pertained became property as to which the testator was intestate. Until the failure of the contingency, the testator was testate as to that property. He did not die intestate as to it. He devised it by his will. That devise happened to fail after his death. The presumption against intestacy does not apply in this particular, nor argue against the construction which we have given the will.

Now, the heirs-at-law of Andrew D. Crosier, to whom the Susan H. Matics parcel descended when the contingent remainder in relation to it failed, were the Williams and Pence children—his grandchildren. Both of the other daughters died before the failure of this remainder. Their children were then the only heirs-at-law of Andrew D. Crosier. The land as to which the remainder failed descended to them. They were entitled to take per capita. "Whenever those entitled to partition are all in the same degree of kindred to the intestate, they shall take per capita or by person." Code 1908, c. 78, § 3. The Williams children were four in number—they were entitled to four-sevenths of the Susan H. Matics land. The Pence children were three in number—they were entitled to three-sevenths of that land. So the proportions of interest which the court below fixed are right.

[4] The court, however, erred in holding that Epling acquired the interest of the Williams children because of their joining in the partition deed to Susan H. Matics. That deed could give her no more than she was entitled to under the will, an allotment of land for life. The partition, though erroneously viewed by the parties, had no further effect than that which the will justified. Its effect was simply to set off, as the will directed, the land in three parcels for the separate enjoyment of life estates by the daughters, and the vesting of remainders in their children. That which was set off to Susan H. Matics could be so set off to her only for life—the will gave no other estate to her. The deed of the Williams children in partition simply defined what she was to enjoy for life and what was to go in remainder to her children if any she had. That deed must be considered as intended to do only what it could do in view of the provisions of the will. It could transfer nothing in fee, for in the portion of the land allotted to the Williams children by this same partition they retained all the fee title that had been vested in them as remaindermen to the life estate of their mother. Our holding in Shaffer v. Shaffer, 69 W. Va. 163, 71 S. E. 111, is here directly in point: "A deed between tenants in common, cotenants or coparceners, by which in an effort at partition, they each convey or quitclaim to the others, the portions allotted to them respectively, conveys no title to the grantee; it amounts simply to a severance of the unity of possession."

Nor does the partition deed estop the Williams children from claiming as heirs-at-law an interest in the Susan H. Matics parcel. Their interest in that land came to them by descent long after they made the partition deed. As we have shown, the deed was not one of conveyance, but one of partition. It did not convey land, but severed the unity of possession in land. Still, if considered a deed of conveyance, it is not of such character as to estop the grantors from claiming title thereafter acquired in the same land. It purports to convey only such right, title and interest as grantors have. It contains only covenants of special warranty. The title to the Matics land at the date of this deed was in a third party because of no act or default of the covenantors. Under such circumstances the after-acquired title does not vest in the covenantee and the covenantors are not estopped to assert claims thereto. Western Mining, etc., Co. v. Peytona Cannel Coal Co., 8 W. Va. 406.

The cross assignment of error submitted on behalf of the children of Paulina Williams is well taken and must be sustained. The order of the court below will be reversed and set aside. An order will be entered here directing the payment of four-sevenths of the money to the Williams children and the payment of three-sevenths thereof to the Pence children, as heirs-at-law of Andrew D. Crosier, deceased.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 102*)—ORDER IN EQUITY—STRIKING EVIDENTIAL MATTER FROM ANSWER.

An order in a chancery cause, sustaining exceptions to an answer and striking from it only evidential matter, without eliminating the allegations of defensive rights or denials of controverted averments of the bill, is not appealable.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Marshall County.

Bill by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company against the Wheeling Traction Company. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Dismissed.

Erskine & Allison, for appellant. Hooton & Hooton, for appellee.

POFFENBARGER, J. The material question presented by this record is the appealability of the decree complained of, which did nothing more than strike out, upon exception, certain portions of the defendant's answer to the plaintiff's bill, on which a preliminary injunction had been granted. The purpose of the suit is to enjoin the defendant, the Wheeling Traction Company, whose line of railway is constructed and operated on the public road, along a steep hillside, at a place called "The Narrows," between Wheeling and Moundsville, above the line of the plaintiff's steam railroad, located at the foot of the same hillside, from throwing earth, stone, timber, and other materials down upon or near the railroad track of the latter. The defense, set up by the answer, is a right, in the nature of an easement, to clear away landslides from said public road by removing the stone, earth, and other materials to the lower side thereof or over the bank and allowing them to pass on down the hill onto the plaintiff's right of way, or track, if need be. Expressing the opinion that denial, by the defendant, of its having interfered with the plaintiff's right of way, as charged, or its acquisition, by contract or prescription, or both, of a right to remove earth and other debris over plaintiff's right of way and track, were the only possible defenses, consistent with admitted rights, the circuit court struck out certain portions of the answer, deemed by it to be in conflict with that opinion.

In setting forth the defendant's claims and contentions, the answer, after having fully described the location and relative positions of the two railroads, detailed the history of the acquisition of their several rights. Originally, the county road occupied the present site of the plaintiff's railway. About the year 1852, that railway was built on said public road, and what is called a trail along the hillside above it was opened by the plaintiff for use in lieu thereof. Some time after this was done, the plaintiff was indicted for having obstructed the public road at the place in question. Then an agreement for arbitration was executed by the plaintiff and the county court of Marshall county. Under the articles of submission, an alternative award was made, giving the plaintiff the right either to pay to the county court $5,800 in full consideration of all the matters in difference submitted as aforesaid, presumably the estimated cost of acquiring the right of way for a new road and constructing the same, or to build and complete such new road and, in addition thereto, pay to the county $700, the estimated cost of removing future landslides. The plaintiff elected to do the latter, built a new road, and was relieved from further prosecution. This historical matter is a portion of what the court struck out of the answer. It then struck out matter to the following effect: That the award of $700 and payment thereof were not intended to relieve the plaintiff from the burden of caring for such slips or landslides, originating above the county road, as might come down upon its right of way or track, or, having lodged in the county road, as might be passed over the bank and afterwards proceed to the foot of the hill; that there was nothing in the agreement or award to indicate that the county authorities, in taking charge of the new road, should be under any obligation to relieve or protect the plaintiff from such slips; that it would have been easier for the plaintiff, on account of its location, to dispose of these landslides, than for the defendant to do so; that, if the court should require the defendant to replace the landslides, or provide a place or places of storage therefor, the plaintiff would be relieved from a very considerable pecuniary outlay, and given almost complete immunity from interruptions to its traffic resulting from landslides; that the defendant is a common carrier, transporting as many or more passengers than the plaintiff, wherefore the public convenience is interfered with as much by interruptions to its service by landslides as by like interruptions of the business of the plaintiff. All of the balance of the answer, explicitly stating and claiming the right or easement aforesaid, founded upon long-continued user, dating from about the year 1856, and an implied agreement arising out of the conduct of the parties, including assertion and exercise of such right, claimed under the county court of Marshall county, by virtue of a contract giving the defendant the use of the public road for its railway, on condition of its keeping it in repair, and acquiescence therein by the plaintiff for the long period of time aforesaid, was regarded and treated as proper matter of defense, and the plaintiff's exceptions thereto were accordingly overruled. The documentary evidence of the transactions between the county court and the plaintiff, consisting of copies of orders made and entered by said court, reciting the agreement, award, plaintiff's election and performance under the award, and the permission of the defendant to occupy the new county road in consideration of the payment of $3,000 and its agreement to keep the road in repair, was exhibited with the bill, and none of it was stricken out.

The statutory right of appeal from a decree settling the principles of a cause is not controverted, but the character of this decree has been discussed at very considerable length in the briefs; the appellant regarding it as an appealable one, and the appellee resisting this interpretation of it. Nor does there seem to be any very great difference of opinion among counsel as to what constitutes a settlement of the principles of a cause. Argument of the appellant proceeds upon the theory of the elimination from the answer, by the action of the trial court, of the only defense therein set up. While this claim is denied in the argument for the appellee, the denial is not supplemented by any analysis of the answer as it stood, before portions of it were stricken out, or any interpretation of it as it now is. In our opinion, the claim made in the brief for the appellant is entirely too broad. The eliminated portions of the answer did not constitute the sole defense, nor, indeed, any portion of the defense, set up. All that has been excluded or stricken out is mere matter of evidence and argument, based largely upon the documents which remain as exhibits filed with the answer. No claim of any right or easement is expressly asserted in the eliminated portions. That appears in those portions as to which the exceptions were overruled. In them is found, not only the assertion of the defendant's alleged right, by way of excuse for the acts complained of and justification thereof, together with the denial of some of the charges of the bill, but also a very full statement of the relevant and material facts.

As the court expressed the opinion in its decree that only certain defenses, hereinbefore stated, can be made, and filed a written opinion in which some of the contentions and claims set up in the answer are disapproved and declared to be untenable, it is probable that, in some subsequent decree, or on the final hearing, they will be partially or wholly disallowed; but the court has not proceeded that far yet. The opinion is accorded entirely too much scope and effect in the argument for the appealability of the decree. Properly considered, it is merely explanatory of the action of the court. It is only the reason given for what the court did, not that which was done. The opinion and the order, read in the light of the answer as it now stands, are not consistent. In other words, the opinion is far broader than the order. The court has not done all it intended to do, if the language of its opinion and order accurately reflects its views. The opinion is revocable and alterable, and the expressions may be retracted. An appealable decree, under the clause of the statute invoked, is one "adjudicating the principles of the cause." A mere declaration of opinion may foreshadow future action of the court, but does not adjudicate anything. For this reason, an order overruling or sustaining a demurrer is not appealable. Buehler v. Chevront, 15 W. Va. 479; Laidley v. Kline, 21 W. Va. 21; Watson v. Wigginton, 28 W. Va. 533. On the same principle, an appeal from a decree referring a cause to a commissioner, or recommitting it, is denied. Lodge v. Swann, 37 W. Va. 176, 16 S. E. 462; Hooper v. Hooper, 29 W. Va. 276, 1 S. E. 280. To be appealable, a decree must carry the sentence of the law or will of the court into effect. Armstrong v. Ross, 56 W. Va. 16, 48 S. E. 745; Hill v. Cronin, 56 W. Va. 174, 49 S. E. 132; Corley v. Corley, 53 W. Va. 142, 44 S. E. 132, 47 S. E. 145.

Another rule, requiring adjudication of all the principles of the cause as a requisite of appealability, would necessitate dismissal of this appeal. If it be conceded that the order goes beyond elimination of evidential matter and actually adjudicates something, it clearly does not settle all the principles of the cause. The answer still contains defensive matter. That a decree, to be appealable, must settle all the principles of the cause, has been repeatedly decided. Hill v. Cronin, 56 W. Va. 174, 49 S. E. 132; Hooper v. Hooper, 29 W. Va. 276, 283, 1 S. E. 280; Shirey v. Musgrave, 29 W. Va. 131, 11 S. E. 914; Hill v. Als, 27 W. Va. 215; Laidley v. Kline, 21 W. Va. 21; Camden v. Haymond, 9 W. Va. 680; Steenrod v. Railroad Co., 25 W. Va. 133; Buehler v. Chevront, 15 W. Va. 479.

Having been improvidently awarded, the appeal will be dismissed.

ASSIGNMENTS FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS
(§ 312*) — CLAIMS PROVABLE — SECURED CLAIMS.

Where a debtor makes a general assignment of all his property for the benefit of all his creditors, a secured creditor is entitled to prove and receive dividends upon the face of his claim as it stood at the time of the assignment, or declaration of insolvency, without crediting the value of his security or the proceeds of the sale thereof, made in a suit brought by the assignee to convene the creditors and wind up the affairs of the debtor's estate.

Poffenbarger, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pocahontas County.

Suit by Andrew Price, trustee, against the Hosterman Lumber Company and others. From the decree, Uriah Hevener appeals. Reversed.

W. A. Bratton and F. R. Hill, for appellant. Price, Oseinton & Horan, for appellee.

MILLER, J. The point of the syllabus is fairly supported by our case of Williams v. Overholt, 46 W. Va. 340, 33 S. E. 226; but more particularly by Merrill v. National Bank, 173 U. S. 136, 19 Sup. Ct. 360, 43 L. Ed. 640; Aldrich v. Chemical National Bank, 176 U. S. 639, 20 Sup. Ct. 498, 44 L. Ed. 611; Bank v. Armstrong, 59 Fed. 380, 8 C. C. A. 163, 28 L. R. A. 231; Bank v. Williametta, etc., Co. (C. C.) 80 Fed. 227; Doe v. N. W. Coal & Transp. Co. (C. C.) 78 Fed. 72; Central Trust Co. v. Richmond, etc., Co., 68 Fed. 99, 15 C. C. A. 273, 41 L. R. A. 458; Bank v. Trigg, 106 Va. 327, 56 S. E. 153.

Applying this rule of these cases to the case at bar the decree below, appealed from, in so far as it deprives the appellant Uriah Hevener, a vendor creditor, and a general creditor, of his right to share in the distribution of general fund belonging to the debtor's estate, on the basis of the entire debt proven and decreed in his favor, including his debt for purchase money, must be reversed, and corrected in accordance with the rule promulgated in the syllabus.

POFFENBARGER, J. (dissenting). The rule applied here is purely technical and artificial, and wholly fails to produce an equitable result. For that reason, I am unable to agree to it. The authorities are divided upon the question, and, in the federal Supreme Court, there was a division as nearly equal as possible. Merrill v. Bank, 173 U. S. 181, 19 Sup. Ct. 360, 43 L. Ed. 640. The dissenters were Justices White, Harlan, McKenna, and Gray. Some of the state courts have since followed the views of the dissenters and rejected those of the majority. Bank v. Duncan, 84 Miss. 467, 36 South. 690; Chemical Co. v. Edwards, 186 N. C. 73, 48 S. E. 568. The attempt to justify the rule upon the theory of a legal right in the creditor beyond power of control by a court of equity is well answered in Bank Commissioners v. Trust Co., 70 N. H. 536, 49 Atl. 113. In some states, the so-called chancery rule never has been recognized. Bell v. Fleming's Ex'rs, 12 N. J. Eq. 13; Washburn v. Tisdale, 143 Mass. 376, 9 N. E. 741; Bank v. Bank, 138 Mass. 515; Bank v. Woodward, 137 Mass. 412; Hale v. Leatherbee, 175 Mass. 547, 549, 56 N. E. 562.

Our case of Williams v. Overholt, 46 W. Va. 340, 33 S. E. 226, may well be distinguished. The collaterals held by the creditor there were not brought into the suit nor reduced to money. Their value was unknown and no doubt insusceptible of certain proof. Here the security has been reduced to money and applied on the debt. This done, there remained really due the creditor comparatively a small part of the original debt.

Finally, the rule has been abolished by statute in many cases because of its unjust results.

GOOCH v. GOOCH et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 28, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. RIGHT OF ACTION—PERSONAL REPRESENTATIVES.

Is a personal representative given exclusive right over creditors, for six months after qualification, to bring the suit provided for by section 7, c. 86, Code 1906, to subject real estate of a decedent to payment of debts?

2. BILL IN EQUITY—SALE OF REALTY—SUFFICIENCY OF PERSONAL ESTATE.

Must a bill in equity under section 7, c. 86, Code 1906, to subject real estate of a decedent to debts, allege the insufficiency of his personal estate to pay his debts?

3. CONTRACTS (§ 79*)—CONSIDERATION—MORAL OBLIGATION.

When there is by law no enforceable obligation to pay, a promise made afterwards to pay wants legal consideration, and is not enforceable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 357-381; Dec. Dig. § 79.*]

4. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 92*)—CONSIDERATION—PAST PAYMENTS.

A promissory note given by a son to his widowed mother for money paid by her for his board while at college and his college education, after such expenditure, without promise or expectation of repayment on the part of either, at the time of such expenditure, wants legal consideration, and is not enforceable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. §§ 166-212; Dec. Dig. § 92.*]

5. CONTRACTS (§ 76*)—CONSIDERATION—MORAL OBLIGATION.

A merely moral obligation, though not illegal, is not a consideration for a promise to make that promise enforceable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 357-381; Dec. Dig. § 76.*]

6. SUBROGATION (§ 3*)—PRINCIPAL AND SURETY—RIGHT TO CONTRIBUTION.

A codebtor, not principal debtor, paying a debt secured by a deed of trust executed by both on their land, may have subrogation to the right of the creditor for contribution against his codebtor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Subrogation, Cent. Dig. §§ 8-11; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

7. SUBROGATION (§ 41*)—EFFECT OF LIMITATIONS.

A deed of trust binding land of several debtors for a debt paid by one not principal debtor, and released by the creditor, is kept alive in equity to give contribution to the debtor paying against a codebtor, notwithstanding such release, and though action at law for contribution is barred by the statute of limitations. Laches, not statutory limitation, may bar such subrogation.

8. INTEREST (§ 39*)—ITEMS—INTEREST ON JUDGMENT.

It is error to give interest on the sum of principal and interest computed to a date prior to decree. Interest on the sum of principal and interest at date of decree should be given from date of decree.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Interest, Cent. Dig. §§ 83-89; Dec. Dig. § 39.*]

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

9. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 444*)—ACTIONS—PARTIES.

In an action against decedent's estate, where the bill names one of the defendants as executrix, and alleges that she was nominated as executrix by the will and in pursuance of such nomination had been acting as such, the bill is not subject to demurrer on the ground that the qualified personal representative is not before the court, though it does not state that she qualified by giving a bond and taking the oath prescribed by law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1813-1841; Dec. Dig. § 444.*]

10. SUBROGATION (§ 41*)—NATURE OF REMEDY—EQUITY JURISDICTION.

A bill alleging that plaintiff and others executed a deed of trust on land, and that the plaintiff paid the debt secured, and has been repaid no part thereof by the other parties executting the deed of trust, and seeking to recover contribution and to subject the real estate covered by the trust deed in possession of a decedent's estate, is within the jurisdiction of equity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Subrogation, Dec. Dig. § 41.*]

11. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 325*)
—ACTIONS—SALE OF REALTY.

An executrix and sole devisee who refuses to present her accounts as executrix as demanded by a decree cannot complain that it was not ascertained whether the personal estate would pay indebtedness before a sale of realty was had.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1339-1341; Dec. Dig. § 325.*]

12. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 346*)
—SALE—DECREE—ASSIGNMENT OF DOWER.

It is error to decree the sale of land of a decedent's estate subject to dower, instead of assigning dower therefrom.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Dec. Dig. § 346.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Summers County.

Suit by Ellen A. Gooch against Josephine L. Gooch and others. From a decree for plaintiff, defendant Josephine L. Allen (née Gooch) appeals. Reversed and remanded.

McGinnis & Hatcher, O. P. Fitzgerald, Jr., and Brown, Jackson & Knight, for appellant. T. N. Read and R. F. Dunlap, for appellee.

BRANNON, J. Ellen A. Gooch brought a chancery suit against the executrix and other representatives of the estate of her dead son, J. A. Gooch, to compel a settlement of the accounts of said executrix, and sell the real estate owned by her son to pay debts due her. A decree was entered in favor of the plaintiff for her demands against the estate and subjecting certain real estate of the dead son to sale. Josephine L. Allen, the widow, executrix, and devisee of J. A. Gooch, appeals.

[1] There was a demurrer to the bill. One ground of demurrer is that section 7, c. 86, Code, gives six months preference after qualification to the personal representative to bring a suit to administer the real assets of a decedent before a creditor can do so, and that this bill does not say whether a suit had or had not been brought by the executrix, or when she qualified. Is a creditor thus compelled to wait for six months after the qualification of a personal representative before he can bring a suit to subject the realty of a dead man to his debts? As we hold this to be a suit to enforce subrogation, we do not decide this point. Speaking only for myself, it does seem that the statute gives the personal representative preference for six months, and delays the creditor. The creditor could always sue the personal estate in equity. Then, when the statute made land liable for the debts of the dead man, he could sue the land for the same reason that he could sue the personalty—that is, that he has a debt for which the land is liable—but the lawmakers saw proper to give a time to the administrator to see whether the personalty would pay debts, without recourse to the land, as he would know best as to this. This is given as a reason for this preference in the Underwood Case, 22 W. Va. 306. It was not intended that any creditor should sue the realty until a reasonable time had been given the administrator to ascertain as to sufficiency of the personal assets, and gives him exclusive right of suit for six months. It was further intended to protect the estate from loss by numerous suits, and give the personal representative power, for a time, to bring suit for all creditors. I incidentally express this opinion in Rowan v. Chenoweth, 49 W. Va. 290, 38 S. E. 544, 87 Am. St. Rep. 796. I submit that Judge Snyder and Woods so construed section 7. Reinhardt v. Reinhardt, 21 W. Va. 76; Broderick v. Broderick, 28 W. Va. 385. Judge Dent so construed those cases in Poling v. Huffman, 39 W. Va. 320, 19 S. E. 421. The last case and Hale v. White, 47 W. Va. 700, 35 S. E. 884, seem contra. But are they? Judge Dent admits the rule above stated, but seems to place those cases on special facts taking them out of the rule. What is the plain import of section 7? So, I would say that a bill filed under section 7 should show that six months had elapsed after the qualification of the personal representative, and that no suit had been brought by him.

[2] It is also urged that the bill does not state that the personal assets are not sufficient to pay debts, and that it is therefore bad on demurrer. Section 7, c. 86, gives a suit to charge lands with debts "when the personal estate of a decedent is insufficient for the payments of his debts." Remember that this statute recognizes the rule that land shall not be made liable to debts of a dead man except when the personalty is inadequate. Therefore I would say without hesitation that a bill under section 7 must aver that the personalty is inadequate. Such inadequacy is a condition precedent to such suit. But we do not so decide, because this is a suit for subrogation, not one resting on section 7.

[3] Another ground of demurrer is that the qualified personal representative must be before the court. That is so; but she is. This point is made on the fact that the bill named as a defendant "Josephine L. Gooch, executrix." The bill alleges that she was nominated as executrix by the will, "and in pursuance of said nomination has been acting as such." It is claimed that the bill ought to say that she qualified by giving bond and taking the oath prescribed by law. We do not think this point substantial. It is technical. True, the statute says that an executor shall not have powers as such until he qualify by taking oath and giving bond; but we think the presumption would be that the executrix has so qualified as it is averred that she was acting as such.

[10] Next subject. Has equity jurisdiction of this case? We answer that it has. The bill says that J. A. Gooch, C. H. Gooch, and the plaintiff Ellen A. Gooch made to Fox a note of $850 to raise money to pay off debts owing by B. P. Gooch, husband of Ellen A. Gooch, and father of J. A. Gooch and Charles Gooch, and secured it by deed of trust on the real estate left by B. P. Gooch, which deed of trust was on the real estate sought to be subjected in this suit, which deed of trust is an exhibit of the bill, and that the plaintiff as one of the makers of the note paid the note, and that J. A. Gooch never paid the plaintiff his part of the note, and that the plaintiff was entitled to have contribution from his estate of one-third of the sum paid by her, and claimed the right to subject the real estate covered by the trust deed, the third descending to J. A. Gooch from his father, for his portion of the debt. It is claimed that the bill does not sufficiently aver the facts authorizing subrogation. We think, as the bill alleges the execution of the deed of trust and exhibits it, that it is sufficient in this respect.

[8] It is claimed that there is no right of subrogation or subrogation in favor of a debtor against a codebtor, as this deed of trust was released. We believe it is not claimed that a surety may not have contribution against a cosurety. That he has is well established. Sheldon on Subrogation, § 140; Wheatley v. Calhoun, 12 Leigh (Va.) 264, 37 Am. Dec. 654; 27 Am. & Ency. L. 223; opinion in Sands v. Durham, 99 Va. 263, 38 S. E. 145, 54 L. R. A. 614, 86 Am. St. Rep. 884, and note. But the claim is that, as the deed of trust was released, the deed of trust was dead, and there could be no subrogation, that the release reverted the title to the maker of the trust, and, until that release should be set aside by a legal adjudication, there could be no subrogation. Some authorities support this position; but it is untenable under our law and a great weight of authority. A release does not prevent subrogation. 27 Am. Eng. Ency. L. 213; Sheldon on Subrogation, § 14. When payment is made, or release is made, the debt is dead in a court of law; but equity keeps it alive for the benefit of the surety or cosurety. A judgment paid is ended at law, but equity keeps it alive for the benefit of the surety. What is the difference between a receipt in full and a release? A multitude of authorities say that payment does not satisfy the judgment or other lien as between the debtor and surety. Therefore we hold that the plaintiff is entitled to subrogation under the deed of the trust.

[7] But it is said that, though there was once a right to subrogation, it is lost by the statute of limitation of five years, the period applicable to the case of a surety demanding payment or contribution of his principal or cosurety. True, action at law would be barred; but this case is governed by the principle of subrogation. The party claims the right in equity under a deed of trust. A deed of trust has no limitation by statute. It is only subject to laches. Presumption of payment in 20 years bars it, unless repelled by evidence. The creditor has that limitation. He is not sooner barred. The surety takes the creditor's shoes, and can avail himself of the creditor's rights. So can the codebtor. The statute of five years does not apply. We are referred to Thayer v. Daniels, 110 Mass. 346. That is no authority, as it was an action at law, and I have said above that a law five years would bar; but we have a suit in equity for subrogation. The other case referred to is Junker v. Rush, 136 Ill. 179, 26 N. E. 499, 11 L. R. A. 183. That does support the contention, but contrary to a great volume of authority. It is a well-known principle that a note secured by a deed of trust may be barred, but that fact does not bar the lien of that deed, the note being one thing, the mortgage another; the one dead, the other yet alive. The creditor could not maintain action on the note, but could resort to his mortgage, though his note is barred. The surety takes the shoes of the creditor, and, as long as the creditor's right would not be barred, neither would the right of the surety. Criss v. Criss, 28 W. Va. 388; Evans v. Johnson, 39 W. Va. 209, 19 S. E. 623, 23 L. R. A. 737, 45 Am. St. Rep. 912. It is claimed that the trustee and creditor under the deed of trust should be parties, but are not. Why so? The deed of trust has been paid so that the creditor has no right. The deed of trust has been released, and the title has been divested from the trustee and reverted to the vendor or his heirs. What right has either involved in this suit? So we conclude that the plaintiff is entitled to contribution under the deed of trust for the Fox debt.

[4] Another subject. Another demand of the plaintiff against the estate of J. A. Gooch is based on a promissory note made by J. A. Gooch to his mother for $2,000. This has been to me the only serious aspect of the case. It is claimed that this note rests on no binding consideration. The plaintiff herself states under oath that she paid out money for the education at college of her son J. A. Gooch without any contract or understanding that he would repay her, and that she did not expect any repayment. Years afterwards, in consideration of money which she had so paid, he voluntarily gave her this note. That is really the consideration. Is that binding to make the note enforceable? We have several times decided in effect that, where a son claims for service rendered the father, he cannot recover, unless he proves an express contract or the facts clearly show an expectation or intention on the part of the father to pay for the service. Cann v. Cann, 40 W. Va. 138, 20 S. E. 910; Riley v. Riley, 38 W. Va. 283, 18 S. E. 569; Harris v. Orr, 46 W. Va. 261, 33 S. E. 257, 76 Am. St. Rep. 815. I cite here the many cases found in 7 Ency. Digst. Va. & W. Va. Reports 304, for the proposition that the law does not raise or imply a promise to pay for services or maintenance or education of a son by a parent on which an action can be based. There was not even a moral obligation on the part of the son to pay the mother for money paid for his education. There was no promise made at the time.

[5] "A moral obligation, though coupled with an express promise, will not constitute a valuable consideration, and it is only where there is a precedent duty which would create a sufficient legal or equitable right if there had been an express promise at the time, or where there is a precedent consideration, that an express promise will create or revive a cause of action." Daniel on Nego. Instruments, § 182.

[3] I lay down the proposition that to support an action on a contract there must be a consideration enforceable at law, and that an express promise can only revive a precedent good consideration which might have been enforced at law through the medium of an implied promise, had it not been suspended by some positive rule of law, but can give no original cause of action if the obligation on which it is founded never could have been enforced at law, though not barred by any legal maxim or statute. 39 Am. St. Rep. 735. In that great work, Page on Contracts, § 319, p. 484, we read as follows: "Past services when rendered under such circumstances as to create no legal liability are not a consideration for a subsequent promise. Illustrations of such services are those rendered by father to son; past services rendered to a father by his daughters without any agreement for compensation; services rendered by a niece living in the family; support furnished a minor daughter by her mother, or medical attendance rendered to an adult." The same work, in section 310, says that, "if the promise invoked as a consideration is itself unenforceable for some reason outside the form of promise, it cannot be enforced." Where a father made an advancement to a child, and later the child gave the father his note for its repayment, the note was held not good. Page on Contracts, § 319. There we find that past consideration is no consideration under circumstances not creating liability. I would cite for these principles 9 Cyc. 356; Stoneburner v. Motley, 95 Va. 788, 30 S. E. 364; Bailey v. Devine, 123 Ga. 653, 51 S. E. 603, 107 Am. St. Rep. 153; Shugart v. Shugart, 111 Tenn. 174, 76 S. W. 821, 102 Am. St. Rep. 779; Ogden on Notes, 60. As will be seen in the notes in 39

Am. St. Rep. 735, there has been conflict of authority on this subject, older English decisions holding such promises valid; but later English decisions and the great current of American authority holding such consideration as is present in this case is not good for a subsequent promise. This note was given years after the mother had spent money for her son's education without any promise or expectation, at the time, on the part of either of payment. The mother states, also, that she was distressed about not being able to dispose of a house, and the son said to her to sell it, and he would give her the note. It is not distinct what this meant. But this constitutes no shadow of consideration. So we must conclude that this note is not enforceable, and it was error to decree it against the estate of J. A. Gooch.

[11] Josephine Gooch cannot complain that it was not ascertained whether the personal estate would pay indebtedness. She refused to present her accounts as executrix as demanded by decree, and would not reveal the personalty, and, being sole devisee and the only appellant, cannot complain of this.

[12] It is complained that sale was decreed subject to the dower of Ellen A. Gooch, widow of B. P. Gooch. This is error. Provision as to it should have been made. Sommerville v. Sommerville, 26 W. Va. 484. Nor was any provision made as to dower of Josephine Gooch.

[8] There is error in decreeing interest from 1st day of October, 1907. Interest on principal should have been brought down to date of decree, and interest given on total from that date.

Too much was decreed for taxes paid by Ellen A. Gooch; but this was not excepted to.

We reverse the decree, and remand the cause for further proceeding.

WILSON et al. v. BUSH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 28, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 480*)—OPERATION—FIRES—PRESUMPTIONS AND BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action for damages by fire alleged to have been caused by the negligence of a railroad company, proof of communication of the fire from an engine of the company raises a presumption of negligence, which the defendant must repel by showing proper construction, equipment, and operation of the engine, to escape liability.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1709-1716; Dec. Dig. § 480.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 454*)—OPERATION—FIRES—INSTRUCTIONS.

It is error to instruct the jury in such a case that the defendant must prove its engine was equipped "with the best approved appliance for preventing the escape of fire."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1668-1671; Dec. Dig. § 454.*]

3. RAILROADS (§ 484*)—OPERATION—FIRES—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

An owner of lumber depositing it on premises of a railway company adjacent to its right of way, in common with others, primarily for shipment and incidentally for storage and preparation for shipment, in conformity with a license, usage, and practice of long standing, at a place at which no railway agent is maintained, and at which rubbish and debris have accumulated on the track, the vacant strip alongside of it and the ground on which the lumber has been placed, and a dilapidated shed and platform, used for storage and loading stand, is not guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law.

4. RAILROADS (§ 459*)—OPERATION—FIRES—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Assuming evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant, the plaintiff's right to recover, in such a state of the evidence of contributory negligence, is tested by the inquiry whether he exercised such care and caution as a reasonably prudent and careful man would have exercised under like circumstances in placing his lumber upon the premises without providing for its care by some person.

5. RAILROADS (§ 485*)—OPERATION—FIRES—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for fire caused by the operation of a railroad, an instruction that the railroad company had the right to operate its trains by the use of fire for the generation of steam, that plaintiffs must prove negligence in respect to its engines as a requisite to liability, and that plaintiffs assumed all risk of loss if the defendant operated its engines in a lawful manner and with reasonable care and skill, was erroneous in omitting the element of duty of the railroad company as to care of its track and right of way.

Error to Circuit Court, Randolph County.

Action by Mark S. Wilson and another, partners under the firm name of Wilson Bros., against B. F. Bush, receiver. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

Benj. A. Richmond and E. A. Bowers, for plaintiff in error. Talbott & Hoover, for defendants in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. Wilson Bros. recovered a judgment for $935 against B. F. Bush, receiver of the Western Maryland Railroad Company, as the value of certain lumber destroyed by fire, occasioned by alleged negligence of the defendant.

[1] The refusal of the court to give defendant's instruction No. 2, placing upon the plaintiffs the burden of proving failure of the defendant to use ordinary care and prudence in selection of spark arresters for the engines from which the fire originated and in operating said engines and keeping the spark arresters in repair, is assigned as error. This instruction was properly refused for two reasons. It does not correctly propound the law. After a fire has been shown to have started from sparks emitted by an engine of a railroad company, the burden is upon the defendant to show that its engine was in good repair, properly equipped, and operated. Jacobs v. Railway Co., 68 W. Va. 618, 70 S. E. 369. Inconsistent doctrine is not enunciated in Snyder v. Railroad Co., 11 W. Va. 14. The clause in the third proposed instruction in that case, found in the syllabus thereof and relied upon here, was there disapproved. If it were a sound proposition, it was given as a part of defendant's instruction No. 5, and also substantially given in his instruction No. 3. Instructions need not be repeated. The defendant thus appears to have had more favorable rulings, upon the subject-matter of his instruction No. 2, than he was entitled to.

[2] As an instruction, given at the instance of the plaintiffs over the objection of the defendant, pertaining to the duty of the latter in respect to the equipment of his engines, and made the subject of an assignment of error, stands closer in logical connection to the one just disposed of than any of the others, it will be now considered. By it the jury were told the defendant was under a duty to equip his engine "with the best approved appliances for preventing the escape of fire." In some instances courts have defined the duty of railroad companies in this connection by the use of the terms "best approved" and "most approved," but these expressions have been qualified by additional terms, such as "in common use," "of practical use," or "which has been approved by actual test." Railroad Co. v. Bailey, 222 Ill. 480, 78 N. E. 833; Mills v. Railroad Co., 116 Ky. 309, 76 S. W. 29; 33 Cyc. 1333. This qualification gives the jury some measure or standard by which to determine whether the equipment is the "best approved" or "most approved." Without it they may determine it in such manner as may seem to them right and just, but in so doing they may adopt an entirely erroneous test. It is well settled, even in those states in which this measure of responsibility is adopted, that a railroad company is not bound to accept and use or experiment with every new invention, or one which is accorded preference in the opinion of mechanics or other experts. The element of test by experience is a necessary one. In those jurisdictions in which the rule above stated obtains this instruction would be apparently bad for omission of the limitation we have mentioned.

Most of the decisions in which this strict rule is observed are governed to some extent by statutes defining the duties of railroad companies in respect to equipment. There may be some instances in which it rests solely upon supposed common-law principles; but the great weight of authority throughout the country requires of railroads no more than reasonable and ordinary care in the equipment of their engines. "As a general rule, it is the duty of a railroad company to use reasonable precautions to provide locomotives so constructed and equipped as to avoid the unnecessary communication of fire to premises adjoining its road." 33 Cyc. 1332. The requirement of such a degree of care plainly does not impose duty to adopt the utmost precautions against injury, nor make the railway company an insurer against damage to property on its right of way or premises adjoining it. Accordingly, courts generally hold railroad companies not absolutely bound to use the safest and best appliances to prevent the escape of sparks. "It is the duty of railway companies to adopt and use on their locomotives approved appliances in general use to prevent the escape of sparks and fire. * * * A railway company is not bound to adopt any particular kind of appliances or machinery for the prevention of fires, and it cannot be held guilty of negligence for failing to adopt a different kind or pattern of appliances than that which it has adopted, if it has exercised reasonable care in the selection and the latter is approved and in general use." Elliott on Railroads, § 1224; Railway Co. v. Reese, 85 Ala. 497, 5 South. 283, 7 Am. St. Rep. 66; Railway Co. v. Thompson-Hailey Co., 79 Ark. 12, 94 S. W. 707; Clisby v. Railway Co., 78 Miss. 937, 29 South. 913; Flinn v. Railroad Co., 142 N. Y. 11, 36 N. E. 1046; Bottoms v. Railroad Co., 136 N. C. 472, 49 S. E. 348. This rule is in accord with the general principle applicable to persons using fire upon their own premises. Nothing beyond reasonable care and prudence under the circumstances of the particular case is required. Mahaffey v. Lumber Co., 61 W. Va. 571, 56 S. E. 893, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1263. What amounts to reasonable and ordinary care is not determinable by any arbitrary rule, of course. As the use of fire is attended by varying conditions of duration, weather, and exposure, the exercise of ordinary care includes the adoption of methods and measures of safety, determinable by such conditions. One who uses fire constantly would naturally fall under a higher degree of duty than one who uses it only casually and to a limited extent. But "reasonable care" is all that can be required under any circumstances, and the adoption by a railroad company of those inventions and mechanisms generally used for the purpose of preventing the escape of fire, reasonably well adapted to the purpose and efficient, as shown by the test of experience, is obviously the exercise of such care. As to what is the best approved appliance, reasonable men though qualified by experience in the use thereof, might differ in opinion, and jurors might differ from the uniform opinion of such persons, and all might well agree that the appliances, subjected to the comparative test, are all reasonably well adapted to the prevention of fire and in extensive use by railroad companies, all honestly differing in opinion on the question of relative merit. We are therefore of the opinion that this instruction was clearly erroneous, in that it propounded a wrong test or measure of duty and also may have confused and misled the jury.

[3] The rejection of defendant's instructions Nos. 6 and 7 is complained of. On the right of way and the yards upon which the lumber had been placed there was an accumulation of inflammable rubbish, due to the storage and loading of lumber, pulp wood, tan bark, and other products of the forest at that point. Besides, an old shed and platform, standing near the railroad, were in such condition from dilapidation and decay as to render them likely to ignite easily. In the shed the plaintiffs had stored about 12,500 feet of cherry lumber, and, outside of it, stacked about 40,000 feet of maple lumber. The latter had been sold and was awaiting shipment, but the other had not. Years before the occurrence of this fire, the shipment of lumber from that point had been heavy, and the railway company then operating the road maintained a regular station there with an agent in charge; but for a considerable period of time prior to the occurrence of the fire the company had ceased to maintain an agent at that point. However, lumber was still brought there for storage and shipment in smaller quantities than it had been in previous years. The shed and platform, though on the railway company's premises, it being the owner of a large tract of land through which the railway ran, but not on the portion thereof used for a right of way, had been built by the lumber company. That company, having completed its large operations, left these structures standing on the premises, and they had ever since been used by the plaintiffs and others for shipping and storing lumber with the acquiescence of the railway company. Defendant's instruction No. 6 was based upon these facts as constituting evidence of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiffs in placing their lumber upon these premises, with knowledge of the conditions and without adopting any measures to protect it from fire. It proposed to submit to the jury, upon the evidence, the question of the existence of these conditions, and have the court tell them their verdict must be for the defendant, if they should find such facts, even though there was some evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant. As the defendant acquiesced in the use of the premises for the purposes aforesaid by the plaintiffs and others engaged in the lumber business at that place, his title to the premises seems to be an immaterial matter. In making such use of the property plaintiffs were not trespassers. They were licensees, making a use of the property which bore some relation to the defendant's own business. They brought their lumber there for shipment. This was the main purpose. Storage and preparation for shipment were subordinate and incidental uses. As long as the defendant permitted such use and accepted lumber at that point for shipment, such occupation and use of the premises may well be deemed to have rested upon invitation.

[4] The relation of the parties, therefore, was analogous to that subsisting between a railroad company and an owner of adjacent property, each of whom is under some degree of duty. The owner of land adjacent to a railroad may rightfully make use of his property. Fair Ass'n v. Railway Co., 42 Neb. 105, 60 N. W. 330; Murphy v. Railway Co., 45 Wis. 222, 30 Am. Rep. 721; Railway Co. v. Pennell, 94 Ill. 448. In doing so, however, he must observe and consider the hazard or danger of fire incident to the operation of the railroad, and, if he does an act or omits a precaution, which will obviously result in injury to his premises or movable property thereon, he cannot recover. In the use of his property he must respect the right of the railroad company to make reasonable use of its property. Coates v. Railroad Co., 61 Mo. 38; Brown v. Railroad Co., 41 Wash. 688, 84 Pac. 400; Murphy v. Railway Co., 45 Wis. 222, 30 Am. Rep. 721; Railroad Co. v. Owen, 25 Kan. 419; Railroad Co. v. Pennell, 94 Ill. 448; Railway Co. v. Crabb (Tex. Civ. App.) 80 S. W. 408. And, on the other hand, railway companies must exercise reasonable and ordinary care not to injure the adjacent property. Each has the right to use his own property, and is bound to abstain from conduct which will obviously and necessarily injure that of his neighbor. Nevertheless, the great diversity of facts and circumstances entering into the question of risk or hazard deprives the courts, in most instances, of the power to say as matter of law that certain facts established by the evidence impose liability or defeat recovery. The probability of danger arising out of a given condition or state of facts is generally a practical question about which reasonable men may differ in opinion, and in such cases the question of negligence on the part of the defendant or contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff generally lies within the province of the jury, and not of the court. Whether the plaintiffs assumed the risk of danger to their lumber or must be deemed to have known they were taking upon themselves a hazard depends upon the imminency of that danger and the probability of injury. Their right to recover, therefore, depends upon the exercise or nonexercise by them of such a degree of care and prudence, as ordinarily cautious and prudent men would have exercised under like circumstances. The instruction requested omits this vital element. If given, it would have told the jury they must hold the plaintiffs guilty of contributory negligence if they found certain facts, not if they should be of the opinion, in view of the facts found, that the plaintiffs had neglected the exercise of the degree of care above defined. Hence we think the court did not err in refusing the instruction. This conclusion is probably justified by another omission, if its theory were correct. It does not include the important element of long use of the yard without a loss from fire. For years other people had done just what these plaintiffs did without loss, and this circumstance in evidence bears directly upon the nature and extent of the hazard.

[5] Instruction No. 7 was properly refused because it unduly narrowed the duty and responsibility of the defendant. Properly asserting the right of the railway company to operate its trains by the use of fire for the generation of steam, and asserting necessity of proof of negligence in respect to its engines as a requisite to liability, it said the plaintiffs assumed all risk of loss of their lumber, if the defendant operated its engines in a lawful manner and with reasonable care and skill. It thus omitted the element of duty on the part of the defendant respecting the care of its track and right of way. In other words, all that it assumes as matter of law as likely to be established by the evidence in the opinion of the jury might be true, and yet the defendant would be liable for failure properly to care for its track. In view of a large amount of lumber piled up in close proximity to its road, upon its invitation and with its consent, and knowledge of its exposure to injury by reason of the non-maintenance by the owner of any caretaker or protector, the defendant could not justly nor consistently with law allow an accumulation of rubbish on its right of way likely to be ignited by such sparks as necessarily escape from engines and to carry the fire from the right of way to the lumber or to other rubbish which would convey it to the lumber. "As it is impossible to entirely prevent the escape of sparks and coals of fire from railway locomotives, and as the sparks and coals that do escape usually fall on the right of way, it is held that it is the duty of a railway company to keep its track and right of way free from dry grass, weeds, and other combustible materials which are liable to be ignited by sparks and coals of fire and thus communicate fire to the premises of others, and, if it fails to discharge this duty and permits the fire to escape to adjoining premises, it may be found guilty of negligence." Elliott, Railroads, § 1226. This text, as well as some not here quoted, is sustained by abundant authority. In view of the acquiescence of the defendant in the use of the adjacent premises for the purposes for which they were used, establishing for all practical purposes the relation which subsists between a railway company and the owner of adjacent premises, we think the principle clearly applicable here and fully justified the court in refusing this instruction.

In holding the question of contributory negligence to be one for jury determination, in passing upon the propriety of the rejection of defendant's instruction No. 6, we have incidentally decided the only remaining questions, namely, whether the court erred in refusing a request to direct a verdict in favor of the defendant and in overruling a motion to set aside the verdict. In this conclusion we decline to follow the decision in Post v. Railroad Co., 108 Pa. 585, relied upon by the plaintiff in error. Comparison of the opinions will reveal the difference in views leading to diverse results. Hence comment is unnecessary.

For the error in giving plaintiffs' instruction No. 1, the judgment must be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial.

WALTON v. CHEROKEE COLLIERY CO.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 28, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 319*)—INJURIES TO THIRD PERSON—INDEPENDENT CONTRACTORS.

Generally, if one let work, lawful within itself, to a contractor and retain no control over the manner of its performance, he is not liable on account of negligence of the contractor or his servants. But, if the work is intrinsically dangerous, or is of such character that injury to third persons, or to their property, might reasonably be expected to result directly from its performance, if reasonable care should be omitted, the employer is not relieved from liability by delegating the performance of the work to an independent contractor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1259, 1260; Dec. Dig. § 319.*]

2. INDEMNITY (§ 3*)—EXPRESS CONTRACT—VALIDITY.

A contractor who engages to perform such work can bind himself by a promise to indemnify his employer against liability to third persons.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indemnity, Cent. Dig. §§ 2-6; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

3. INDEMNITY (§ 11*)—EXPRESS CONTRACT—RIGHT OF ACTION.

The employer may settle, without suit, the damage against which he is indemnified, and recoup the same in an action brought by the contractor for the price of the work, provided, however, the amount paid does not exceed the damage actually suffered. A settlement thus made between the indemnitee and the party injured is not conclusive on the indemnitor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indemnity, Cent. Dig. §§ 21-25; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

Error to Circuit Court, McDowell County.

Action by Samuel Walton, trading as Walton & Luck, against the Cherokee Colliery Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Anderson, Strother & Hughes, for plaintiff in error. D. El French, for defendant in error.

WILLIAMS, P. Plaintiff sued defendant in assumpsit to recover a balance alleged to be due on contract for the construction of a piece of railroad and the building of coke ovens for defendant at a stipulated price, and recovered a judgment in the circuit court of McDowell county for $481.85. Defendant sued out this writ of error.

The evidence is not made a part of the record. Defendant tendered a notice of recoupment, which the court rejected, but which it made a part of the record by its order. The notice alleges that plaintiff undertook to build a certain piece of railroad track and to construct a number of coke ovens for a fixed price; that the piece of railroad was to be built over certain premises belonging to the Ashland Coal & Coke Company; that there was an express agreement between plaintiff and defendant that plaintiff was to perform the work of grading the railroad and building the coke ovens "without damaging or injuring in any manner or form the premises adjacent to and near by the lands on which said railroad and coke ovens were constructed, and were bound to save harmless this defendant from all damages or claim for damages on account of any and all injury and damage done to the property of third parties during the performance by said plaintiff of the said work." The notice also avers that plaintiff injured a barn and other buildings owned by the Ashland Coal & Coke Company, and otherwise did damage to the property of said company by casting stone, dirt, timber, and other debris upon its premises, and that, on account of such injury, defendant was compelled to pay, and did pay, to the Ashland Coal & Coke Company the sum of $401.84. The court rejected this notice, and denied defendant the right to recoup the damages which it had paid to the Ashland Coal & Coke Company.

[1] Ordinarily when a person employs an independent contractor to perform a piece of work, which is lawful within itself, and retains no control over the manner in which the work is to be done, he is not liable for the negligence of the independent contractor, or his servants, in the performance of the work. But this rule is subject to this important exception: If the work is intrinsically dangerous, and is of such character as will likely produce injury to third persons, if proper care should not be taken, the owner cannot avoid liability by delegating its performance to an independent contractor. 1 Shear. & Red. on Negligence, § 175. The Supreme Court of Ohio in Railroad Co. v. Morey, 47 Ohio St. 207, 24 N. E. 269, 7 L. R. A. 701, thus states the rule: "One who causes work to be done is not liable ordinarily for injuries that result from carelessness in its performance by the employes of an independent contractor to whom he has let the work, without reserving to himself any control over the execution of it. But this principle has no application where a resulting injury, instead of being collateral and flowing from the negligent act of the employe alone, is one that might have been anticipated as a direct or probable consequence of the performance of the work contracted for, if reasonable care is omitted in the course of its performance. In such case the person causing the work to be done will be liable, though the negligence is that of an employe of an independent contractor." In that case R. P. Willis & Son had contracted to plumb the railroad company's depot, and said company knew that it was necessary to dig a ditch across one of the public streets of the town to receive one of the pipes. The ditch was dug, and was left open and unguarded by any sign of warning, and Morey fell into it in the nighttime without fault on his part. The court there held the railroad company liable, notwithstanding it had no control over the manner of performing the work.

In City of Joliet v. Harwood, 86 Ill. 110, 29 Am. Rep. 17, the Supreme Court of Illinois applied the same rule to a municipal corporation, and held the city liable for injury to the property of one of its citizens occasioned by a blast which was necessary to be made in the construction of a sewer by O'Riley, an independent contractor, notwithstanding the blast was made in a manner apparently "secure and skillful." The court there held that the doctrine of respondeat superior did not apply, because the work was intrinsically dangerous however skillfully performed. To the same effect are the following authorities: Pye v. Faxor, 156 Mass. 471, 31 N. E. 640; Brannock v. Elmore, 114 Mo. 55, 21 S. W. 451; Covington, etc., Bridge Co. v. Steinbrock, 61 Ohio St. 215, 55 N. E. 618, 76 Am. St. Rep. 375, 7 Am. Neg. Rep. 154. In the report of the case in the volume last cited, the editor has appended numerous notes and citations of other cases which support the rule.

[2] If the construction of the railroad and the building of the coke ovens in the present case necessitated the blasting of rock which would, within reasonable contemplation, subject the buildings of the Ashland Coal & Coke Company, situated near the work, to the risk of danger, defendant could not relieve itself from liability by employing plaintiff to do the work. In such case plaintiff could make a binding contract of indemnity. Defendant had a right to prove that the work was of such character as would cause it to be primarily liable for injury to third parties from its performance, but the court, by rejecting its notice of recoupment, cut off its right to introduce evidence on the question. Defendant also had a right to prove that the promise of indemnity was supported by a valuable consideration, if such is the fact.

[3] The notice further avers that defendant was compelled to pay, and that it did pay, damages to the Ashland Coal & Coke Company. If defendant was liable in law to the Ashland Coal & Coke Company, it was not bound to wait until it was sued, and a judgment recovered against it, before making payment. It had a right to settle the matter without suit. But the amount paid in settlement of the alleged damage, of course, is not conclusive against plaintiff. He has a right to controvert the amount. 22 Cyc. 92, and cases cited in note 73; 16 A. & E. E. L. (2d Ed.) 177.

The notice also avers that the promise of indemnity was made at the time plaintiff undertook the work. If this is so, it was a part of the contract on which plaintiff sues, and entitles defendant to recoup damages flowing from its breach. Logie v. Black, 24 W. Va. 1; 34 Cyc. 658.

The judgment will be reversed and the case remanded for further proceedings to be had therein according to the law as herein stated, and further according to law applicable to such cases.

WILSON v. VALLEY IMPROVEMENT CO.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 21, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 106, 124*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—LIABILITY OF MASTER—PREMISES OF THIRD PERSON.

A master, having contracted temporarily to perform labor, by and through his servants, upon premises owned and fully controlled by another person, and having no knowledge of danger to his servants from defectiveness of the premises or machinery and appliances of such third person, incidentally and casually to be occupied and used by them for the purpose, and not having guaranteed the safety or suitability thereof, is under no duty to inspect the same, nor liable for an injury to his servant, occasioned by defects therein.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. §§ 106, 124.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Randolph County.

Action by Percy H. Wilson, by his next friend, against the Valley Improvement Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed, and judgment for defendant.

E. A. Bowers, W. E. Baker, and J. B. Somerville, for plaintiff in error. Talbott & Hoover and J. L. Wamsley, for defendant in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. The defendant in error, a minor, suing by his next friend, recovered a judgment for $1,941.67 against the plaintiff in error as damages for a personal injury upon a legal theory which presents a case differing from any heretofore decided by this court. Though the servant of the defendant below, he was a special servant of a third party at the time of the injury, and incurred it on the premises and in the service of the special, not the general, master. Under such circumstances, recovery is ordinarily sought from the former, but in this instance the injured servant has sued the latter, charging liability upon the legal hypothesis of an obligation on his part to furnish a safe place in which to work on premises not under his control, or duty to inspect the same and warn the servant of any danger that would have been disclosed by such inspection as reasonable care and prudence demanded.

The Valley Improvement Company was engaged in the generation and distribution of electricity to consumers thereof, and also in the installation of wires and other appliances in buildings and factories for the utilization of its product, in which work it employed Wilson. On the occasion of his injury, Wilson and one Ray Smith were wiring a building owned by the Elkins Refrigerator & Fixture Company, having been sent there for the purpose by the Valley Improvement Company, and, in doing so, they used a scaffold, erected by servants of the former, and composed of boards, called "hangers," nailed to and suspended from an overhead beam, called a "purlin," and pieces of boards nailed across the lower ends of the hangers on which other boards were laid horizontally for a platform. The perpendicular boards were rather thin and of soft wood, bass or lynn, and the cross-boards on which the floor rested were spruce or hemlock. After this scaffold had been used for wiring one part of the building, the refrigerator company servants moved it to another place. This was done in the forenoon of the same day on which it gave way, about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and injured Wilson and Smith. The hangers, or some of them, broke loose from the overhead beam, and precipitated the occupants to the floor, a distance of 20 to 25 feet, among a lot of machinery, and broke both of Wilson's legs.

Respecting the terms of the contract, which was informal and verbal, and the incipient relations and circumstances, the evidence is not as clear as it should be; but the contract does not seem to have imposed any obligation upon the electric company to furnish or construct any scaffold, since the compensation for its work was to be measured by the wages paid its men and the cost of its materials, with an additional 10 per cent. as profit, and the servants were directed to call upon the refrigerator company for scaffolds, if any should be needed. The wiring had been commenced by another party and abandoned, and it seems the scaffold in question had been erected for, and used by, the predecessors of Wilson and Smith.

The principal assignment of error raises a question of law, going to the very foundation of the case. Conceding all the evidence proves or tends to prove, it denies liability, saying that, for the purposes of the case, Wilson was the servant of the refrigerator company, and not of the electrical company. A servant sent by his master to perform work upon the premises and among the servants of a third party is sometimes regarded as the special servant of the person to whose premises he is sent, and among whose servants he works. That he was sent there by his general employer, and receives compensation from him for his services, is not incompatible with the relation of master and servant between him and such third person, and, if he is injured by the negligent act of another servant of the person on whose premises he is working and sues such person for such injury, he cannot recover for the reason that his injury was occasioned by the act of a fellow servant. To this effect the authorities are uniform. Hasty v. Sears, 157 Mass. 123, 31 N. E. 759, 34 Am. St. Rep. 267; Killea v. Faxon, 125 Mass. 485; Johnson v. Boston, 118 Mass. 114; Rourke v. Colliery Co., 2 C. P. D. 205; Saunders v. Coleridge (D. C.) 72 Fed. 676; Ewan v. Lippincott, 47 N. J. Law, 192, 54 Am. Rep. 148. Likewise, if the servant so loaned inflict injury upon one of the men among whom he is working by a negligent act, he is regarded as a fellow servant, and there is no liability upon his master. Donovan v. Syndicate, 1 Q. B. D. (1893) 629. In this case the general master sent not only the servant to work for a third party, but also a crane which he was to manage, and in the operation of the crane he negligently inflicted injury upon one of the servants of the special master. In delivering the opinion, Lord Esher, M. R., said: "It is true that the defendants selected the man and paid his wages, and these are circumstances which, if nothing else intervened, would be strong to show that he was the servant of the defendants. So, indeed, he was as to a great many things; but as to the working of the crane he was no longer their servant, but bound to work under the order of Jones & Co., and, if they saw the man misconducting himself in working the crane or disobeying their orders, they would have a right to discharge him from that employment. This conclusion hardly requires authority."

Though our inquiry arises upon a different state of facts and pertains to an injury resulting from an alleged breach of a nonassignable duty of a master, failure to furnish the servant a safe place in which to work or safe appliances with which to work, it becomes necessary to determine whose servant the man was. One theory would impose upon the general master duty to inspect the premises to which he contemplates sending his servant temporarily for a special purpose, and requiring the owner of the premises to make them safe before sending the servant to work in them, or, on his failure to do so, refuse to send the man. In other words, the general master would be under the same obligation to his servant as if he were working on his own premises. Logically this obligation would extend not only to the provision of safe and suitable machinery and appliances, but also to the exercise of care in providing and retaining competent servants and a sufficient number of them, and the establishment and enforcement of rules and regulations for the conduct of the service necessary to the protection of the servants from injury. All these duties relate to the safety of the place of work. Jackson v. Railroad Co., 43 W. Va. 380, 27 S. E. 278, 31 S. E. 258, 46 L. R. A. 337; Madden v. Railroad Co., 28 W. Va. 617, 57 Am. Rep. 695. This theory would carry the relation of master and servant beyond and outside of any place or conditions provided by the master himself for permanent service, and extend it to conditions which cannot be reasonably said to have been actually provided by the master at all, since both the place and the appliances are furnished and controlled by a third party. At the most, he could be deemed only to have adopted and treated them as his own. The other theory would absolve the general master from liability for an injury so occasioned and place it upon the special master, who by an act of commission or omission causes the defect or imperfection in the premises, machinery, or appliances which actually produces the injury, and has the best opportunity to discover and remedy it, and also unlimited and unrestrained power to do so.

Unless there is some arbitrary and unyielding rule or principle which forbids it, we may consider and give effect to this difference in the conditions and circumstances, in determining which of the two masters shall be regarded as the master for purposes of liability or indemnity for the injury. No statute forbids it, nor do we perceive any inhibitory principle of the common law. For the servant's wages the general master is liable. He contracted to pay them. The special master is not liable therefor, because he did not agree to pay them. But the obligation to indemnify for injury is not imposed by the contract of service. In this connection the force and effect of the contract is to bring the parties into a relation under which the law imposes duty on the one in favor of the other, and this duty is founded upon reasons of public policy, not upon the terms of the contract, which are silent upon the subject of duty and the obligation to indemnify. Nothing in the law says a servant of two masters shall have a right to indemnity against both in case of his injury by the negligence of one, nor is there any reason or consideration of public policy which requires it. The ends of justice are attained by providing one source of indemnity, and that source is naturally indicated by the particular facts working the injury. The policy of the law is to fix liability with reference to that cause which stands closest to, and in most immediate connection with, the injurious result. The law books abound with instances of discrimination between remote and proximate causes in fixing liability for negligence. All persons concerned in a series of negligent acts, resulting in injury to some person, are not required to make reparation. The requirement of immediate and direct connection with the last or proximate act of negligence is universal. That policy which accords indemnity to the injured person, whether a servant or a stranger, does not exclude those equitable and just considerations which naturally suggest the direct and immediate author of the injury as the proper source from which to exact the indemnity. This is illustrated by the operation of the fellow servant rule. Notwithstanding the relation of master and servant, the negligence of a fellow servant imposes no liability upon the master. We are not to be understood as asserting that the law never gives two sources of indemnity, but only that it does not do so when the immediate cause of the injury is the act of only one person. There are no doubt circumstances under which two or more persons, joint participants in the negligent act constituting the proximate cause of the injury, can be jointly or severally liable.

Perceiving no legal obstacle to a rule absolving the general master from liability to his servant for injury resulting from unsafety of a place to work or machinery and appliances furnished by a third party, when the servant is lent to him or sent upon his premises temporarily, to perform a special service with the machinery and appliances found there, and imposing the liability upon the special master, under circumstances ordinarily inflicting it, we proceed to a consideration of the facts and circumstances which naturally suggest the source of indemnity. As has been stated, the special master either causes or suffers the defect to exist. The appliances and premises in which they are found belonged to him. He has the power of convenient, thorough, and constant inspection. His ownership and control enable him to remedy the defects economically and with a free hand. He may make such alterations as he sees fit. As to the competency and sufficiency of servants and the provision and enforcement of rules, he likewise has full and unrestrained opportunity for knowledge and power to control. On the other hand, to require these duties of the general master is to burden him with that which is often beyond his power and ability and always inconvenient. He can neither inspect the premises and machinery nor test the competency of the servants nor determine the efficiency of the rules and regulations, nor remedy any defects, without the consent of the owner of the premises. In many instances he is unable to determine any of these questions with safety to himself or his servant, if allowed to undertake it, because of his unfamiliarity with the business conducted on the premises. The manager of a concern, installing electrical wires and appliances, could not safely determine whether to send his servant to do special work in a rolling mill, a cotton mill, a shoe factory, or an automobile factory, or a locomotive works or car shops or a railway yard, unless he was skilled and proficient in the conduct and management of such a plant, and yet his business necessitates the sending of his servant from time to time into all of them. To require him to determine whether it is safe to do so is to impose duty and responsibility beyond the limits of reason and power of performance. His inability to determine the question of safety, because of his lack of knowledge of the business done upon the premises, would often inflict upon a cautious man an enormous loss or hazard, for the rule would require him to undertake the work or refrain from it at his peril. If, under the impression of safety and suitability of the premises and appliances, competency of servants, and efficiency of rules and regulations, he sends his servant and injury results, he is required to make reparation in damages; and if, on the contrary, under a misapprehension he thinks the premises defective or the servants incompetent or the rules and regulations inadequate, or if, unable to determine whether they are or not, he refrains from undertaking the work, and it turns out that he was mistaken, he loses the business and suffers financial loss. Moreover, the inconvenience to which this duty would subject the general employer largely outweighs the consideration upon which it is supposed to rest, the mere technical relation of master and servant. If all the places in which he proposes to do special work through his servants were open to him, and he were allowed to correct defects and charge the expense thereof, and he possessed the requisite knowledge, ability, and skill to make the alterations, the discharge of that duty would carry him widely beyond the scope of his business territorially as well as otherwise. Employers often send their servants great distances to do special work upon premises that could not be inspected otherwise than at the expense of both time and money. Upon all these considerations and others that readily suggest themselves, we are of the opinion that the duty rests upon the special master. If he can be made the master, so as to apply the doctrine of fellow servancy, and he is, it is perfectly consistent to make him the master so far as to require him to provide a safe place for the work of the special servant.

Apparently inconsistent decisions involving or suggesting this question may be reconclled, we think, by a classification thereof, based upon the character of the occupancy of the premises. When the master sends his servant temporarily upon the premises of a third person to perform a special service, he is regarded as the servant of the owner of the premises and not of his general employer; and, in those instances in which the servant's ordinary and permanent place of work is upon the premises of a third party, the duty and liability are imposed upon his employer, and he is not regarded as the servant of the owner of the premises. For the purposes of the business carried on under such circumstances, the premises are regarded and treated as those of the employer, though he does not own them, and has by contract absolved himself from any duty to keep them in repair.

In all of the following cases, absolving the general employer from liability for injuries occasioned their servants upon the premises of third persons by defects therein, the servants were sent upon the premises temporarily and to perform special work. Though the distinction between temporary and permanent service upon premises, not owned by the employer, is not adverted to in the opinions, the occupancy was in fact temporary or sporadic and for a special purpose. Whallon v. Elevator Co., 1 App. Div. 264, 37 N. Y. Supp. 174; Hughes v. Gas Light Co., 168 Mass. 395, 47 N. E. 125; Murphy v. Greeley, 146 Mass. 196, 15 N. E. 654; Channon v. Sanford Co., 70 Conn. 573, 40 Atl. 462, 41 L. R. A. 200, 68 Am. St. Rep. 133. In the last of these cases the court declares the doctrine we have adopted in the following terms, and, in part, upon the following considerations: "Then, again, this general rule (imposing liability upon the master for injury resulting from unsafety of the place in which the servant works) is not ordinarily applicable to cases where the master neither has nor assumes possession, use, or control, legal or actual, of the premises or place where the servant may be at work. The general rule is based upon such possession, use, and control by the master of the premises where he puts his servants at work for him; and, speaking generally, his duty to use due care to make and keep such place reasonably safe flows from, and is measured by, such possession, use, and control. Just as the master's liability for the acts of his servants while engaged in his business is based upon his power to control them, so his duty to provide reasonably safe premises is founded essentially upon his occupation, use, and control of such premises. This being the reason of the rule, when the reason does not exist, the rule is inapplicable."

In the following cases and many others, imposing duty and liability upon the employer for injury occasioned by a defect in the premises upon which the servant was working, but which were owned by third parties, the employers used the premises regularly and permanently, as if they owned them, and, in some, if not all of them, the character of the occupancy was expressly made the basis of liability. McGuire v. Telephone Co., 167 N. Y. 208, 60 N. E. 433, 52 L. R. A. 437; Story v. Railroad Co., 70 N. H. 364, 48 Atl. 288; Doyle v. Railroad Co., 127 Mich. 94, 86 N. W. 524, 54 L. R. A. 461, 89 Am. St. Rep. 456; Railroad Co. v. Ross, 142 Ill. 9, 31 N. E. 412, 34 Am. St. Rep. 49; Smith v. Railroad Co. (C. C.) 18 Fed. 304; Stetler v. Railway Co., 46 Wis. 497, 1 N. W. 112; Harding v. Transfer Co., 80 Minn. 504, 83 N. W. 395; San Antonio Edison Co. v. Dixon, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 320, 42 S. W. 1009. In McGuire v. Telephone Co. the servant employed by the Bell Telephone Company of Buffalo was injured by a defective pole of the Rochester Gas & Electric Company, on which the telephone company had rightfully placed its wires along with those of the other company. In the opinion the court said: "But in the present case the plaintiff was employed to work on a line already erected constituting the permanent plant of the defendant. * * * I do not think the fact that the defendant did not own the pole which fell relieved it from the duty of reasonable inspection to see that the pole was safe. The pole formed part of the permanent line of the defendant through the streets of the city of Rochester. * * * By using the pole as part of its line, it adopted it as its own." Distinguishable from this case upon the ground above indicated is the decision in Dixon v. Telegraph Co. (C. C.) 68 Fed. 630, in which the servant was injured by a defective pole which did not belong to his employer, and was not used by it as a part of its line. Denying right of recovery, the court observed: "The pole in question, however, did not belong to the defendant. The use of it was casual, and incidental to the nature of the service in which the plaintiff was employed." In Murch v. Railway Co., 29 N. H. 9, 61 Am. Dec. 631, the court said: "By using the railroad of another corporation as a part of their track, whether by contract or mere permission, they would ordinarily, for many purposes, make it their own, and would assume toward those whom they had agreed to receive as passengers all the duties resulting from that relation as to the road." In Engel v. Railroad Co., 160 Mass. 263, 35 N. E. 548, 22 L. R. A. 283, the court said: "The duty of a railroad corporation to furnish for its employes safe tracks, cars, locomotive engines, and other machinery, tools, and appliances with which its business is to be carried on is similar in kind to its duty to passengers in these respects, although the degree of care required is less. In either case its duty is the same when the tracks * * * are hired, or used under a license from others, as when they are owned by the employer." In all these and other cases of their class the employers used the premises or works of the third party for usual, ordinary, and permanent places of work for their servants. No doubt absolute control and dominion over the premises by the employer for the purposes of his business, though temporary in character, would make him liable for injury resulting from defects in the premises. Such occupancy would be consistent with the theory of ownership for the time being. At any rate, it would be a transaction or use radically different from a mere casual, incidental entry, without any dominion or control at all. So, also, is the employer liable for injury resulting from a defective appliance belonging to a third party which he uses in his business, provided he has control of it. By using it he adopts it as his own for the purposes for which it is used and naturally falls under the same duty to the servant as if he had purchased or had it made for that purpose. Bridge Co. v. Goodnight (Ky.) 60 S. W. 415.

Though the relation of master and servant between the owner of the premises and the servant of a third person sent upon them to perform work for the owner may be assumed as the basis of legal duty on the part of the owner, as we have already shown, it is probably consistent with legal principles to say that, independently of such relation, the ownership and control of the premises imposes a duty in favor of one who comes there upon his invitation. One who invites another expressly or by implication to come upon his premises must use ordinary care and prudence to render the premises reasonably safe for the visit. Sesler v. Coal Co., 51 W. Va. 218, 41 S. E. 216; Williams v. Coal Co., 55 W. Va. 84, 46 S. E. 802; Smith v. Parkersburg Ass'n, 48 W. Va. 232, 37 S. E. 645. Of course, a bare licensee, one who comes upon the premises of another, without invitation or by mere permission, for purposes of his own in which the owner has no interest, occupies very much the same position as a trespasser. The owner owes him no duty other than abstention from willful or wanton injury. But one who comes upon the express or implied invitation of the owner holds a different status. The invitation carries with it a representation or guaranty of the exercise of reasonable care for his safety while upon the premises. The owner of a mill, or other place of business, in requesting another person to send his servants there to perform work beneficial to the owner, extends an invitation to such persons as are sent in obedience to the request, and, when they arrive, they are there on business for the owner of the property, as well as their master, and are therefore entitled to exact the same sort of duty from the owner of the premises as if they were in fact his own servants.

Our conclusion that the relation existing between the plaintiff and the defendant imposed no duty upon the latter in respect to the safety of the premises upon which the former was hurt, in the absence of additional facts or circumstances, seems to be well sustained by Coughtry v. Woolen Co., 56 N. Y. 124, 15 Am. Rep. 387, and Devlin v. Smith, 89 N. Y. 470, 42 Am. Rep. 311. In the first of these cases the owner of a mill contracted with a builder to put a cornice on it; the owner agreeing to erect a scaffold for the purpose free of cost. The builder sent his servant upon the scaffold to do the work, and it fell and killed him. The owner of the mill was held liable. A part of the reasoning of the court was as follows: "At the time of the injury the scaffold belonged to the defendant, had been erected by it, was in its possession and was being used on its premises, with its permission, for the very purpose for which it had been furnished, and by the persons for whose use it had been provided. The only operation which the contract has in the case is to preclude the defendant from setting up that the defective structure was not its own but that of the contractors. Being conceded to be its own structure furnished by it for use, the duty of due diligence in its construction arose, not merely out of the contract to furnish it, but from the fact that the defendant did actually furnish it for the express purpose of enabling and inducing the men who were to do the work to go upon it." In the other case, the master, a painter, having contracted to paint the interior of a dome, employed an experienced scaffold builder to erect a first-rate scaffold in the building to enable him, the painter, to do his work. A servant of the painter having gone upon the scaffold, it gave way and caused his death, while at work upon it in his master's employment. Both the employer and the builder of the scaffold were sued, and the court held the former not liable and the latter liable.

What has been said thus far is no doubt subject to certain qualifications and limitations. If the general master has knowledge of the dangers and defects into which he is sending his servant and fails to give him any warning thereof, he would probably be liable for any resultant injury. Some of the authorities so hold. It may be possible, too, that an express guaranty of the suitability and safety of the premises and appliances would make the general master liable upon the same principle. Channon v. Sanford Co., 70 Conn. 573, 40 Atl. 462, 41 L. R. A. 200, 204, 66 Am. St. Rep. 133. In that case the court said: "The question on this part of the case is whether, if no such duty rested upon the defendant by law, the facts found warrant the conclusion as matter of law that it assumed such a duty. The strongest thing in the finding in favor of such a conclusion is the fact that the defendant assured the plaintiff that the staging would be entirely safe; but this fact, taken either alone or with the other facts found, clearly does not warrant any such conclusion as matter of law. The assurance was given at the very time that the defendant told the plaintiff about the strong staging that had been already erected and in use in the building, and at the very time when plaintiff was informed Caulfield, and not the defendant, was to see to the staging. What the defendant said to the plaintiff, as detailed in the finding, falls far short of an agreement to be responsible for the staging already built, or to be built, by Caulfield or his servants."

We have no evidence here tending to prove any undertaking on the part of the defendant for the safety of the scaffold, nor of any agreement that the refrigerator company was to build the scaffold for the defendant. In other words, there is nothing here to indicate that the building of the scaffold was within, or a part of, the defendant's contract. No evidence adduced would warrant a jury in saying the refrigerator company built the scaffold, as the agent of the defendant. All that appears is that its servants did build it, and that the defendant's servants were advised that the refrigerator company people would build it, if needed. Hence we think it clear that no duty was imposed upon the defendant by any special contract or undertaking for the safety of its servants. If there was any such agreement, no evidence of it has been adduced, wherefore we are not called upon to say what its effect would have been, had there been such an undertaking. Nor does the evidence tend to prove knowledge of danger or unfitness on the part of the defendant.

Of course, we do not say the plaintiff is entitled to recover from the refrigerator company. As that company is no party to this litigation, we can decide nothing against it. There may be defenses that will exonerate it from liability, and it is not the purpose of this opinion to preclude or limit them in any respect. What has been said here indicating right to indemnity from that company is mere argument in the process of deduction of the rule or principle by which to determine the question of liability of the defendant in this action.

The case went to the court on a demurrer to the evidence. For the reasons here stated, the judgment will be reversed, the demurrer sustained, and judgment rendered for the defendant.

ROBINSON v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 19, 1911.)

JUDGMENT (§ 829*)—RES JUDICATA—JUDGMENT OF UNITED STATES COURT—EFFECT IN STATE COURT.

A judgment of a federal court in an action begun in a state court, but removed to the federal court because of the nature of the controversy and the residence of the parties, which adjudges that since the delict occurred in Texas, and since there is no statute in Texas allowing a recovery for mental anguish, there could be no recovery for the same for failure to deliver telegram is a determination on the merits, and bars a subsequent action in a state court, though the federal court in its opinion stated that it was without jurisdiction of the case; question of jurisdiction not having been raised.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; Geo. W. Gage, Judge.

Action by T. C. Robinson, Jr., against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. J. McSwain, H. H. Harris, and E. Inman, for appellant. John Gary Evans and McCullough & Blythe, for respondent.

JONES, C. J. On May 29, 1909, plaintiff brought an action against defendant in the court of common pleas for Greenville county to recover $5,000 damages for mental anguish alleged to have been suffered by him as the result of defendant's negligent and willful conduct in failing to transmit and deliver a telegram filed in defendant's office at Norris, S. C., on November 22, 1908, addressed to plaintiff at Houston, Tex., announcing the death of his father. The case was removed to the United States Circuit Court, and on May 2, 1910, trial was begun in that court. After testimony was introduced on both sides, defendant moved the court to direct a verdict in its favor upon the grounds (1) that there was no testimony of willful failure to deliver the message; (2) that, if there was such testimony, there was nothing to show that defendant authorized or ratified the willful misconduct of its agents; (3) that the undisputed testimony shows that the alleged cause of action arose in Texas, and, in the absence of any showing of a statute in Texas giving a right of action for damages for mental anguish, the presumption is that the common law prevails there which denies recovery of such damages in the absence of physical injury; and (4) that the testimony shows that defendant performed its contract, and that there was no testimony to show negligence. The United States District Judge, Hon. William H. Brawley, responding to the motion, directed a verdict for defendant, stating his reasons therefor, which are incorporated in the record of this case, and were substantially that there was no evidence of any delict in this state; that the delict occurred in Texas, and that the action should have been brought in that state; that, it not appearing that there was any statute in Texas allowing damages for mental anguish, the federal court would follow the general law which denied recovery for mental anguish not accompanied with bodily pain, the concluding words of the order being: "This court feels without jurisdiction in the case, and it follows that it must instruct the jury to find a verdict for the defendant." Judgment was duly entered upon the verdict, and no appeal was taken.

The present action, renewed in the state court, is upon the same cause of action and between the same parties, and the defendant interposed the judgment of the federal court as a bar. Judge Gage in a clear and concise opinion sustained the plea in bar and dismissed the complaint. The exceptions of appellant make the point that the judgment of the federal court was not upon the merits, but that the case, in effect, was dismissed for want of jurisdiction, and therefore the judgment was not a bar to the present action. There is no doubt that the federal court did actually have jurisdiction, tested by the nature and amount of the controversy, the residence of the parties, the appearance and answer of the defendant, and the actual removal from the state court. The jurisdiction of the federal court was in no wise affected by consideration of the place where the cause of action arose. Having jurisdiction, the court exercised it, and meant to exercise it, in a most solemn and effective way by directing a verdict and entry of judgment thereon, and this action must speak louder than the mere expressions in the language of the court giving reasons for the judgment rendered. No question of jurisdiction was raised in the grounds of the motion to direct a verdict, and all these grounds were upon the merits.

The meaning and effect of the decision in the federal court was that as the delict occurred in Texas, and as there was shown no statute of Texas allowing recovery for mental anguish, the court followed the rule of the common law denying recovery for mental anguish not accompanied with bodily injury instead of following the decision of this court in Brown v. Telegraph Co., 85 S. C. 495, 67 S. E. 146, 137 Am. St. Rep. 914, upon which the plaintiff was relying. This was a determination upon the merits.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

2. COUNTIES (§ 208*)—CLAIMS—JURISDICTION.

Civ. Code 1902, § 1347, authorizing a person injured in person or property through a defective highway to recover damages in an action against the county, does not give exclusive jurisdiction to the magistrate or circuit court, but gives concurrent jurisdiction with that conferred on the county board by section 806, and one electing to submit his claim to the county board is bound thereby, and his remedy on an adverse decision is by appeal, and not by an independent action before a magistrate or before the circuit court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 322-330; Dec. Dig. § 206.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Lexington County; G. W. Gage, Judge.

Action by Ernest M. Du Pre against Lexington County. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, and complaint dismissed.

J. B. Wingard and Efrd & Dreher, for appellant. W. W. Hawes, for respondent.

JONES, C. J. In October, 1909, plaintiff filed with the county board of commissioners of Lexington county an itemized and verified claim of $99.75 against the county for damages to his automobile, alleged to have been caused by collision with a stump in the public highway. The county board in January, 1910, passed upon the claim, and disapproved it. No appeal was taken from this action of the board, but on April 2, 1910, plaintiff brought suit in a magistrate's court for the said amount claimed as damages due to the negligence of the county in leaving the stump in the public highway. The defendant, in addition to a general denial, set up the judgment of the county board of commissioners on the claim filed with it as a bar to the action. This last defense was overruled, and judgment was had for the plaintiff, which was affirmed on appeal to the circuit court.

The question presented is whether this action ex delicto could be prosecuted in the magistrate's court in view of the filing of the claim with the county board in October, 1909, and the action of the board thereon, from which no appeal was taken.

With respect to ordinary claims against the county, this court has often held that the county board acts judicially in passing upon them, and that the only method of review is by appeal to the circuit court. Jennings v. Abbeville County, 24 S. C. 546; Bank v. Goodwin, 81 S. C. 424, 62 S. E. 1100; Cunningham v. Clarendon County, 81 S. C. 202, 62 S. E. 212; People's Bank v. Greenville, 85 S. C. 297, 67 S. E. 296.

[1] The provision of section 806 of the Civil Code of 1902 providing for the auditing and payment by the county board of commissioners of accounts for "labor performed, fees, services, disbursements, or any other matter * * *" is broad enough to cover a claim for injury to an automobile resulting from a defect in a highway, and to confer jurisdiction on the county board to act judicially in the matter.

[2] The provision of section 1347 of 1 Civil Code, giving the right to a person receiving damage in person or property through a defect in or negligent repair of a highway to recover actual damages therefor in an action against the county, does not place exclusive jurisdiction in the magistrate or circuit court, but gives these courts concurrent jurisdiction. The plaintiff may have elected originally to bring his action in the magistrate's court; but, having elected to submit his claim to the jurisdiction of the county board, he is bound thereby, and should have appealed from the action of the board. It may seem strange that the Legislature should be regarded as conferring upon the county board jurisdiction to pass upon a matter involving its own negligence, but the same consideration could be urged against the admitted right of the county board to pass upon its liability under its own contracts. The right of review in the circuit court is ample, and there is advantage in having a uniform rule with respect to all claims submitted to the county board.

The judgment of the circuit court is reversed, and the complaint dismissed.

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 89*)—MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 11*)—FREEDOM TO CONTRACT—POLICE POWER—EMPLOYÉ'S RELIEF FUND—ACCEPTANCE OF BENEFITS.

Act March 7, 1905 (24 St. at Large, p. 962), providing that the acceptance of benefits by an injured employé of an employer maintaining a relief department for employes shall not bar a recovery for the injuries sustained, is not an unreasonable interference with the right of contract, and is not violative of the fourteenth amendment of the federal Constitution or Const. art. 1, § 5.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Sumter County; Geo. E. Prince, Judge.

Action by James A. Miller against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Best & Cunningham, L. D. Jennings, and J. H. Clifton, for appellant. P. A. Willcox, Mark Reynolds, and L. W. McLemore, for respondents.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for damages, alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff on the 18th of October, 1909, in the discharge of his duties as engineer while in the employment of the defendant Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company through its negligence and wantonness. The defendants denied the allegations of negligence and wantonness, and set up the defense that the plaintiff and said railroad company entered into a contract, whereby it was agreed that the plaintiff should become a member of its relief department, and receive a specified sum in case of injury, which sum when accepted by the plaintiff should operate as a release of all claims against the railroad company arising out of said injury; that the plaintiff in pursuance of said contract accepted the sum to which he was entitled as a member of the relief department, and thereby released the railroad company from all further liability for said injury. The plaintiff, replying to this defense, alleged that the said contract was null and void, and in contravention of the act entitled, "An act to regulate and fix the liability of railroad companies having a relief department, to its employes," approved the 23d of February, 1903, and which was as follows: "That from and after the approval of this act, when any railroad company has what is usually called a relief department for its employes, the members of which are required or permitted to pay some dues, fees, moneys or compensation to be entitled to the benefits thereof; upon the death or injury of the employé, a member of such relief department, such railroad company, be, and is hereby, required to pay to the person entitled to the same, the amount it was agreed the employé or his heirs at law should receive from such relief department; the acceptance of which amount shall not operate to estop, or in any way bar the right of such employé, or his personal representatives, from recovering damages of such railroad company, for injury or death caused by the negligence of such company, its agents or servants, as now provided by law; and any contract or agreement to the contrary shall be ineffective for that purpose." 24 St. at Large, p. 79. Also of the act entitled, "An act to fix and declare the liabilities of any corporation, firm, or individual operating a relief department, to employes, and to regulate the operation of the same," approved the 7th of March, 1905, and which was as follows:

"Section 1. That when any corporation, firm or individual runs or operates what is usually called a relief department for its employes, the members of which are required or permitted to pay fees, dues, money or other compensation, by whatever name called, to be entitled to the benefit thereof, upon the death or injury of the employé, a member of such relief department, such corporation, firm or individual, so running or operating the same, be, and is hereby, required to pay to the person entitled to the same the amount it was agreed the employé, his heirs or other beneficiary under such contract, should receive from such relief department; the acceptance of which amount shall not operate to stop, or in any way bar the right of such employé or his personal representatives, from recovering damages of such corporation, firm or individual, for personal injury or death caused by the negligence of such corporation, firm or individual, their servants and agents, as are now provided, by law; and any contract or agreement to the contrary, or any receipt or release given in consideration of the payment of such sum, is and shall be null and void.

"Sec. 2. That all acts inconsistent with this act are hereby released." 24 St. at Large, p. 962.

It appears from the testimony that the plaintiff became a member of the relief department on the 19th of November, 1904, and was still a member when he accepted the amount hereinbefore mentioned. The several drafts delivered to the plaintiff by the relief department after he sustained said injury (omitting dates and amounts) contained these words: "This amount is in payment of benefits for accident disability, for ——— days from ——— to ——— inclusive, and is paid and accepted under the regulations of the relief department." At the close of the testimony, the defendants made a motion for the direction of a verdict, on the ground "that the acceptance by the plaintiff of the benefits under the relief department contract operates as a bar, and as a complete defense to the action, the acceptance of such benefits having operated as a full release, satisfaction, and accord of any right of action that the plaintiff might otherwise have."

His honor, the presiding judge, sustained the motion, and assigned the following reasons for his ruling: (1) Because the act of 1903 was repealed by the act of 1905. (2) Because the act of 1905 was passed subsequent to the time when the plaintiff had become a member of the relief department, and that it was therefore inapplicable to the facts of this case. (3) Because the acts of 1903 and 1905 were in violation of the fourteenth amendment of the federal Constitution, which provides that "no state shall make or enforce any law, which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty or property, without due process of law; nor deny any person within its jurisdiction, the equal protection of the laws;" also, that the said acts were repugnant to section 5, art. 1, of the state Constitution (which contains a provision in similar language), on the ground that they were an unreasonable restraint upon the liberty of contract.

The plaintiff appealed from the order directing a verdict, and the first question that will be considered is whether his honor, the presiding judge, erred in ruling that the act of 1903 was repealed by the act of 1905.

[1] The act of 1903 was intended to apply solely to railroad companies, while the act of 1905 was intended, not only to embrace railroad companies, but "any corporation, firm or individual." This is the only difference in the two acts, except a slight variance in their phraseology. It is true the act of 1905 contains the provision that all acts inconsistent with it are repealed, but it cannot be successfully contended that the act of 1903 is inconsistent with it, since all the provisions of the first are included within the second act. Therefore the act of 1903 was not repealed in express terms, and, if repealed at all, it was merely by implication. Repeals by implication, however, are not favored, and in this case such a rule cannot be successfully invoked. Buchanan v. State Treasurer, 68 S. C. 411, 47 S. E. 683. The exception raising this question is sustained.

[2] The next question for consideration is whether the presiding judge was in error, when he ruled that the act of 1905 was inapplicable, for the reason that it was approved after the plaintiff and the defendant railroad company had entered into the contract, whereby the plaintiff became a member of its relief department. This act was intended to have a prospective effect in those cases where its provisions were violated after its passage; and the fact that the contract out of which such violations arose was made before the act went into effect does not prevent it from being applicable. The police power is paramount to the liberty of contract; and, when it is determined in a particular case that a statute is not an attempt to exercise that power arbitrarily, then it cannot be successfully contended that it is an unreasonable restraint upon the liberty of contract. The following language used by the writer of this opinion, in the case of Sturgiss v. Railway, 80 S. C. 167, 60 S. E. 939, 61 S. E. 281, throws light upon the evil, which the act of 1905 was intended to remedy, and shows that it was not an attempt to exercise the power of police in an arbitrary manner: "The statute under consideration (act of 1905) was enacted for the purpose of preventing railroad corporations (and other parties therein mentioned) from inaugurating schemes, the ultimate aim and practical effect of which are to enable the railroad company to bring such influence to bear upon its employes as will force them to surrender their claims for damages when they have sustained injury through the negligence of the company, against which it is not allowed by law to contract. When the regulations of the hospital and relief fund are analyzed, it will be seen that they contemplate the result just mentioned. Not only do they provide that the employe who has paid his assessments, and thereby contributed to the creation and maintenance of said fund, shall be barred from recovering damages for negligence, if he accepts the benefit thereunder, but they likewise provide that his representatives shall not be allowed to bring an action for damages caused by the negligence of the corporation, if they accept the benefit of said fund. Membership in the hospital and relief fund creates the relation of trustee and cestui que trust between the company and the employe, and, although the employé is assessed to maintain the fund, he is not allowed to receive a dollar of the money collected for that purpose, unless he surrenders his claim for damages, when he has been injured through the negligence of the corporation. The fiduciary relation established between the company and the employé places him practically at the mercy of the corporation; for it is a well-known fact that the employés are not persons generally of large means, and frequently are dependent entirely upon their salary or wages for a support. What is the condition of the employé when he is injured through the negligence of the company? He realizes the fact that he has a beneficial interest in a trust fund, and, being in need of the money, he is anxious to get it. He is informed, however, that he must surrender all other claims against the corporation. At this time he, perhaps, is suffering great mental and physical pain, his mind is not so clear as when in health, and the opportune time contemplated by the corporation has arrived when he can be easily persuaded to relinquish his claim for damages arising out of negligence. Public policy demands that the corporation shall not have the opportunity of taking advantage of its employés through the fiduciary relations established between them with that end in view. We only desire to say in conclusion that, if the hospital and relief fund is successfully operated, the practical result will be that the railroad company will be enabled to liquidate claims for damages arising out of its negligence, with sums of money contributed in the main by its employés—an indirect way of contracting against its negligence."

To the same effect is the following language of the court in McGuire v. Railway, 131 Iowa, 340, 108 N. W. 902, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 706: "The average railway employé is not a man of wealth. More often than otherwise, his total possessions, if any, are represented by a modest home, and he depends upon his wages to meet his current living expenses. If he has a family, they, too, are dependent upon his earnings. If severely injured, the pain from his wounds, the anxiety for his dependent family, the pressure of his immediate needs, are not conducive to calm and businesslike reflections upon what may prove to be a matter of great importance to him and those who look to him for support. The immediate aid which the relief department offers may under such circumstances assume an exaggerated importance to his eyes, and in his weakness and distress, lead him to accept a benefit inferior to that which he might otherwise be entitled to recover. Moreover, the Legislature may well have believed that, while membership in the relief department was entirely voluntary in the legal sense of the word, it was still possible for the employer, by making the tenure of service more secure to those who became members, to bring to bear an influence in that direction, savoring of moral coercion." These views are recognized in the case of Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366, 18 Sup. Ct. 383, 42 L. Ed. 780, in which the following language is used: "The Legislature has also recognized the fact, which the experience of legislators in many states has corroborated, that the proprietors of these establishments and their operatives do not stand upon an equality, and that their interests are to a certain extent conflicting. The former naturally desire to obtain as much labor as possible from their employés, while the latter are often induced by the fear of discharge to conform to regulations which their judgment, fairly exercised, would pronounce to be detrimental to their health or strength. In other words, the proprietors lay down the rules, and the laborers are practically constrained to obey them. In such cases self-interest is often an unsafe guide, and the Legislature may properly interpose its authority. But the fact that both parties are of full age and competent to contract does not necessarily deprive the state of the power to interfere, where the parties do not stand upon an equality, or where the public health demands that one party to the contract shall be protected against himself. 'The state still retains an interest in his welfare, however reckless he may be. The whole is no greater than the sum of all the parts, and, when the individual health, safety, and welfare are sacrificed or neglected, the state must suffer.'" The case of Railway v. McGuire, 219 U. S. 549, 31 Sup. Ct. 259, 55 L. Ed. 328, shows that the act of 1905 cannot be construed as an arbitrary exercise of the police power; and that the fact that the contract was made before its passage does not render it inapplicable in this case.

The exception raising this question is sustained.

[3,4] The last question to be determined is whether the presiding judge erred in ruling that the acts were obnoxious to the fourteenth amendment of the federal Constitution, and to section 5, art. 1, of the state Constitution, on the ground that they are an unreasonable interference with the right of contract. Before proceeding to determine this question, we desire it understood that the proposition whether the provisions of said acts would be regarded as in restraint of the right of contract if parties enter into a new and independent contract subsequent to the injury, but during the time the injured party is a member of the relief department, is not before the court, and, of course, will not be adjudicated. The very able opinion of Mr. Justice Hughes in Railway v. McGuire, 219 U. S. 549, 31 Sup. Ct. 259, 55 L. Ed. 328, is conclusive of the question now under consideration; and, as this court must conform its decisions to those of that court on federal questions, we will quote somewhat at length from the opinion in that case, as follows:

"The acceptance of benefits is, of course, an act done after the injury, but the legal consequences sought to be attached to that act are derived from the provision in the contract of membership. The stipulation which the statute nullifies is one made in advance of the injury that the subsequent acceptance of benefits shall constitute full satisfaction of the claim for damages. It is in this respect that the question arises as to the restriction of the liberty of contract. * * * There is no absolute freedom to do as one likes, or to contract as one chooses. The guaranty of liberty does not withdraw from legislative supervision that wide department of activity which consists of the making of contracts, or deny to government the power to provide restrictive safeguards. Liberty implies the absence of arbitrary restraint, not immunity from reasonable regulations and prohibitions imposed in the interests of the community. * * * The right to make contracts is subject to the exercise of the powers granted to Congress for the suitable conduct of matters of national concern. * * * It is subject, also, in the field of state action to the essential authority of government to maintain peace and security, and to enact laws for the promotion of the health, safety, morals, and welfare of those subject to its jurisdiction. * * * The principle involved in these decisions is that where the legislative action is arbitrary, and has no reasonable relation to a purpose, which it is competent for government to effect, the Legislature transcends the limits of its power in interfering with the liberty of contract; but, where there is reasonable relation to an object within the government authority, the exercise of the legislative discretion is not subject to judicial review. * * * If the Legislature may require the use of safety devices, it may prohibit agreements to dispense with them. If it may restrict employment in mines and smelters to eight hours a day, it may make contracts for longer service unlawful. In such case the interference with the right to contract is incidental to the main object of the regulation, and, if the power exists to accomplish the latter, the interference is justified, as an aid to its exercise. * * * Having authority to establish this regulation, it is manifest that the Legislature was also entitled to insure its efficacy by prohibiting contracts in derogation of its provisions. In the exercise of this power the Legislature was not limited, with respect either to the form of the contract or the nature of the consideration, or the absolute or conditional character of the agreement. It was as competent to prohibit contracts which on a specified event, or in a given contingency, should operate to relieve the corporation from the statutory liability, which would otherwise exist, as it was to deny validity to agreements of absolute waiver. * * *

If the Legislature could specifically provide that no contract for insurance relief should limit the liability for damages, upon what ground can it be said that it was beyond the legislative authority to deny that effect to the payment of benefits, or the acceptance of such payment under the contract? The asserted distinction is sought to be based upon the fact that under the contract of membership the employé has an election after the injury. But this circumstance, however appropriate it may be for legislative consideration, cannot be regarded as defining a limitation of legislative power. The power to prohibit contracts in any case where it exists necessarily implies legislative control over the transaction in spite of the action of the parties. Whether this control may be exercised in a particular case depends upon the relation of the transaction to the execution of a policy, which the state is competent to establish. It does not aid the argument to describe the defense as one of accord and satisfaction. The payment of benefits is the performance of the promise to pay contained in the contract of membership. If the Legislature may prohibit the acceptance of the promise as a substitution for the statutory liability, it should also be able to prevent the like substitution of its performance.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the case remanded to that court for a new trial.

PHILLIPS v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO. et al.

1. CARRIERS (§ 368*)—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—FORFEITURE OF RIGHT—STATUTORY PROVISION.

Civ. Code 1902, § 2134, which makes it the duty of a carrier to stop at advertised stations a time sufficient for receiving and letting off passengers, refers merely to passengers beginning or ending passage at such station, and cannot be construed as requiring a carrier to receive as a passenger one who had been expelled for misconduct affording ground for ejection from the train which he is seeking to re-enter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1457, 1458; Dec. Dig. § 868.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 368*)—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—RULES OF RAILROAD.

While at common law a carrier must accept passengers who present themselves in a proper manner, and are ready and willing to comply with the reasonable rules of the company, the carrier may enforce a reasonable rule preventing a passenger who has willfully refused to pay his fare and provoked expulsion from re-entering the train from which he was expelled.

3. CARRIERS (§ 368*)—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—DAMAGES FOR EXPULSION—RELATION OF PASSENGER.

Where a person ejected from a train at a station for a refusal to pay fare with a warning that he would not be allowed to re-enter sought to re-enter and offered to pay full fare, but was refused by the conductor and forcibly ejected when he attempted to so re-enter, there was no such re-establishment of the relation of passenger as would entitle him to damages for the second ejection.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Sumter County; Geo. E. Prince, Judge.

Action by Lucius B. Phillips against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

F. L. Willcox, Mark Reynolds, and L. W. McLemore, for appellants. Lee & Moise, for respondent.

JONES, C. J. The plaintiff boarded defendant's train at Florence, S. C., as a passenger for Marion, S. C., on February 14, 1910, and was ejected at Mars Bluff, a regular station, for nonpayment of fare. Before putting plaintiff off, the conductor informed him that, if he was ejected, he would not be allowed to re-enter the train. As soon as plaintiff stepped on the ground, he offered to pay full cash fare from Florence to Marion, but was informed by the conductor that he could not get on the train, and when plaintiff got upon the first steps of the platform to re-enter the train, he was forcibly prevented. This action was brought to recover actual and punitive damages for the second ejection or exclusion. The contention of the plaintiff, sustained by the circuit court in the charge, was that a passenger lawfully ejected for willful refusal to pay fare has the right to re-enter the same train as passenger upon tender of the full cash fare from the beginning of the trip, if the ejection was at a regular station. The judgment was for plaintiff for $850.

The point has not been ruled in this state, although the writer in his concurring opinion in Weber v. Railway Co., 65 S. C. 378, 43 S. E. 888, expressed the view that one who had been rightfully expelled from a train for nonpayment of fare could not again enter the same train and acquire right to passage by tendering the fare, if his refusal to pay in the first instance was fractious or willful. The great weight of authority supports that view. Hoffbauer v. Delhi, etc., Ry., 52 Iowa, 342, 8 N. W. 121, 85 Am. Rep. 278; Louisville, etc., Ry. Co. v. Harris, 9 Lea (Tenn.) 180, 42 Am. Rep. 672; Texas &

Pac. Ry. Co. v. Bond, 62 Tex. 442, 50 Am. Rep. 532; Pickens v. Richmond, etc., R. R., 104 N. C. 812; 10 S. E. 562; Pease v. Delaware, etc., R. R. Co., 101 N. Y. 367, 5 N. E. 37, 54 Am. Rep. 699; Georgia Southern, etc., R. R. Co. v. Asmore, 88 Ga. 529, 15 S. E. 13, 16 L. R. A. 53, and note; Missouri, etc., R. R. Co. v. Smith, 152 Fed. 608, 81 O. C. A. 598, 10 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 939, and note.

We cannot think that this sound and salutary rule has no application to lawful ejection at a station where the train is accustomed to stop, and is limited to ejection between stations. The practical effect of such a limitation would be to abrogate the rule, or to cause ejections to be generally made between stations. This last would entail greater loss and inconvenience both upon the carrier and the ejected passenger, as well as delaying the other passengers. The mere wear and tear of stopping and starting a train would often exceed the fare demanded. The place for landing between stations would generally be more unsafe than at stations, because of the absence of provisions for safe landing usually made at stations. The passenger ejected between stations might often be left in darkness, without shelter, and without means to reach a station. Frequent stoppings between stations would seriously interfere with the train's schedule. Would it not be safe and wise to permit and encourage the carrier, when exercising its right of ejection, to do so at a station, so as to subject all parties concerned to the least inconvenience and injury without thereby impairing the right. The case of O'Brien v. Boston, etc., R. R. Co., 15 Gray (Mass.) 20, 77 Am. Dec. 347, was a case of lawful ejection between stations, but the primary reasons given for denying the passenger's right to re-enter the car upon tender of the fare after an expulsion for nonpayment were as follows: "Nor could he regain his right to ask of the defendants to perform their contract by his offer to pay the fare after his ejection. They were not bound to accept a performance after a breach. The right to demand the complete execution of the contract by the defendant was defeated by the refusal of the plaintiff to do that which was either a condition precedent, or a concurrent consideration on his part, and the non-performance of which absolved the defendants of all obligations to fulfill the contract. After being rightfully expelled from the train, he could not again enter the same cars and require the defendants to perform the same contract which he had previously broken. The right to refuse to transport the plaintiff farther, and to eject him from the train, would be an idle and useless exercise of legal authority, if the party who had hitherto refused to perform the contract by paying his fare when duly demanded could immediately re-enter the cars and claim the fulfillment of the original contract by the defendants." It is conceded by practically all the courts that make a distinction between expulsion at stations and between stations that the tender must be for the fare from point where the passenger first boarded the train, not from the station where re-entry is sought, which shows an unwillingness to recognize that a new relation is created by tender of fare for the same train and trip at the station of expulsion. Such belated tender of fare as a performance of the original contract cannot fully restore the status, for the passenger has willfully subjected the carrier to the trouble and risks involved in a forcible ejection, and is usually smarting under humiliation and irritation because of the expulsion, and there is reason for apprehending that he might again refuse to pay and resist ejection when returned to the place and witnesses of his humiliation. Conductors usually busy with other duties at stations ought not to be subjected to the duty of accepting fares before the passenger is admitted to the train, and he can have no assurance that trouble would not again occur when the fare was demanded in the ordinary way of the recalcitrant passenger who had just previously fractiously refused to pay.

[1] We do not regard section 2134, Civ. Code, as applicable to the discussion as that merely to the duty of the carrier to stop at the advertised stations a time sufficient for receiving and letting off passengers, referring to passengers beginning or ending passage at such station. It cannot be construed as requiring the carrier to receive as a passenger one who had been expelled for conduct amounting to a forfeiture of his right to a continuation of his trip on that particular train.

[2] While the common law makes it the duty of the carrier to accept passengers at its stations for that purpose who present themselves in a proper manner and are ready and willing to comply with the reasonable rules of the company, it does not deny to the carrier the right to enforce such a reasonable rule as one which prevents a passenger who has willfully refused to pay his fare and provoked expulsion from re-entering the same train. Pease v. Railroad, supra, was a case of expulsion at a station, where fare was tendered on the platform near the car door, which point the passenger had reached in the process of expulsion.

[3] It was held that the tender could not have the effect of making a further expulsion unlawful, and that the fact the expulsion occurred at a station was immaterial. The court inter alia used this language: "In such a case as this we think a passenger who resists the lawful requirement of the company to the extent of provoking a breach of the peace and the exhibition of violence in the presence of other passengers cannot as a matter of law demand a passage upon the train where such an exhibition has been made." Referring to the case of O'Brien v. Railway, 80 N. Y. 236, the court stated that it held "that, if the stoppage of a train is rendered necessary to expel a passenger therefrom for a fractious refusal to pay fare, he does not by offering to pay it before expulsion become entitled to continue the trip." And, further referring to the O'Brien Case, the court said that it decides nothing further than that after arrival at a station and while there, and before force has been applied to effect expulsion, tender of fare would render expulsion unlawful. It is thus made clear that in these cases the fact that the train was at a station was only material in determining when the process of expulsion began. Since the train must stop at a regular station in any event, it cannot be said that the stopping was the beginning of process to expel the passenger, whereas between stations the stopping of the train, if for the purpose of expulsion, is a process in the expulsion. We cannot conceive that an expelled passenger at a station may enter into a new relation by purchasing a ticket entitling him to board the train at that point on the theory that the carrier has made a new contract. Even in that event, the authorities, with an exception or two, appear to hold that the passenger must pay the fare from the initial point of the trip. Swan v. Manchester, etc., R. R., 132 Mass. 116, 42 Am. Rep. 432. It may be also that, if the expelled passenger with the knowledge and acquiescence of the conductor had re-entered the car with intention to comply with the reasonable rules of the company, there would be evidence of a restoration of the original relation, which would prevent another expulsion, if timely tender of fare was made.

The case before us presents no such circumstances. The plaintiff, although warned beforehand that he would not be allowed to return to the train if ejected, immediately after ejection endeavored to re-enter the train, notwithstanding the ejection and interposition of the train officials. There should be a new trial.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

1. TRIAL (§ 194*)—INSTRUCTIONS—PROVINCE OF JURY.

Where, on the trial of a cause, the testimony on a material fact was conflicting, a charge that, where testimony is contradictory, it is the province of the jury to solve the difference and give a reasonable solution of the matter, is not improper as a charge on the facts.

Action by J. W. Trowbridge against the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Bonham, Watkins & Allen, for appellant. Hood & Sullivan, for respondent.

JONES, C. J. This appeal is from a judgment in favor of plaintiff against defendant for $190 as damages to a car load of bananas shipped to plaintiff at Anderson, S. C., from New Orleans, La. The testimony for plaintiff tended to show that the bananas were delivered to the initial carrier at New Orleans on June 13, 1910, in good green condition; that on June 15th the bananas were inspected in Atlanta, Ga., and found in good, green condition with about 25 bunches slightly turning; that the bananas arrived at Anderson, S. C., on Saturday night, June 18th; that three days were a reasonable time for the shipment of fruit from New Orleans to Anderson; that plaintiff inquired of defendant's agent at Anderson on Friday, 17th, and Saturday, 18th, of June, and was informed that the bananas had not arrived; that on Saturday night plaintiff was informed of the arrival of the car; that he could not unload the car on Saturday night; that on Sunday morning the bananas were in an overripe condition, and, when the car was delivered on Monday morning, they were found to be in an unsalable condition, with the exception of 85 bunches out of the car load of 800 bunches. The testimony for the defendant tended to show that the bananas arrived at Anderson at 5 p. m. Friday, June 17th; that plaintiff was notified and saw the bananas that afternoon and unloaded the car on Saturday morning, June 18th; and that no notice was given it of damage to the bananas until two or three days afterwards.

[1] Judge Sease charged the jury that, when testimony is contradictory, it is the peculiar province of the jury to solve the difference and give a reasonable solution of the matter. This was clearly correct and was not a charge upon the facts, as the testimony was contradictory.

[2] It was also the province of the jury to solve the alleged contradiction in the testimony of the plaintiff himself.

[3] The contention that it was error to refuse a new trial because there was no testimony to sustain the verdict cannot be sustained.

The point made here by appellant is that the plaintiff claimed $297.07 as the amount of the damages, and that it was not disputed that, if plaintiff was entitled to recover at all, he was entitled to recover the whole amount claimed, whereas the jury only awarded $190. As proof of the larger amount necessary included the smaller, surely the appellant has no ground to complain of the favorable consideration of the jury.

The court instructed the jury in substance that, when a carrier delivers fruit in a damaged condition, the presumption is that the damage occurred while in the possession of the delivering carrier, and that the burden of proof is upon the carrier to show that the condition of the fruit was not due to its negligence. Appellant contends that the charge improperly placed the burden of proof.

[4] The bill of lading in this case stipulated that the burden to prove freedom from negligence was upon the carrier. Moreover, the instruction given was in accord with the following statement of the rule in Trakas v. Railroad, 87 S. C. 206, 69 S. E. 209: "When the goods are perishable, the carrier should exercise care in view of that fact, and, when perishable goods are delivered by the carrier in a damaged condition, the presumption makes it incumbent on the carrier to show that its negligence did not contribute to bring about or hasten the deterioration. While the carrier is not liable for losses caused by the inherent nature of the goods, it is liable for damages which result from its failure to exercise due care in view of the nature of the goods."

The exceptions are overruled, and the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Aiken County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Lizzie Woodward, as administratrix of the estate of Hamp Woodward, deceased, against the Southern Railway, Carolina Division. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

J. B. Salley, for appellant. Hendersons, for respondent.

JONES, C. J. This is an appeal from an order of nonsuit in an action for damages for death of plaintiff's intestate caused by alleged negligence of defendant. It appears that Hamp Woodward on Sunday morning, September 6, 1908, was found dead lying on the north side of defendant's track 820 yards east of its depot at Montmorenci in Aiken county. The deceased was lying on his back, his body at right angle with the track and across the path alongside the track and his head between the ends of two cross-ties, about on a level with the ties, some inches from the out edge of the rail. There were two wounds upon his head, one from the middle of the forehead cutting off much of the right side of the head and breaking the skull. The other was a three-cornered wound on the left side near back of the head fracturing the skull. These two wounds were separate. The left side of the face was in a blood shot condition, and the back of the body was dark blue. The hat of deceased was found some feet from the body in the direction of Montmorenci with the crown in a torn condition in front and on right side. The deceased lived near defendant's track about one mile east of Montmorenci where he conducted a farm, and he also carried on a fish and butcher business in Montmorenci. On the night of September 5th he left Montmorenci to go home a short time before the arrival of the defendant's passenger train from Charleston to Augusta due at Montmorenci about 9:30 p. m. He was last seen alive talking to the section master in the public road not far from Montmorenci depot eight or ten minutes before the arrival of the train, when he started for home on the public road. The night was cloudy, dark, and rainy. Between the depot and the spot where the body was found there was a low place where the water settled, which caused the public road paralleling the railroad to become wet and sloppy, which pedestrians could avoid by using the railroad track. There was a public road on both sides of the railroad, and on each side of the track there was a smooth, well-beaten path. There was some testimony tending to show that the place where deceased met his death was a thickly settled country community on the edge of Montmorenci, and that the public since the building of the railroad in 1830 had been accustomed to use the track as a pathway, notwithstanding the signboards placed at the crossings by the defendant some years previous to the death of intestate forbidding such use.

There was testimony that the engine was being operated that night without a headlight, having run from Whitepond by Montmorenci to Aiken, 27 miles, without such light, and that at Alken the engineer placed a lantern in front for a light on the protest of a policeman. It was in testimony, also, that the train was running behind schedule time, and that the speed near the place where the body was found was 45 miles an hour, and that no signal was given at Humphrey's crossing, not far east from where the body was found. For a considerable distance before reaching this spot the track was straight and downgrade. It is alleged that the train struck plaintiff and killed him as he was walking alongside of the track in a populous community, where the public has been constantly using the track as a walkway, while running its train at a reckless speed on a dark night without headlight and without giving the signals required by statute. The defendant, besides a general denial, alleged that, if deceased was killed by contact with the defendant's train, he brought it about by his own negligence in going upon the track of defendant in an intoxicated condition and lying down thereon.

In granting the nonsuit, Judge Memminger held that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of defendant, that there was no evidence that the absence of a headlight was the proximate cause of the injury, that the deceased was a trespasser, and defendant owed him no duty except not to injure him willfully or wantonly after discovery on the track, and they owed him no duty to discover him. Further, that the facts show that the deceased was drunk and asleep on the track, and that his own negligence was the cause of his injury.

The testimony as to deceased's intoxication was meager. The witness Shuler testified that he saw Woodward that afternoon, but was not right near him, and that he seemed as if he had been drinking, judging by his talk and the fact that he staggered a little, or was not steady in his walk. This was a number of hours before the time of his death. On the other hand, there was testimony that the deceased was seen talking to the section master in an ordinary way eight or ten minutes before the arrival of the train, just before he started for home. His body was found 820 yards from the depot and 700 yards from his home. So that on a dark rainy night he walked nearly a half mile to the spot where he died, and the train ran from that spot to the depot all in eight or ten minutes. Can it be said that the evidence is conclusive that deceased was drunk and asleep on the track? If he was asleep with his head between the cross-ties, as when found, is it conclusive that the train could have struck him, if his head was level with the cross-ties, as one witness testified he was found lying?

[1] We think the court was clearly in error in basing the nonsuit on the ground that the evidence showed conclusively that deceased caused his own death by being drunk and asleep on the track.

[2] It was much debated in argument whether the testimony showed that the deceased was a trespasser or a licensee. Let us waive that question, and for the purpose of this appeal assume that deceased was a trespasser. The rule of law generally applicable in such case is that the railroad company owes to a trespasser on its track the duty of so operating its trains as not to injure him wantonly or by such gross negligence as indicates a reckless disregard of human life. Smalley v. Railroad Co., 57 S. C. 243, 35 S. E. 489; Haltiwanger v. Railroad Co., 64 S. C. 8, 41 S. E. 810.

[3] We think the testimony was sufficient to carry the case to the jury on the question of recklessness. The speed of the train on a dark night running without headlight and without regarding the statutory signals, through a thickly settled community, with the knowledge that many people were accustomed day and night to use the track as a walkway, would seem to warrant submission to the jury to determine whether the conduct of defendant's employes was merely inadvertent, or was in reckless disregard of human life. McKeown v. Railroad Co., 68 S. C. 488, 47 S. E. 713.

[4] The failure to give the statutory signals is competent testimony on the question of recklessness. Goodwin v. Railroad Co., 82 S. C. 327, 64 S. E. 242; Rowe v. Railroad, 85 S. C. 25, 66 S. E. 1056.

The judgment of the circuit court is reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

HAYGOOD v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 12, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. ASSAULT AND BATTERY (§ 66)—JUSTIFICATION—ABUSIVE LANGUAGE.

Opprobrious words or abusive language, which may, under the provisions of the Code of this state (Pen. Code 1910, § 108), be given in evidence as a justification for an assault, or an assault and battery, are such as are used by the person assaulted or beaten, at the time of the assault, or assault and battery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assault and Battery, Cent. Dig. § 95; Dec. Dig. § 66.*]

2. JUSTIFICATION OF ASSAULT.

Upon review of the decisions in Mitchell v. State, 41 Ga. 527, and Berry v. State, 105 Ga. 683, 31 S. E. 592, this court declines to overrule them, as to the point above decided.

Certified Question from Court of Appeals.

J. W. Haygood was convicted of an assault, and brings error. Questions certified from the Court of Appeals. Questions answered.

The Court of Appeals certified to the Supreme Court the following question: "In a prosecution for assault and battery, can the accused give in evidence, as a justification of the alleged assault and battery, opprobrious or abusive language written and published of him by the person upon whom he made the alleged assault and battery? In this connection counsel for the plaintiff in error requests the Court of Appeals to call the attention of the Supreme Court to the cases of Mitchell v. State, 41 Ga. 527, and Berry v. State, 105 Ga. 683, 31 S. E. 592, for the purpose of having the decisions in these cases reviewed and overruled."

J. T. Hill, for plaintiff in error. A. J. McDonald, Sol., for the State.

LUMPKIN, J. The question propounded by the Court of Appeals is concluded by the decisions in Mitchell v. State, 41 Ga. 527, and Berry v. State, 105 Ga. 683, 31 S. E. 592. In the latter case the ruling made in the former was reviewed, but the members of the court were equally divided in opinion as to whether it should be overruled, and so it remained of force, as, under the statute, the concurrence of five Justices was required to overrule a decision made by three Judges prior to the increase in the number of Justices upon the Supreme Bench. The request is again made to review and overrule those decisions. After consideration, we decline to overrule them as to the point now before us. The argument in their favor was clearly stated in the opinion of Mr. Justice Little in the Berry Case.

[1, 2] At common law opprobrious words or abusive language did not justify an assault. The Legislature of this state saw fit to modify the common-law rule to some extent. Section 103 of the Penal Code of 1910 reads as follows: "On the trial of an indictment for an assault, or an assault and battery, the defendant may give in evidence to the jury any opprobrious words, or abusive language, used by the prosecutor, or person assaulted or beaten; and such words and language may or may not amount to a justification, according to the nature and extent of the battery, all of which shall be determined by the jury." The question before us turns upon the proper construction of the expression that the defendant "may give in evidence to the jury any opprobrious words, or abusive language, used by the prosecutor, or person assaulted or beaten," upon the trial of an indictment for an assault, or an assault and battery, as matter of justification, to be determined by the jury. When does the statute contemplate that such words must have been used, in order for them to be introduced in evidence as matter of justification? Only two possible constructions can be placed upon it—either that it means words used at the time of the assault, or assault and battery, or else words used at any time whatsoever, though it may have been years before. There are no words in the section of the Code from which a construction fixing a time between these two limits could be derived. The court cannot say that words used a day or a week or a month before the transaction may be proved, and amount to a justification in the determination of the jury; but words used 5 years, 10 years, or 20 years before will not do so. In Alabama a somewhat similar statute has been passed, but it authorizes proof of words used at the time of the battery or reasonably near thereto. There are no such words in our statute. If the construction is adopted that the word "used" by the person assaulted or beaten means words used at the time of the assault or battery, it gives to opprobrious or abusive words at the time of the transaction a status as a part of such transaction, leaving their effect as to justification to be determined by the jury. If the other construction is adopted, it means that the Legislature intended to confer upon the jury the right to declare a battery justified for any such words used at any indefinite time in the past. The language of the section quoted seems also to be more applicable to spoken words than to published libel.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r indexes

Again, the general theory of the criminal law which justifies the use of force upon the person of another is for protective purposes, not for revenge, or to allow an individual to take into his own hands the punishment of past wrongs. The construction which is placed upon the statute under consideration puts it in harmony with this general principle of criminal law, except that it recognizes that passion may be inflamed by opprobrious or abusive words used in the presence of another to such a degree that the jury may fairly treat them as in the nature of verbal acts, or as the equivalent of an assault by the person using them upon the other party, justifying a use of force by the latter not disproportioned to the circumstances of the case. To place upon the words of the statute the other construction mentioned would be to attribute to the Legislature the intention of allowing each individual to avenge or punish past wrongs done to him by the use of opprobrious or abusive words, however long after they were uttered, leaving the jury to say whether he was authorized to inflict such punishment. We recognize the sense of anger, of wrong, even of outrage, which may arise from opprobrious and abusive words, or from libelous publications. But we do not think that the Legislature intended to authorize each individual to punish one guilty of a past wrong so inflicted, and yet prohibit him from executing punishment or vengeance for wrongs which may be of even a graver character. All the Justices concur, except FISH, C. J., disqualified.

ATKINSON and HILL, JJ., concur specially, because they are bound by the former decisions, which cannot be overruled, as the necessary number of Justices do not concur in so doing, though, as an original proposition, they might hold otherwise.

PARDEE et al. v. CAMDEN LUMBER CO.
et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 5, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. INJUNCTION (§ 52*)—INJURY TO GROWING
TIMBER—ADEQUATE REMEDY AT LAW.

As growing timber is part and parcel of the land on which it stands, wrongful destruction thereof is an injury to the land itself, not adequately remediable by an action at law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 105; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

2. INJUNCTION (§ 52*)—PROTECTION OF OWNER OF STANDING TIMBER.

An owner of land with standing timber thereon has a legal right, not sustained by legal remedies, to keep the timber in its natural state until such time as he may see fit to alter its character and incidents by severance, wherefore equity, upon a proper application therefor, will interpose its remedies for protection thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 105; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

3. INJUNCTION (§ 52*)—CUTTING STANDING TIMBER—PLEADING.

To obtain an injunction to prevent such a trespass, it is not necessary to allege the insolvency of the trespasser nor any other circumstance rendering an action at law futile or unavailing as a remedy for the injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 105; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

4. INJUNCTION (§ 38*)—CUTTING TIMBER.

When the title to land is in dispute, and an action of ejectment has been, or is about to be, instituted by the claimant out of possession, he may enjoin the other from cutting timber on the land pending the determination of the question of title in the law court.

5. INJUNCTION (§ 163*)—DISSOLUTION.

In such case a verdict for the defendant in the law action, not carried into judgment, does not justify dissolution of the injunction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Dec. Dig. § 163.*]

6. CONFLICTING DECISIONS.

In so far as they conflict with the principles here declared, the following decisions and others of their class are disapproved and overruled: Marcum v. Marcum, 57 W. Va. 285, 50 S. E. 246; Curtin v. Stout, 57 W. Va. 271, 50 S. E. 810; Stephenson v. Burdett, 56 W. Va. 110, 48 S. E. 846, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 748; Burns v. Mearns, 44 W. Va. 744, 30 S. E. 112; *Cresap v. Appeal from Circuit Court, Webster County.

Bill by Barton Pardee and others against the Camden Lumber Company and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Haymond & Fox and Morton & Wooddell, for appellants. W. S. Wysong, Linn & Byrne, and B. P. Hall, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, J. This appeal from an order dissolving an injunction awarded to prevent the cutting of timber on a tract of land, the title to which is in dispute, pending an action of ejectment to determine the title, would necessarily and inevitably fall under a rule or principle often declared by this court, if we should adhere to it. Unless the trespass itself constitutes irreparable injury, none is shown, for there is no allegation of insolvency of the trespasser nor of any other circumstance precluding recovery of such compensation in money as the law gives for the injury done and threatened by an action.

[1] In 1874, in the case of McMillan v. Ferrell, 7 W. Va. 223, this court prescribed, as being essential and indispensable to a bill to prevent the cutting of timber, averments of good title in the plaintiff, trespass by the defendant, and the insolvency of the latter or some other circumstance, rendering an action for damages futile or unavailing, and that doctrine has been uniformly maintained ever since. Curtin v. Stout, 57 W. Va. 271, 50 S. E. 810; Marcum v. Marcum, 57 W. Va. 285, 50 S. E. 246; Stephenson v. Burdett, 56 W. Va. 110, 48 S. E. 846, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 748; Burns v. Mearns, 44 W. Va. 744, 30 S. E. 112; Cresap v. Kemble, 26 W. Va. 603; Schoonover v. Bright, 24 W. Va. 698. However, this rule seems not to have commanded uniform approval by the public, nor by the members of the legal profession, and in later years, under conditions greatly enhancing the value of timber and altering, to a considerable extent, the method of handling it, the dissatisfaction has grown in extent and intensified in degree. Out of the great disfavor into which the rule has thus fallen, an insistent demand for its abolition has brought forth earnest, able, and laborious inquiry as to the soundness of the reasoning upon which it was established, resulting in increased dissatisfaction, which has extended even to members of this court, as will appear from official expressions of personal disapproval of the doctrine or principle of the line of decisions just mentioned.

Under these circumstances, we feel it our duty to re-examine the proposition and thoroughly test its soundness by the application of legal and equitable principles. The chief restraint or limitation upon the overruling of decisions is the inexpediency and injustice of disturbing property rights. Hence it has been said that a line of decisions enunciating a principle which has become a rule of property, or under which property rights have vested by reason of its observance and adoption in contracts, will not be overruled. Here there is no such limitation. To abolish the rule or principle under consideration neither destroys nor impairs any property right or incident. On the contrary, the abolition thereof will conserve and protect such rights and incidents, for no man can be said to have a property right in that which amounts to a trespass against his neighbor or a stranger. The effect will be to give the admitted and acknowledged property owner a more complete remedy for the vindication of his property rights. We regard the rule as one pertaining to remedy only as regards the trespasser who is the sole beneficiary thereof. Hence, if the application of the test above mentioned shall disclose its unsoundness, we shall feel entirely free to abrogate it. Having created or ordained it, this court may consistently discard it, without injury to any person and to the great relief of property owners.

Supposed adequacy of the legal remedy for the cutting of timber, regarded as a mere trespass upon land, constitutes the basis of the rule. If the legal remedy is not adequate, the whole doctrine necessarily fails. Whether it is must be determined by reference to the general policy of the law as disclosed by its application in analogous and related cases. In other words, we must see to what extent the remedies afforded by courts of law and equity protect and vindicate the right of an owner of property to keep it in such condition as he desires. If we find the general object to be the maintenance of this right, respecting all other kinds of property, we must necessarily say it ought to extend to the right of an owner of timber to allow it to stand upon his land in its natural state as long as he desires it to do so. Timber cut down and converted into mere logs and lumber is plainly not the same thing as standing timber. It is equally manifest that the legal remedies are wholly inadequate to reconvert logs and lumber into live, standing, growing trees. Our rule permits a mere trespasser to utterly destroy the forest of his neighbor, provided he is solvent and able to respond in damages to the extent of the value thereof. It can neither restore the forest, nor prevent its destruction. It allows the property to be wholly altered in nature and character, or converts it into a mere claim for damages. After the timber has been cut, the owner may recover possession thereof by an action of detinue, or, waiving that, may recover its value, but this does not in either case restore the property to its former state, nor replace it by the return of an equivalent. The general principles of English and American jurisprudence forbid such a result. They guarantee to the owner of property the right, not only to possession thereof and dominion over it, but also its immunity from injury, unless it be of such character that it may be substantially replaced. On the theory of adequacy of the legal remedy an injunction to prevent the sale or destruction of certain kinds of personal property will be refused, but the principles upon which this conclusion stand cannot be extended to all forms of property either real or personal, and the courts do not attempt so to extend it. Compensation in damages is adequate in all those instances in which the property is injured or destroyed may be substantially replaced with the money recovered as its value. For instance, the world is full of horses, cattle, sheep, hogs, lumber, and many other articles. Ordinarily, one of these may be replaced by another just as good. This principle is applied in a proceeding for specific performance of contracts for the sale of corporate stocks. If the stock belongs to a class found generally in the market for sale, equity refuses specific performance of the contract, because other stock of the same kind can be purchased with the money recovered as damages. If, on the other hand, the stock is limited and unobtainable in the market, specific performance will be enforced. Similarly, as no two pieces of land can be regarded as equivalent in value and character in all respects, equity will always enforce specific performance of a valid contract for the sale thereof. If personal property possesses a value peculiar to its owner, or, as it is generally expressed, has a pretium affectionis, equity will vindicate and uphold the right to the possession thereof and immunity from injury by the exercise of its extraordinary powers. We observe, also, that the law gives a remedy for the possession of personal property, however trivial its value or character may be. It does not limit the owner to a claim for damages, unless the property has gone beyond the reach of its process. As equity follows the law, and, as far as possible, supplies omissions therein, so far as may be necessary to the effectuation of substantial justice, it vindicates the right of an owner to enjoy his property without injury or molestation by the exercise of its preventive powers; but, harmonizing with the great divine rule of help to those who help themselves, equity goes no further than is necessary. Therefore, if a man threatens to take away or kill his neighbor's horse, a court of equity will not interfere by injunction, because the owner may recover the value of that horse and buy another in the general market of substantially the same kind or value. For the same reason, it refuses to enforce specific performance of a contract of sale of a horse. But, if a man is about to destroy his neighbor's heirlooms, things having a peculiar value and insusceptible of replacement by purchase in the market, the legal remedy is not adequate, and a court of equity will, therefore, protect the possession and title of the owner by the exercise of its extraordinary powers. Again, the owner of a fund misappropriated or diverted by a trustee or other custodian thereof, or the owner of a fund representing the proceeds of property wrongfully taken from him, may in equity follow that fund up and charge the amount thereof upon property into which it has been invested, even though he has a right of action at law against the trustee, custodian or wrongdoer. So a creditor, having a lien upon a particular fund or particular property for his debt, may charge that fund in equity, and will not be turned away merely because he has a right of action in a court of law against the debtor. In all these cases, the remedy by law is inadequate, because it does not enforce the right of the injured party to the full extent thereof. Such being the general policy of the law, do we not violate it by denying to the owner of standing timber his clear and indisputable legal right to have it remain upon his land until such time as he shall see fit to convert it into a different kind of property? Moreover, standing timber is everywhere regarded as part of the real estate upon which it grows. The cutting thereof converts it into personal property, and wholly changes its legal nature and incidents. Being a part of the land itself, it has no legal equivalent in nature or value, for no two pieces of land are alike in all respects, nor is a piece of land, stripped of its timber, with a right of action for the felled timber or for damages, the equivalent of the same land with the timber on it. Courts universally hold that all contracts relating to real estate are subjects of equitable cognizance, because they relate to real estate. A distinction is made between contractual rights respecting real estate and liability growing out of trespasses thereon. Because of the relation of landlord and tenant, a court of equity will always prevent such misuse of the property by the tenant as amounts to waste and injury to the freehold. Nevertheless, this court and others have denied the same sort of relief in cases of like injury by trespassers. The wrong done by a tenant and that done by a stranger being of the same character and of equal gravity, courts of equity grant relief in the one case, and deny it in the other, upon the theory of adequacy of the legal remedy in the one and inadequacy thereof in the other. This difference rests, to some extent, upon reason and legal principle. A landlord cannot sue his tenant in ejectment or unlawful detainer, and recover possession while the term lasts. In the case of a stranger he may sue at any time. It does not follow, however, that the legal remedy against the stranger is adequate. The argument amounts only to this: That there is a legal remedy in the one case, and none in the other. It does not extend to the question of adequacy of the remedy in the case in which there is one for the reasons we have stated. Of course, the legal remedy is adequate, if the trespass amounts to nothing more than the trampling of the grass or throwing down of the fences, acts in no way affecting the substance of the estate, but the adequacy of the remedy in such cases does not argue efficacy in those cases in which part of the real estate is actually severed and carried away, to the injury and detriment of the inheritance. In Whitehouse v. Jones, 60 W. Va. 680, 690, 55 S. E. 730, 734 (12 L. R. A. [N. S.] 49), Judge Brannon condemned the rule now under consideration in the following terms: "It seems to me that this doctrine is now, always has been, unsound. Timber is of such inestimable value for building and repairing houses and fences, for fuel, and other purposes. It takes half a century or more to regrow it when once removed. A trespasser, without title, cuts it to-day, to-morrow, and on. Must you sue him in suit after suit for each day's or week's depredation? Or will you wait until he gets through, then have a long lawsuit? The timber is gone forever. The party has become insolvent. The remedy is not full and adequate."

Upon the principles and considerations here stated, we are of the opinion that the adoption of this rule was a deviation from fundamental principles of our jurisprudence. It is no doubt attributable to a lack of appreciation of the true character of timber, due to its former abundance and comparative worthlessness. In early days it was regarded as an incumbrance and burden upon lands. Having nothing but forests, the chief object or purpose of landowners everywhere was to get rid of the forests, and prepare their lands for agriculture. There was an abundance of timber, and no market for it.

The soil was unillable because of the timber. Hence it was a common practice for owners to cut down the finest of timber, faultless oak, poplar, pine, walnut, and hickory, and burn it upon the premises in log heaps, upon the theory of a disposition of an incumbrance and obstacle to the growth and development of agriculture as a pursuit. Anybody who desired to cut a tree on his neighbor's land in the pursuit of wild animals or the search for deposits of honey had a tacit permission to do so. Forest fires were not regarded as evils, unless they happened to destroy fences, buildings, or other improvements or agricultural implements or products. Timber was not regarded as anything more than an ordinary commercial article, and almost worthless because of its abundance. The prevalence of this estimate of its character was naturally calculated subtly to influence the minds of the judiciary, for the judges were men then, as they now are and always have been, mingling with the populace, and insensibly and unconsciously absorbing, to a greater or less extent, the prevailing sentiment of the people. The error, thus born, has been revealed by the great change of conditions. Timber having become scarce and of great value, the layman, lawyer, and judge has in recent years given the subject more careful, critical, and profound consideration, with the result that the error is practically admitted everywhere.

[2] Violative of principle, as we think, the rule is also contrary to the great weight of authority. In the general struggle for relief from it, courts have in some instances based distinctions upon the relative values of the timber and the land, saying the cutting of timber, constituting the chief value of the land, will be enjoined, but we think a clear case of trespass by the cutting of timber should always be enjoined. In one sense a small quantity of timber on land is more indispensable to its enjoyment than a large quantity. As to the weight of authority, see 5 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 495; 22 Cyc. 832; High, Inj. §§ 671-679. Our conclusion, treating growing timber as part of the real estate and placing it on the basis of minerals, applies the law enunciated in Freer v. Davis, 52 W. Va. 1, 43 S. E. 164, 59 L. R. A. 556, 94 Am. St. Rep. 895, allowing an injunction to prevent irreparable injury pending the determination of a dispute as to title by an action at law. This suit for an injunction was ancillary to an action of ejectment pending between the parties for that purpose.

[4] On the motion to dissolve the injunction, a verdict in favor of the defendants in the action of ejectment was read, and it is here invoked in justification of the decree appealed from. In our opinion it has not such force and effect.

[5] The order recording it is interlocutory. Though the verdict constitutes a basis for judgment, it is not a judgment. Besides, it may be set aside, and thus wholly fail. It is said a motion to set this verdict aside was pending, but that, as it was not incorporated in this record, it cannot be considered. Deeming nothing short of a judgment conclusive of the question of title, we refrain from discussion of the question of practice. We know, as matter of law, the verdict alone is not a final adjudication, and are not at liberty to forecast the final action of the trial court. Presumptively the verdict is right, but, to be effective as a matter of adjudication, it must be carried into judgment.

For the reasons here stated, the decree complained of will be reversed, the injunction reinstated, and the cause remanded.

BRANNON, J. This note does not evince any dissatisfaction with the opinion prepared by Judge POFFENBARGER. I write it only to give a short personal reason why I agree to overrule many decisions denying equity jurisdiction by injunction against cutting timber, in addition to those given by Judge POFFENBARGER. I am averse to overrule decisions; but the rule of those decisions is so bad that it ought not to stand. I expressed my dissatisfaction with the rule denying injunction on page 690 of 60 W. Va. 55 S. E. 730, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 49, in case of Whitehouse v. Jones. I write this note to say that a strong rule or argument to justify a court in overruling an erroneous decision is this: That, when the continued operation of the erroneous decision will do more harm than would its overruling, it should be overruled. I referred to this rule in my opinion in Weston v. Ralston, 48 W. Va. 180, 36 S. E. 446. I find the case of Calhoun Co. v. Ajax Co., 27 Colo. 1, 59 Pac. 607, 50 L. R. A. 209, 83 Am. St. Rep. 17, laying down that position. It holds: "A wrong decision should not be followed unless it has been a rule of action so long, and relied upon to such an extent, that greater injustice and injury will result from a reversal, though wrong, than to observe and follow it." The erroneous decisions overruled in this case have been running on doing mischief all the time. Overruling them will avoid that mischief and do no harm, especially as it only relates to remedy.

PITTSBURG HYDRO-ELECTRIC CO. v. LISTON.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 5, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 35*)—CONDEMNATION FOR ELECTRIC COMPANIES—PUBLIC USE.

The Legislature may authorize the taking of private property for public use, upon making provision for just compensation therefor, by electric power, heat, light, and traction companies. Clause 6 of chapter 13, Acts [Ex.

Sess.] 1907 (Code Supp. 1909, c. 42, § 2, cl. 6), amending and re-enacting section 2, cl. 6, c. 42, Code 1899 (Code 1906, c. 42, § 2, cl. 6), is not an unwarranted exercise by the Legislature of the power of eminent domain.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. § 80; Dec. Dig. § 35.*]

2. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 67*)—PUBLIC PURPOSE—EXPEDIENCY.

Whether it is expedient, appropriate, or necessary to provide for a public service of a particular kind or character is a legislative, not a judicial, question.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 165-167; Dec. Dig. § 67.*]

3. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 67*)—JURISDICTION—PUBLIC USE.

Courts are limited in their inquiry to the question whether the particular service provided for is a public service.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 165-167; Dec. Dig. § 67.*]

4. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 10*)—EXERCISE OF RIGHT—AGENCIES.

The Legislature may select the agencies through which it will exercise the right of eminent domain, including foreign corporations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 35-48; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

5. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 10*)—FOREIGN ELECTRIC POWER COMPANIES.

Section 30, c. 54, Code 1906, confers upon foreign electric power, light, heat, and traction companies that have complied with the conditions of law entitling them to do business in this state, and that propose to serve the public, equal right of eminent domain with like domestic companies, and subjects them to the same regulations, restrictions, and liabilities.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

6. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 1*)—DEFINITION.

"Eminent domain" is the right or power of a sovereign state to appropriate private property to particular use, for the purpose of promoting the general welfare. It is an inherent, inalienable, sovereign right, and lies dormant in the state until the Legislature sees fit to exercise it, either directly, or by investing some corporation, or individual, with the power to exercise it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 1, 2; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Preston County.

Action by the Pittsburgh Hydro-Electric Company against Elizabeth Liston. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

J. R. Trotter, for plaintiff in error. P. J. Crogan and A. Bliss McCrum, for defendant in error.

WILLIAMS, P. Elizabeth Liston has obtained a writ of error to an order of the circuit court of Preston county, made in a condemnation proceeding against her by the Pittsburgh Hydro-Electric Company, investing said company with title to 15.45 acres of her land at the fork of Cheat river and Big Sandy creek in Preston county, W. Va., upon payment to her, by it, of the sum of $500, ascertained by commissioners appointed in the manner provided by law to be a just compensation therefor.

[1] Condemnation proceedings were instituted by virtue of chapter 13, Acts [Ex. Sess.] 1907, amending and re-enacting section 2 of chapter 42, Code 1899. That portion of the act applicable to this case is as follows, viz.: "Sec. 2. The public uses for which private property may be taken or damaged, are as follows: * * * Sixth. For telegraph and telephone companies and electric power, heat, light and traction companies, when for public use. That telephone and electric light, heat, traction and power companies desiring to extend their lines in this state may place poles and wires along any county road, by and with the consent of the county court through which such lines may pass; provided, that all such poles and wires shall be placed and erected so as not in any way to interfere with the public use of such road or with any fruit or shade trees or with any private property; and provided, further, that when any such company desires to erect its poles along any street of any incorporated city, town or village, the consent of the council of such city, town or village shall first be obtained. Provided, that any power company using or occupying any highway under this act, shall furnish to any person, company or corporation, along, upon or near its line or lines desiring the same, every kind of service at the minimum charge for like services charged to any other person, company or corporation for like service, and upon the same terms, if amount of power consumed and conditions and expenses to such power company be the same; should at any time the power generated by any power company be insufficient to furnish all persons, companies and corporations the amount of power desired, such power company shall first serve municipal corporations having contract therefor; second, persons, companies or corporations engaged in manufacture or transportation; and third, individual customers. Any violation of any provisions of this clause shall work a forfeiture of all rights acquired under it."

The constitutionality of this statute is assailed by counsel for Mrs. Liston, on the ground that it authorizes the taking of private property for private use, which is in violation of the spirit of the Constitution. The authorities uniformly hold that the eminent domain exists only for the public welfare, and that private property cannot be lawfully taken for private uses. The exercise of the sovereign power for such a purpose would be an usurpation of power never delegated to the state by the people, an unwarranted invasion of the rights of private property which has always been a right sacred in the eyes of the English common law, and still held sacred by the laws of all the states of the Union. An owner of property can only be compelled to surrender it to subserve the public good, and even then only when just compensation is paid to him, or secured to be paid. No court, so far as we know, has ever held that private property can be taken for private use. And, on the contrary, none of them hold that a state cannot lawfully take private property for public use.

[8] Lewis, in his excellent work on Eminent Domain (section 1), defines "eminent domain" to be "the right or power of a sovereign state to appropriate private property to particular use, for the purpose of promoting the general welfare." It is an inherent, inalienable, sovereign right, and lies dormant in the state until the Legislature sees fit to exercise it, either directly, or by investing some corporation, or individual, with the power to exercise it. It is interesting to note the various purposes for which the Legislatures of the states have successively exercised the power of eminent domain, as discovery and invention would bring about new social and economic conditions calling for its exercise in relation to some matter not theretofore thought of. In the early history of our country the needs of the public were few, and the eminent domain was exercised in respect to a very limited number of subjects. Gristmills and highways were about the first, and for some time the only, material things in which the public had a common use. But since the advent of steam and electric power, many water mills which once flourished, served large communities, have passed into disuse. And while the old mill acts are still retained as part of the law of this state, they are seldom, if ever, invoked in condemnation proceedings. At first public roads, turnpikes, canals, and navigable streams furnished the only means for travel and commerce; but later on, when steam began to be used as a motive power, the eminent domain was applied in the promotion of railroad development, as another means of serving the public. The following are some of the many subjects which the Legislatures of many of the states have deemed of sufficient public utility to justify the taking of private property, viz.: Gristmills, public roads and turnpikes, steam and street railroads, canals, pipe lines for carrying water, oil, and gas, sewers and drains, public buildings including schoolhouses, mining privileges, irrigation of arid lands, and drainage of swamp lands. And the courts have uniformly held that the taking of private property for such purposes was a lawful exercise of the state's power. In more recent years the discovery of that hidden, magic force known as electricity, and all the varied uses to which it has been applied to serve the wants and conveniences of mankind, have again called forth the exercise, by the state, of the right of eminent domain, for a purpose not there-tofore contemplated. Until the discovery of this new force, and the invention of means by which it could be transmitted, controlled, and applied, so as to give light, heat, and power, only a limited use could be made of the natural waterfalls which abound in this state. It is not practicable to transmit water power a very great distance, and, in order to utilize the waterfalls as a direct motive power at all, mills and factories would have to be erected near by, and very many of such waterfalls are found in sections remote from railroads. But these waterfalls, however remote from railroad development, may be utilized to develop electricity, and electricity possesses the quality of being separated and transmitted by means of wire over hill and valley for a long distance, without a very great diminution of its force. By this means water power can be converted into electric power, and transmitted over a wide area, and be made to serve the uses of a greater number of people than any other physical force yet discovered. Moreover, electricity possesses the combined qualities of heat, light, and power, and is therefore capable of supplying more of man's wants and needs than any other natural force now known. For some, or all, of these different purposes, it is now in almost universal use in every civilized country on the globe. But electricity is not self-generating; some other force or power is necessary to produce it. Either steam or water power must be employed in the first instance before this subtle and indescribable force, known as electricity, is developed. And the Legislature, realizing that the numerous natural waterfalls in the state could be made to serve the public through the means of "electric power, heat, light, and traction companies," invested them with the right of eminent domain. They are authorized to take the lands of private persons upon making just compensation therefor, when their purpose is to serve the public. Is there such a general demand for electricity, for heating and lighting, and as a motive power, as to warrant the Legislature in extending the right of eminent domain to companies created for the purpose of supplying it? This is a legislative, not a judicial, question, and the Legislature has answered it affirmatively by the passage of the act in question. Its answer is conclusive on the court.

[3] The only question which the courts are authorized to determine is whether or not the use intended is, in effect, a public use.

This is conceded to be a judicial question. 1 Lewis on Em. Dom. (2d Ed.) § 251; Varner v. Martin, supra. But it is often a perplexing question. A public use has been variously described, but never comprehensively defined, by the courts and by text-writers. Judge Cooley, in his excellent work on Constitutional Limitations (7th Ed. p. 766), says: "We find ourselves somewhat at sea, however, when we undertake to define, in the light of the judicial decisions, what constitutes a public use." It is not every kind of benefit that a community may derive from an enterprise which is proposed to be located in its midst that will justify the taking of private property. A merely indirect and collateral benefit is not sufficient. The public must have some direct and certain right or interest in it, or control over it. Each case, however, must be determined by the application of certain general and well-recognized principles.

Light, heat, and power are essential to the comfort and convenience of the people of a community, and electricity is capable of supplying them. It can be distributed to each member of a community in such quantity as he may need. It may not only be applied in operating street railways, and in the running of large factories, but the farmer can, if he wants to, utilize it in lighting his house, and in operating machinery to saw wood and grind grain for his family and cattle. He could also relieve his wife of much labor by using it to operate the washing machine, the sewing machine, and the churn. But it is not necessary that all the people of a community should take a portion of the electric current in order to constitute the use a public one. It is sufficient if each member of the community has an equal right to a portion of it on equal terms with every other member. That some of the residents of a city do not use gas for lighting or heating, or that some elect not to have their houses supplied with water from the public reservoir, or that some refuse to avail themselves of the general convenience afforded by the telephone, affords no reason for holding telephone, gas, water, and electric power and light companies not to be public service corporations. All the residents of the city have the right to these conveniences, on the same terms with those citizens who do enjoy them, and that is sufficient to determine the service to be a public, and not a private, use.

Many states have passed statutes similar to our own, conferring the right of eminent domain upon electric companies chartered for the purpose of furnishing light, heat, and power to the public, and these statutes have been generally upheld by the courts as constituting a proper exercise of the right of eminent domain. 1 Lewis on Em. Dom. § 268, and numerous cases cited in note 70. We have examined nearly all of those cases, and cite the following specially as supporting the constitutionality of such statutes: Jones v. Electric Co., 125 Ga. 618, 54 S. E. 85, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 122; Light & Power Co. v. Hobbs, 72 N. H. 531, 58 Atl. 46, 66 L. R. A. 581; McMeekin v. Power Co., 80 S. C. 512, 61 S. E. 1020, 128 Am. St. Rep. 885; Manufacturing Co. v. Light & Water Co., 76 S. C. 95, 56 S. E. 664; Stoy v. Hydraulic Power Co., 166 Ind. 316, 76 N. E. 1057; Improvement Co. v. Pier, 137 Wis. 325, 118 N. W. 857, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 538; Canal & Power Co. v. Pratt, 101 Minn. 197, 112 N. W. 395, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 105; Matter of Niagara, etc., Power Co., 111 App. Div. 686, 97 N. Y. Supp. 853; Power Transmission Co. v. Spratt, 35 Mont. 108, 88 Pac. 773, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 567; Electric Co. v. Drake, 46 Or. 243, 78 Pac. 1031; Walker v. Power Co., 160 Fed. 857, 87 C. C. A. 660, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 725. This last case involved the constitutionality of an act of California.

The provision in our statute granting electric power, heat, light, and traction companies, when for public use, the right to erect their poles and stretch their wires along public roads, by and with the consent of the county court, and, if in a city, town, or village, by and with the consent of the authorities thereof, does not invalidate the act. Neither is the act invalidated by the provision which requires such companies to furnish service to persons along and near its line, when it occupies a public highway, and which classifies the public to be served into three classes, giving the preference: First, to municipal corporations; second, persons, companies, and corporations engaged in manufacture or transportation; and, third, individual customers, in the event there is not sufficient current developed to supply all. Such classification is clearly within the legislative jurisdiction, and does not constitute the use a private one.

We think the statute is constitutional, and shows wisdom on the part of the Legislature. The recent discoveries and inventions by means of which electricity has been made to serve the wants of man have created a demand for much of the water power of this state, which heretofore could be of little use, was of comparatively small value, and which for ages past has been allowed to go to waste. It requires more capital to build electric plants and string wires for distributing the current to supply the needs of the people than is generally possessed by the individuals who happen to be the owners of much of the water power, now made valuable because of its new possible use, and, in order that it may be utilized to serve the public, the Legislature has seen fit to clothe such corporations as are chartered for the purpose of supplying such current to the public with the right of eminent domain. A heretofore wasted natural power can thus be made to supply a public need, and the state still retain the right to prescribe reasonable regulations for the protection of the public. For no public service corporation, or company can escape this inherent sovereign power which is always reserved to the state. 1 Lewis on Em. Dom. § 246; Munn v. Illinois 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. Ed. 77; Gas Co. v. Lowe, 52 W. Va. 662, 44 S. E. 410.

That there is now no statute regulating the charges which such companies may make for services to be rendered is immaterial. It is time to prescribe regulations when the company is ready to perform the services. Moreover, it would not be possible to determine, correctly, in advance of the erection of the company's plant, and the ascertainment of the cost of furnishing the light, power, heat, etc., what would be a fair and reasonable charge therefor to the public.

It is insisted that condemnor's petition is bad because it does not aver that it has a contract to supply any municipality, or company. This omission is immaterial. It would certainly be reversing the usual order of things to require a company to obtain a franchise, or contract, to supply the public at a certain fixed rate, before it acquired the land on which to erect its plant, and before it could know whether it would ever be in a position to comply with its agreement. After the company obtains the necessary land on which to build its plant, and the easements necessary for erecting its poles, or towers, and stringing its wire, it may then be able to know at what price it will be able to serve the public. Before this is accomplished a contract as to price would be much a matter of speculation, and one in which the public would likely be the loser. Harlan v. Centralia, etc., Electric Railway Co., 42 Wash. 634, 85 Pac. 344, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 198. The condemnor's right depends, not upon contract to supply at a certain price made in advance, but upon the law, and the provisions of its charter. It is bound by law, being a public service corporation invested with the right of eminent domain, to use the property taken for the purposes set forth in its petition, and the order of the court; any other use, when the public needs and demands the service, would be a perversion of its privilege and a violation of its right.

There is nothing in the condemnor's petition which would indicate that it desires to make private use of the electricity which it proposes to generate. It alleges that it wants the land "for the purpose of the supply, storage, and transportation of water and water power and electric power for commercial and manufacturing purposes, and for public purposes and public uses for cities, towns, counties, and other municipal corporations, and for electric street and interurban railways to be operated for public purposes and for other internal improvement companies in Preston county and elsewhere in the state of West Virginia, and for all public purposes and public uses." And further that it desires to proceed at once in Pleasant district in Preston county to erect and construct reservoirs and water power and electric power plants, for the storage and transportation and supply of water and water power and electric power for the aforesaid purposes. All of these purposes are certainly consistent with the public uses declared by the statute. It should not be presumed that it wants the land for a private use when it alleges that its purpose is to serve the public. It will be time enough for the state to interpose for the protection of the rights of the public when the company begins to pervert the use, if it should ever do so, to the neglect of the public which it proposes to serve. That the petition denominates one of the uses a commercial use does not necessarily mean that the commerce is private. A sale of electric light or power to the public, whether sold to the individual members composing it, or to a municipality for their benefit, is commerce.

[4, 5] The order shows that evidence was produced at the hearing, but the record contains none of it, not even a copy of condemnor's charter. We must therefore assume that the allegations of the petition were properly proven, and that the company is duly authorized by its charter to engage in the business proposed. It was chartered under the laws of the state of Pennsylvania; but the law of this state (section 30, c. 54, Code 1906) extends to it the same rights, powers, and privileges that are conferred upon a domestic corporation created for the same purpose, on compliance with the provisions of law relating to foreign corporations desiring to do business in this state, and subjects it to the same regulations, restrictions, and liabilities that are imposed upon like corporations created by this state. This gives it the right of eminent domain, to be exercised, however, for the public use of the citizens of West Virginia. 1 Lewis on Em. Dom. § 310. The Legislature may confer the power of eminent domain upon a foreign public service corporation. 1 Lewis on Em. Dom. § 374, and numerous cases cited under note 52.

It is insisted in brief of counsel for plaintiff in error that no general public necessity is shown to exist for exercising the eminent domain for the purpose in question. This is not a judicial question, but a legislative one. 1 Lewis on Em. Dom. §§ 255, 596. In undertaking to pass on this question is where a few of the courts of the country have fallen into error.

Whether the necessity for taking the land in question exists in favor of the condemnor is largely a matter for its own determination. Id., § 597.

The order of the lower court will be affirmed.

3. WORDS AND PHRASES—"SURFACE."

Where testator devised to his son the surface of his farm, excepting coal underlying the same, the word "surface" is more limited than the word "land," and prima facie means only "vestimenta terra," but may be used in a secondary sense to denote the whole of the soil down to the center of the earth, except the coal, and, when land is purchased with the exception of mines and minerals, the purchase includes, not merely the surface, but the whole of the subsoil which does not consist of mines and minerals, and surface means not the mere plane surface, but all of the land except mines.

Error to Circuit Court, Harrison County.

Action by John J. Dolan and others against Michael Dolan and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Reversed, and judgment rendered.

Charles Powell, Kemble White, and J. E. Law, for plaintiffs in error. Davis & Davis and Osman E. Swartz, for defendants in error.

BRANNON, J. Patrick Dolan died owner of a very considerable landed and personal estate, leaving five children, John J. Dolan, Mary, Catherine, Anna J., and Michael P. Dolan. He left a will. Its fourth clause reads as follows: "I will and devise to my son, Michael P. Dolan, in fee the surface of my farm at Wolf Summit containing three hundred and seventeen acres, also six acres of the coal underlying said three hundred and seventeen acres to be located around the dwelling houses and buildings on said three hundred and seventeen acres, so as to preserve and protect the said buildings when the residue of the coal underlying the said three hundred and seventeen acres is at any time hereafter mined or removed." In clause 7 is the following language: "I further will and devise to my said daughter Catherine all the coal underlying the said tract of three hundred and seventeen acres of land hereinbefore devised to my son Michael P. Dolan, with the exception of six acres of the coal hereinbefore reserved and devised to my said son Michael P. as hereinbefore mentioned." By other clauses he made bequests and devises. To his wife his furniture during life, with remainder to Anna J. and Catherine Dolan, and $1,000 money; and to John J. Dolan 289 acres of land; to his daughter Mary $1; to Michael P. Dolan all live stock and farming utensils; to Catherine Dolan $2,000, to be paid by John J. Dolan; to Catherine Dolan a note on Robert Hoggsett for $2,510.33 and horses; to Annie J. Dolan a like note on Hoggsett; to Anna J. Dolan a brick house in Clarksburg, and a frame house in Wilsonburg; to a son of John J. Dolan a farm of 100 acres and a lot of live stock; to Catherine and Annie J. all money in bank after payment of $1,000 legacy to his wife.

Michael P. Dolan, claiming to own the oil and gas in the tract of 317 acres devised to him by the fourth clause of the will, leased the same to the South Penn Oil Company for the production of oil and gas, and this company transferred to the Hope Natural Gas Company the gas right estate under the lease. Thus the right to develop oil under lease is vested in South Penn Oil Company, and right to develop gas is vested in the Hope Natural Gas Company. John J. Dolan, Mary Flanagan, Catherine Dolan Burns, and Annie J. Coleman, four of the children of Patrick Dolan, deceased, claiming right to oil and gas in the tract of 317 acres devised to Michael P. Dolan (except a part which they quitclaimed to him), made a lease to John W. Davis for development of oil and gas in a tract of 180 acres, that part of the 317 acres not quitclaimed, and Davis transferred such lease to the Washington Gas Company. Later John J. Dolan, Mary Flanagan, Catherine Dolan Burns, Annie J. Coleman, and the Washington Gas Company brought an action of ejectment against Michael P. Dolan, South Penn Oil Company, and Hope Gas Company to recover the oil and gas in that 180 acres, and recover verdict and judgment for the same, and those defendants come to this court by writ of error.

Did Michael P. Dolan take the oil and gas under his father's will? If he did, the plaintiffs have no title to them. What does the word "surface" in a will mean? Or, rather, what does it mean as used in this particular will, for that is our question?

[3] Briefs of counsel upon this and other questions show great ability and research, but cite a legion of diverse authority confusing and bewildering to the mind. It is said that there is no subject of law on which cases are less useful than wills, as no two are alike, and the particular intent of each, under its own provision, must be the guide. As to this word "surface," a brief says that the English and law dictionaries give it no definition useful in construction of legal writings. It will not do to define it by geometry, "a magnitude that has length and breadth, without thickness, superficies, as a plane surface or a spherical;" nor to define it as does the Standard Dictionary, "the exterior part of anything that has length, breadth and thickness, the outside of a body." These definitions will not help in this case. They would not give the word "surface" in this will a depth of one inch in soil. Nor do the law authorities definitely define its legal meaning as applicable to land conveyance. Counsel for the plaintiff would limit the effect of the word to the arable or agricultural surface, the depth of the ploughshare. Does it go down to the center of the earth, taking all minerals under the maxim, "Cujus est solum, ejus est usque ad coelum et ad inferos"? I would say that a conveyance of surface of land, without more, means all the solum or land except minerals. Why not minerals? Because the word "land" is not used. If it were, it would take in minerals. The word "surface" is used, more limited, and the courts have said it excepts minerals. The testator has used this particular word never used in ordinary conveyances, which almost invariably use the word "land," which passes everything. Something is meant by the word "surface." McSwinnay on Mines, § 33, says: "'Surface' or 'superficies,' prima facie, means, of course, nothing more than mere vestimenta terra. Surface may, however, be used in a secondary sense, to denote the whole of the soil down to the center of the earth, except the mines. Pountney v. Clayton, 11 Q. B. D. pages 833, 839, 840." When land is purchased, with an exception of the mines and minerals, the purchase includes, not merely the surface, but the whole of the subsoil, which does not consist of mines and minerals. Pountney v. Clayton, supra. "'Surface' means, not the mere plane surface, but all the land except mines." Pountney v. Clayton, S. R. Q. B. Div. p. 840.

[2] Under this principle, devise to Michael P. Dolan by the fourth clause of the will of the 317 acres would except the oil and gas, and leave them in the testator's heirs. But we must look at other parts of the will in connection with that devise, and especially that provision in clause 7, which says: "I further will and devise to my said daughter Catherine all the coal underlying the said tract of three hundred and seventeen acres of land herein before devised to my son Michael P. Dolan." He took the coal from Michael P. Dolan, but took no other minerals. The fact that he put in this clause taking from Michael the coal except six acres shows that he thought that the devise of the surface carried with it all minerals, and therefore it was necessary to make exception of the coal for Catherine. But, in addition, in this seventh clause, the testator goes back in mind to clause 4, and declares that he had devised by it "the said tract of three hundred and seventeen acres of land," not the surface. He used the words "tract" and "land," words of the broadest import to convey the land and minerals in it. It seems plain, taking these two clauses together, that the testator intended to give Michael the land and everything in it, minerals and all, except the coal. He made one exception from the devise to Michael, and only one, the coal. Clause 7 interprets clause 4. Intent is the controlling guide in a will. Taking these two clauses together, can we think that the testator intended to reserve to himself the oil and gas, and leave it undisposed of by his will to go to his heirs? Can we have any other idea than that he intended to give Michael the land and everything in it, except the coal, and to give that to his daughter?

Another consideration is of great importance upon construction of clause 4; that is, that it is a fixed rule of law that, when a man makes a will, the presumption, in the absence of proofs to the contrary, is that he intends thereby to dispose of his whole estate. Irwin v. Zane, 15 W. Va. 646. "In construing wills, words and expressions of doubtful meaning will not be construed, if it can be avoided, so as to create an intestacy. The testator, having made his will, will be presumed to have intended to dispose of his whole estate, unless the contrary shall plainly appear." Houser v. Ruffner, 18 W. Va. 244. The Supreme Court of the United States said in Given v. Hilton, 95 U. S. 591, 24 L. Ed. 458, that, where there appears to be a general intent on the testator's part to make by his will a complete disposition of all his estate, such general intent is of weight "in determining what was intended by particular devises or bequests that may admit of enlarged or limited construction." Under this rule so well established in law that it is almost a pole star guiding construction of wills, when we reflect on the numerous devises and bequests made by Dolan among his entire family, wife and children, and that it covered his whole estate personal and real, and left nothing undisposed of, can we say or think for a moment that he had in mind to retain oil and gas out of the tract given Michael P. Dolan, and leave them undisposed of, and die still owning them? Can we say that he had such intention when he did not know of their presence? It is plain that he intended to give his son that tract of land clear and clean, reserving only coal.

Another forcible argument in favor of this holding lies in the fact that Patrick Dolan by his will, though disposing of his whole estate, cut off his daughter Mary with only $1. There is inconsistency between the position that he intended to except all minerals in the tract willed to Michael and the fact that the father intended to cut off Mary from sharing in his estate. The two intents are in conflict; for he must have known that, if he died still owning such minerals, she would share in them by the law of descents, whereas his fixed intent was to deny her a share. This is shown by the will itself in its $1 legacy to her. But this is enforced by some evidence offered by the defendants, but excluded. This evidence was to be given by the attorneys who prepared the will, John J. and John W. Davis, to the effect that Patrick Dolan specifically directed that the will give Mary only $1, and that later, before the completion of the will, John J. Davis asked Dolan if he thought he was doing justice to his daughter Mary, when he replied with emphatics that she must be disinherited because she had declared that she was going to marry a certain man against her father's will, showing determined purpose to exclude this daughter. The question is the import of the word "surface." Did the testator intend to reserve minerals? This evidence was meant to show that he did not design to retain minerals because that would defeat his purpose to disinherit Mary Dolan. Why say she should have only a dollar, and yet retain it may be valuable oil and gas rights in which she would share by descent? I do not think this evidence necessary, because I think the will itself gives the word "surface" meaning plain, and that there is no ambiguity; but, if there is ambiguity, evidence to enable a court to put itself in Dolan's place to show the estate, the family, the motives towards them, circumstances under which he made his will, is admissible. Wilson v. Perry, 29 W. Va. 169, 1 S. E. 302; Knowlton v. Campbell, 48 W. Va. 294, 37 S. E. 581; 18 Va. & W. Va. Ency. Dig. 789.

But it is said that our holding is contrary to Williams v. South Penn Oil Co., 52 W. Va. 181, 43 S. E. 214, 60 L. E. A. 795, in its syllabus, which reads: "The word 'surface' when specifically used as a subject of conveyance has a definite and certain meaning, and means only that that portion of the land which is or may be used for agricultural purposes." The plaintiffs rely on that as compelling us to sustain them, while the defense says that the case was wrongly decided, and should be overruled. We concur with neither contention. That case was properly decided. Wilson conveyed Monroe the surface. Under the principle above stated, that a conveyance of surface, without more, excepts minerals, Wilson's conveyance reserved oil and gas. His deed contained no clause qualifying or giving secondary meaning to the word, whereas in this will there is the language above quoted from clause 7 excepting only coal, and declaring that the testator had devised to Michael "the said tract." Moreover, that was a deed, whereas we have a will to deal with. Wilson was making a deed, and was not disposing of all his estate, as in the case of a will, and there was no presumption against intestacy as in the case of a will. In our case, as shown in the detail of devises and bequests, Wilson was not giving to his entire family his entire estate. The above quoted point in the Williams Case is inaccurate in expression; but as Wilson conveyed "surface," without anything to divert the word from its primary meaning, the point was meant only to say that such a conveyance, using only the word "surface," would except oil and gas. As the legal construction of the will gives Michael P. Dolan the oil and gas, the verdict is contrary to both law and evidence; and it was error to give a binding instruction to the jury to find for the plaintiffs, and error to refuse a binding instruction to find for the defendants.

Therefore we reverse the judgment, set aside the verdict, and enter judgment in this court for the defendants; the case turning solely on the construction of the will.

MURCHISON NAT. BANK v. DUNN OIL MILLS CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 18, 1911.)

NEGOTIABLE PAPER—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—DEFENSES—POWER OF CORPORATE OFFICERS.

A suit by a bona fide purchaser of a corporate note was defended by the maker on the ground that it had never received any consideration for the same, and that the note, being signed only by the president, instead of by the president and by the secretary as required by the by-laws, was not binding on the corporation. Held, that a nonsuit was improperly granted.

Hoke, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, New Hanover County; Peebles, Judge.

Action by the Murchison National Bank against the Dunn Oil Mills Company. Judgment for defendant and plaintiff appeals. Error.

E. K. Bryan and Rountree & Carr, for appellant. J. C. Clifford and N. A. Townsend, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. The Merchants' & Farmers' Bank of Dunn executed its note to the plaintiff bank for $10,000 borrowed money, and deposited as collateral security a note which had been executed to it for $10,000, signed, "Dunn Oil Mills Co., by J. D. Barnes, President." This note was indorsed to the plaintiff before maturity by the Merchants' & Farmers' Bank of Dunn "by E. F. Young, President." The said Merchants' & Farmers' Bank of Dunn failed, and this action was brought against the said oil mills on its said note. The defendant Oil Mills pleads that it received no consideration for the same, and that its president, J. D. Barnes, was not authorized to sign said note.

The defendant relied upon a provision in its by-laws: "All other contracts shall be in writing and signed by the president, or vice president, secretary and treasurer." The "secretary and treasurer" was one office. A fair construction of the by-law is that the writing should be signed by the president or vice president or secretary and treasurer. This note was signed by J. D. Barnes, president. His honor erred therefore in his intimation that the note in question was not binding upon the Oil Mills Company. But upon the broader question which was argued before us, whether if the by-law meant to require the secretary and treasurer and the president to sign all contracts, whether the company would be bound by a note signed by its president in the absence of proof that the plaintiff had notice of such by-law, we are of opinion that the Oil Mills Company is bound by the promissory note which was issued in ordinary course of dealing and signed by its president. Nothing is more common than for a mercantile and negotiable paper to be signed by the president or secretary and treasurer of a corporation. The well-settled rule of law is that, where one of two innocent parties must suffer by the act of another, that one which has put it in the power of the wrongdoer to commit the act must bear the loss. Railroad v. Barnes, 104 N. C. 25, 10 S. E. 83. The Oil Mills Company elected J. D. Barnes its president, and thus put it in his power, according to the usual custom, to sign notes. If he abused his trust, the loss must fall upon the company which selected him, and put him in that situation. For its own protection the company passed the above by-law. If it intended thereby to prescribe that its note should be signed by the secretary and treasurer, as well as by its president or vice president, it was competent for it to make such regulation. But such regulation would not affect the plaintiff bank which took the note for value and before maturity without notice of such regulation, and relying upon the usual custom that mercantile paper can be signed by the president or general manager of a corporation.

In Davis v. Insurance Co., 134 N. C. 60, 45 S. E. 955, this court said that the president was "the general representative of the company," and in Grabbs v. Insurance Co., 125 N. C. 389, 34 S. E. 503, it said that the expression "general agent" implied general powers. It has also been held that a general agent can make contracts for the company. Grabbs v. Insurance Co., supra; Gwaltney v. Assurance Soc., 132 N. C. 925, 44 S. E. 659; Davis v. Insurance Co., supra. It is no defense against a holder for value without notice that the officer exceeded his authority. 7 Cyc. 625. "Where a party deals with the corporation in good faith, the transaction is not ultra vires, and if he is unaware of any defect of authority or other irregularity on the part of those acting for the corporation, and there is nothing to excite suspicion of such defect or irregularity, the corporation is bound by the contract, although such defect or irregularity in the authority exists." Bank v. Bank, 10 Wall. 644, 19 L. Ed. 1008. "The bona fide holder for value of notes taken before maturity can recover against the corporation notwithstanding any want of authority of the agent to execute these notes for the purpose for which they were given." Bird v. Daggett, 97 Mass. 494. The general rule that a person dealing with an agent must know the extent of his authority does not apply when dealing with one who is a general agent as the president of a corporation. In such case the burden is upon the principal to show that the other party had notice of a restriction upon the power of the general agent. The promissory note of this corporation was not ultra vires. There is no prohibition in the law against such a corporation issuing its promissory negotiable note. In Hutchins v. Bank, 128 N. C. 72, 38 S. E. 252, the court held that a contract of guaranty by a bank cannot be avoided on the ground of ultra vires and held that even where a contract is ultra vires, the corporation will be bound if the contract was within the general scope of its powers, and has been wholly or partially executed. In that case this court said, citing Bank v. Bank, 101 U. S. 183, 25 L. Ed. 907: "It is to be presumed that the vice president had rightfully the power he assumed to exercise, and the defendant is estopped to deny it."

The president of a corporation has an implied power to indorse and transfer its negotiable paper. Indeed, in the case of national banks the president is authorized by statute to indorse the paper of the bank. Daniels, Neg. Inst. § —. Unlike mining companies, as to which cases have been cited, and who buy very little except machinery, oil mills need considerable quantities of money for the purchase of cotton seed from time to time. Indeed, they have need to issue negotiable bills far more than banks, cotton factories, and railroads. It is a matter of common knowledge that they obtain this money by issuing promissory notes, usually to the banks, as in this case. Besides, the charter of the defendant authorizes it to buy cotton and cotton seed, to gin cotton, to manufacture cotton seed oil, cotton seed meal, to buy and sell cattle, hogs, and other stock, to manufacture cotton seed hulls, to manufacture ice, to buy and sell real estate and personal property, and, in addition, specifically authorizes the defendant "to borrow money in such amounts and at such times to carry on the business of this corporation as the proper officer may deem proper." There is also authority to manufacture, buy, and sell fertilizers. These things certainly authorized the making of negotiable paper in the course of its business. Though the defendant here pleaded that it received no consideration for this paper, this was not shown in evidence. The note sued on was strictly commercial and negotiable in form under our statute. The plaintiff, a bank in a distant town, is a purchaser for value in due course. The note was put in circulation through the agency of a bank in the town where the Oil Mills were located, and with which the Oil Mills had dealings. It was put in circulation, and signed by the Oil Mills through its chief officer. The purchaser in such case in due course, knowing the course of dealings by Oil Mills in getting money from the banks, was not required to hunt up and read the by-laws of the Oil Mills before purchasing, especially since reference to the charter would have shown that the making of negotiable paper and the borrowing of money was within the scope of the powers of the defendant.

The true doctrine is stated in Bank v. Bank, 10 Wall. 64, 19 L. Ed. 1008: "That such acts of an officer of a corporation as are usually performed by that officer are valid as against the corporation in favor of innocent parties, although the act in the particular instance was beyond the authority of the officer." Banks do not usually issue promissory notes or borrow money, yet they are bound by the act of their cashiers in certifying checks falsely. The plaintiff bank in Wilmington in taking this paper, indorsed by the bank of Dunn, with which the Oil Mills at Dunn were in the habit of doing business, was not guilty of negligence in assuming that the paper was signed by the proper officer of the Oil Mills, and was issued in the course of its ordinary dealings with its regular bank. There is nothing in this evidence to show that the Oil Mills did not obtain full value. At any rate, it was the act of the Oil Mills acting through its chief officer that the paper was put in circulation and the plaintiff bank took it in due course for value and without notice, and as such is protected by the statute.

Our conclusion is that, the president of the corporation being its general agent, the promissory note executed by him in its name was prima facie valid, and, being indorsed to the plaintiff before maturity for value and without notice, the corporation is bound by the act of its president, unless it were shown that the plaintiff had notice of a restriction upon the powers of the president as such general agent. In Watson v. Mfg. Co., 147 N. C. 475, 61 S. E. 275, this court quoted with approval the following language from Thompson on Corporations, 8556: "A stranger dealing with the corporation is not affected by secret restrictions upon the powers of a general manager of which he has no notice. In short, the powers of one who has been appointed general manager of the business of the corporation are in America generally understood to be coextensive with the general scope of its business. * * * A person dealing with the corporation through him may safely act on the assumption of his possessing the power in the absence of anything indicating a want of it." In Mereshon v. Morris, 148 N. C. 52, 61 S. E. 648, this court approves the following language from Judge Thompson (10 Cyc. 1003): "Excluding the operation of express statutes, a very extensive principle of the law of corporations, applicable to every kind of written contract executed ostensibly by a corporation, and to every kind of act done by its officers and agents professedly in its behalf, is that, when the officer or agent is the appropriate officer or agent to execute a contract or do an act of a particular kind in behalf of the corporation, the law presumes a precedent authorization, regularly and rightfully made, and it is not necessary to produce evidence of such authority from the records of the corporation, always provided that the corporation itself had the power under its charter or governing statute to execute the contract or to do the act."

The Oil Mills Company had authority to execute promissory notes. The president was ex vi termini its general agent. The plaintiff having taken a promissory note executed by the president of said Oil Mills in regular course, before maturity, for value and without notice of any restriction upon the authority of the president to execute said note, the court below erred in holding that said note was not binding upon said Oil Mills Company. Any other ruling would materially affect dealings in negotiable paper executed by a corporation.

Error.

BROWN, J., took no part. WALKER, J., concurs in opinion of CLARK, C. J.

ALLEN, J. (concurring). I concur in the order directing a new trial. The question involved in this case is of the first importance, involving as it does, on one hand, the integrity of paper claimed to be negotiable, and, on the other, the power of the industrial corporation in its by-laws to restrict the authority of its officer to issue paper, and I think it ought not to be decided until the facts are fully developed.

It is material to inquire whether the defendant received any benefit from the paper in controversy in money, the payment of debts, or as a credit, and whether its president habitually transacted business of this character.

The opinion of the CHIEF JUSTICE proceeds largely upon the assumption that these facts do appear; but I do not think so.

HOKE, J. (dissenting). I am unable to concur in the view which has prevailed with the court in this case; and, believing that the decision in so far as indicated and controlled by the principal opinion is subversive of established principles and well calculated to have far-reaching and injurious effect on the business interests of the state and its people, I consider it proper to make some statement of the reasons for my position. The portion of the by-laws of the defendant, the Dunn Oil Mills, relative to the president's duties and his power to make contracts for the company, are as follows:

"Article 1. The president, with the approval of the secretary and treasurer, shall be empowered to employ a bookkeeper, at a salary to be fixed by the directors.

"Art. 2. The president shall preside at all meetings and shall make annual report to the stockholders' meeting and shall attend to all other duties hereinafter imposed upon him by these by-laws.

"Art. 3. The secretary and treasurer shall be elected by the directors for a term to be fixed by them. He shall at each semiannual meeting of the directors render an account current, showing the assets and liabilities of the company, and shall present his books and vouchers, showing receipts and disbursements of the corporation. He shall enter into a good bond of twenty-five thousand dollars in an acceptable guarantee company, for which the premiums shall be paid by this company.

"Art. 4. The president, secretary and treasurer shall have the power to employ a superintendent, salary to be fixed by them, subject to the approval of the board of directors. All purchases incident to the operation of the work shall be made by the secretary and treasurer, but no purchase shall be made by him without the approval of the president. All other contracts shall be in writing and signed by the president or vice president, secretary and treasurer."

In my opinion these by-laws by correct interpretation clearly require that, in order to bind the corporation by a contract of this character, it must be executed by the president or vice president and the secretary and treasurer, who it will be noted is the responsible officer of the company, acting under a heavy bond for the proper performance of official duty. The president of the Dunn Oil Mills then had no authority to make the corporation's note, and the instrument sued on can only be enforced as an obligation of the company on the ground that the execution of the instrument is within the apparent scope of the president's power, or that the corporation had by its negligent conduct put him in a position that enabled him to perpetrate a fraud, and, on the facts as they appear of record, neither position can be correctly maintained. From these facts it appears that on the 7th of November, 1902, the president of the Dunn bank, being in Wilmington, applied to the plaintiff bank for a loan of $10,000. The loan was made on the note of the Dunn bank, and with the understanding that collateral should be forwarded to secure the same. Later, on December 11, 1902, the president of the Dunn bank wrote, inclosing collateral, among others the note sued on, purporting to be executed by the president alone, one J. D. Barnes. The Oil Mills is a local industrial corporation engaged in the business indicated by its title, having a paid-up capital of $22,700. There are no facts in evidence tending to show that the president of the Oil Mills was accustomed to sign notes for the company, or that he had ever signed one for any purpose, except the note sued on, or that any such custom existed in corporations of this character, or that the company had ever acquiesced in or in any way ratified this or any other transaction of like kind. Nor is there testimony that the note was given for machinery or cotton seed or other material usual or necessary in the construction or operation of the plant. Nor is there any evidence tending to show that the Oil Mills needed this money, or that it has ever received a dollar of it nor any benefit from it. The only evidence even offered on that subject was a statement in a letter of the president of the Dunn bank to plaintiff, tending to show it was for the benefit of the mills, a declaration not made or sanctioned by the Oil Mills or its officers, and therefore excluded by the court. On these the controlling facts relevant to the inquiry, a decision based on the proposition that the president of the Oil Mills, an industrial enterprise, having a paid-up capital of only $22,700, may without authority and in contravention of its by-laws put in circulation a note for $10,000, binding as a negotiable instrument, is not grounded on right reason, nor is it sustained by any well-considered authority. Even in the case of banks and officers charged officially with the duties of carrying on its ordinary business, the power to borrow money has been held not within the scope of their authority, real or apparent. Bank v. Armstrong, 152 U. S. 346, 14 Sup. Ct. 572, 38 L. Ed. 470; Bank v. Bank, 47 N. J. Law, 357, 1 Atl. 478.

In the United States decision it was held: "The borrowing of money by a bank, though not illegal, is so much out of the course of ordinary and legitimate banking business as to require those making the loan to see to it that the officer or agent acting for the bank has special authority." And in the case of ordinary industrial corporations the decided cases and text-books of approved excellence are against the position of the court on the facts as presented in the record. Craft v. Railroad, 150 Mass. 207, 22 N. E. 920, 5 L. R. A. 641; Railroad v. Bank, 62 Ark. 33, 34 S. W. 89, 31 L. R. A. 535, 54 Am. St. Rep. 282; Worthington v. Railroad, 195 Pa. 211, 45 Atl. 927; Edwards v. Carson Water Co., 21 Nev. 469, 34 Pac. 381; Gould v. Gould, 134 Mich. 515, 96 N. W. 576, 104 Am. St. Rep. 624; N. Y. Iron Mine v. Bank, 39 Mich. 644; Elwell v. Railroad Co., 7 Wash. 487, 35 Pac. 376; Bocock, Ex'r. v. Coal & Iron Co., 82 Va. 913, 1 S. E. 325, 3 Am. St. Rep. 128; Bank v. Roman Catholic Church, 109 N. Y. 512, 17 N. E. 408; Cook on Corporations (6th Ed.) §§ 716-719; Clark on Corporations, p. 495; 21 A. & E. p. 859. To quote from a few of the cases: In Iron Mine v. Bank, supra, Cooley, Judge, said: "It was not disputed by the defense that the corporation as such had power to make the notes in suit. The question was whether it had in any manner delegated that power to Wetmore. We cannot agree with the plaintiff that the mere appointment of general agent confers any such power. White v. Westport Cotton Mfg. Co., 1 Pick. [Mass.] 215 [11 Am. Dec. 168], is not an authority for that position, nor is any other case to which our attention has been invited. In McCullough v. Moss, 5 Denio [N. Y.] 567, the subject received careful attention, and it was held that the president and secretary of a mining company, without being authorized by the board of directors to do so, could not bind the corporation by a note made in its name. Murray v. East India Co., 5 B. & Ald. 204, Benedict v. Lansing, 5 Denio [N. Y.] 288, and The Floyd Acceptances, 7 Wall. 666 [19 L. Ed. 169], are authorities in support of the same view. The plaintiff, then, cannot rest its case on the implied authority of the general agent. The issuing of promissory notes is not a power necessarily incident to the conduct of the business of mining, and it is so susceptible of abuse to the injury, and indeed to the utter destruction of a corporation, that it is wisely left by the law to be conferred or not as the prudence of the board of direction may determine." In Worthington's Case, supra, 195 Pa., 45 Atl., it was held: "The by-laws of a corporation upon their adoption become written into the charter, and put parties who deal with the corporation upon notice, in trading with the officers of the corporation, as to the extent of the power and agency of such officer, and this, whether the specific by-law has been brought home to them or not." In an action against a corporation to hold it liable on an indorsement of a promissory note by its president, binding instructions should be given for defendant where it appears that the president had no authority under the by-laws to make the indorsement, that the corporation received no benefit from it, and that there was no course of dealing between the parties which misled the plaintiff. In the Arkansas case the court held among other things: "(a) The president and secretary of a corporation are not empowered to bind it by their signatures to commercial paper, unless such authority is expressly conferred. Such power is not to be presumed simply from the fact that it has been exercised. (b) A corporation is liable on negotiable paper issued by its president and secretary only when express power has been conferred upon them to issue it or when they have habitually issued it, or when their act in issuing it has been validated by the corporation, or when the latter has received the benefit by the transaction."

In Cook, § 717, the doctrine is stated as follows: "The president of a corporation has no power, by reason of his office alone, to buy, sell, or contract for the corporation, nor to control its property, funds, or management. His duty is merely to preside at meetings of the board of directors, and to perform only such other duties as the by-laws or resolutions of the board of directors may expressly authorize. This is a rule established by the great weight of authority. The board of directors may, of course, expressly authorize the president to contract; or his authority to contract may arise from his having assumed and exercised that power in the past; or the corporation may ratify his contract or accept the benefits of it and thereby be bound. But the general rule is that the president cannot act or contract for the corporation any more than any other director. This question has frequently been before the courts, and many decisions have been rendered in regard to it. A large number of the cases are given in the notes below." And, even when the president acts as general manager, this same author says (section 719): "The general manager of a corporation has no power to make and deliver the promissory note of the company nor to indorse the name of the company on commercial paper except possibly in payment of debts," etc. In no jurisdiction has the wholesome doctrine contended for been more clearly stated nor more fully fortified and sustained than with us as evidenced in the case of Bank v. Hay, 143 N. C. 328, 55 S. E. 811. In that valuable opinion, Associate Justice Walker in apt and forceful language, and with a wealth of authority, sustains the propositions. "When one deals with an agent, it behooves him to ascertain correctly the scope and extent of his authority to contract for and in behalf of his alleged principal." "The authority to draw, accept or indorse bills, notes, and checks will not readily be implied as an incident to the express authority of an agent. It must ordinarily be conferred expressly, but it may be implied if the execution of the paper is a necessary incident to the business; that is, if the purpose of the agency cannot otherwise be accomplished." It is no answer to this position to say "that, when one of two innocent parties must suffer by the act of another, that one which has put it in the power of the wrongdoer to commit the act must bear the loss." This is to avoid the issue by begging the entire question. The very question involved here is whether the corporation has acted wrongfully, and whether by reason of the wrong the instrument sued on has become its obligation. What has it done or neglected to do? It has elected a president, and conferred upon him power to preside over the meetings, make annual reports, and, in conjunction with the secretary and treasurer, a bonded officer to the extent of $25,000, to make the valid and ordinary contracts incident to the business. Under the law, the signing of commercial paper is not within the scope of his authority, real or apparent. The company has done nothing to recognize or ratify his conduct on this or any other occasion, nor has it received any benefit from his act. In such case it would not do to say that the mere electing him president put him in a position to wrong others. Speaking to this question in Iron Mine v. Bank, 89 Mich. 644, Judge Cooley says: "While the principle invoked is a very just and proper one, it is one that must be applied with great circumspection and caution. Any person may be said to put another in position to commit a fraud when he confers upon him any authority which is susceptible of abuse to the detriment of others; but, if the authority is one with which it is proper for one man to clothe another, negligence cannot be imputed to the mere act of giving it. Any one who intrusts to another his signature to a written instrument furnishes him with the means of perpetrating a fraud by an unauthorized alteration or other improper use of it. But if the instrument was a proper and customary instrument of business, and has been issued without fraudulent intent in a business transaction, there is no more reason for imposing upon the maker the consequences of a fraudulent use of it than there is for visiting them upon any third person. In other words, it is not the mere fact that one has been the means of enabling another to commit a fraud that shall make him justly chargeable with the other's misconduct; but there must be that in what he has done or abstained from doing that may fairly be held to charge him with neglect of duty."

The position of the court is not strengthened by the fact that this corporation is given in express terms the right to borrow money; very few, if any, industrial companies are without such power, nor by assuming, entirely without supporting evidence, in the record or out of it, so far as the writer is aware, that an oil mill is more accustomed to borrow money than any and every other kind of industrial corporation engaged in business; nor by the proposition advanced that this was commercial paper, put in circulation by the oil company and its agencies. It does not appear that the corporation has borrowed any money, or that it has received any pecuniary benefit from the transaction, and the fundamental question is whether the note sued on was put in circulation through the oil company or its agencies, whether the paper in any way ever became the company's note, and here also, to my mind, the court assumes the very point in dispute. The cases cited and relied upon by the court do not in my view support its position. In the insurance cases cited from this court—Davis v. Insurance Co., and others—the decision proceeded on the theory that the officer was a general agent, representing the company, and the act in question was within the scope of his powers. In Bank v. Bank, 77 U. S. (10 Wall.) 604, 19 L. Ed. 1008, the acts of a bank cashier in pledging the bank's credit by certifying checks were shown to be according to a custom generally prevalent with banks and it was held that there was evidence from which it might be inferred that the custom prevailed at this particular bank and with its knowledge and assent. In Oliver W. Bird v. Daggett, 97 Mass. 494, the agent was duly authorized to sign "all notes and business papers," and this was construed as justifying the position that an accommodation note was within the scope of his apparent authority. In Hutchinson v. Bank, 128 N. C. 72, 38 S. E. 252, the question was on the power of a banking corporation to act in the premises, and the authority of the officers to charge it or the methods by which they could do it was in no way presented. And the reference to Thompson on Corporations, § 85, 5, 6, and 10 Cyc. 1008, as cited with approval in Watson v. Manufacturing Co., 147 N. C. 475, 61 S. E. 273, and Mershon v. Morris, 148 N. C. 52, 61 S. E. 647, was on facts widely variant from these appearing in this record. In Watson's Case the officer executing the note in question was president and treasurer as well as owner of nearly all the stock, was in absolute control of the corporation, its assets and purposes, and, further, there was ample evidence of ratification. Africa v. Duluth Co., 82 Minn. 283, 84 N. W. 1019, 83 Am. St. Rep. 424, on similar facts, was to like purport. In the Mershon Case the president of a lumber company had given an order for a lot of machinery for use in the company's business, which was delivered under a contract that title should remain in the vendor till the purchase price was paid. The company having become insolvent, vendor claimed a lien under the contract, and the court very properly held that the company or the receiver having control of its assets could not keep the machinery and repudiate the obligation.

But, as far as I am able to interpret them, no authoritative decisions can be found that will uphold this note as a valid obligation of the defendant company on the facts of this case. There is nothing harsh or unreasonable in the position contended for. No well-ordered bank should place $10,000 with an incorporated company of this character or any other, without looking to the authority for the transaction. No well-ordered bank does do it, or, if they do, they should not be protected in it. It was very little to ask on the part of these injured stockholders that a bank within 60 miles of the company's placing should inform themselves on this vital question. A vast and increasing amount of business in this country is being undertaken and carried on through these smaller incorporated companies. They are contributing much to the business enterprise and welfare of every section of the state, and afford one of the few opportunities remaining for small investors. A decision which ignores and breaks down the safeguards reasonably devised for their protection, affording opportunity for a faithless, inefficient, or gullible president to wreck his company, and destroy its assets under the persuasive influence of some local bank president, sometimes a friend, and always in a position to extend personal favors, is to be indeed deplored, and in my judgment has no sanction in good reason nor well-considered precedent.

I am of opinion that the order of non-suit should be affirmed.

HENRY et al. v. HILLIARD et al.

Appeal of GILMER.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 23, 1911.)

1. TRUSTS (§ 315*) — TRUSTEE — COMPENSATION.

Where, by agreement between a trustee and the beneficiaries, made June 30, 1908, it was stipulated that the trustee should receive $6,500 in full for all services since 1898, and might retain all amounts allowed for services prior to that time, a sale of land made by him in 1900 was covered by such agreement; and hence he was not entitled to make an additional charge therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. §§ 433-443, 474-479; Dec. Dig. § 315.*]

2. TRUSTS (§ 315*) — TRUSTEE — ACCOUNTS — SERVICES.

Where an agreement in proceedings to settle a trustee's account before a referee provided that the referee's report should be considered correct as to all debts and credits passing through the trustee's hands, "except as modified by the agreement as to charges for services rendered" by such trustee, the beneficiaries were not thereby precluded from objecting to a charge for services for selling certain land, alleged to have been covered by a prior agreement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. §§ 433-443, 474-479; Dec. Dig. § 315.*]

3. TRUSTS (§ 311*) — TRUSTEE — ACCOUNTS — CREDITS.

Where the amount due certain heirs from a trustee was fixed by a decree of distribution at $5,500, the trustee had no authority to pay them $8,174.17, and was therefore not entitled to credit in his account for the difference.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 430; Dec. Dig. § 311.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Haywood County; Cline, Judge.

Judicial settlement of the estate of one Love, deceased. On exceptions to the report of a referee in an action by W. L. Henry and others against W. L. Hilliard and others. From rulings modifying the referee's report, R. D. Gilmer, trustee, excepted and appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 155 N. C. 372, 71 S. E. 439.

Walter Clark, Jr., for appellant. W. T. Crawford, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. This was a civil action involving the settlement of what is termed in the record the "Love Estate." Pending the proceedings, on motion of Hon. R. D. Gilmer, trustee of funds belonging to the estate arising from sale of certain lands in Haywood, Jackson, and adjoining counties, report was made, and, on exceptions filed, the questions involved were referred by order of court to M. W. Bell, Esq., who heard testimony and made report, containing his findings of fact and conclusions of law in the case. Exceptions having been found to this report, present judgment was entered at January term, 1911, and the trustee, as stated, excepted and appealed.

[1] The objections made to the validity of the judgment are, first, that the trustee is charged with the sum of $669.30, commissions heretofore retained by him on a sale of certain lands in Jackson county made in the year 1900, under and by virtue of a written agreement as to fees had and made between the trustee and two of the beneficiaries of the estate, with the sanction of a majority of the cestui que trusts, in 1894. This item was no doubt charged against the trustee for the reason that under another agreement, entered into between all the parties of record on the 30th day of June, 1908, subsequent to the one before mentioned, it was stipulated that the trustee should receive the sum of $6,500 in full for all services since 1898, and might retain all amounts allowed him for services before that time. The sale under which this charge is made took place as stated in 1900, and the commissions, therefore, are covered by agreement for $6,500, and were, therefore, not a proper charge.

[2] It is claimed for the trustee that this objection is not open, because the parties had also agreed that the report filed by the trustee, in which this item appeared as a proper credit, should be taken as correct; but we do not think this a correct position. The agreement, in the particulars referred to, expressly states that the report of the referee "is to be considered as correct as to all debts and credits that have passed through the hands of said Gilmer, except as modified by this agreement as to charges for services rendered by said Gilmer." The objection, therefore, was open to the appellees by the express provision of the agreement.

[3] Again, it was objected that the trustee had been credited only with the sum of $5,500 as the amount properly paid by him to the heirs of Wm. Welch; whereas, the facts showed that the trustee paid these heirs the sum of $6,174.17. The answer is that the amount due these heirs had been fixed by a decree of the court made in the cause at the sum of $5,500, and there is no authority appearing for a payment of any amount in excess of that sum.

We find nothing in the record that would justify the court in disturbing the conclusion reached by his honor, and the judgment entered by him is, therefore, affirmed.

Affirmed.

PENN v. STANDARD LIFE & ACCIDENTAL INS. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 23, 1911.)

INSURANCE (§ 466*) — ACCIDENT POLICY — CONSTRUCTION.

Where an accident policy provided a specified insurance for the loss of sight, caused directly and independently of all other causes, through external, accidental, and violent means, insured was not entitled to recover for loss of sight due to an injury to an eye, caused by his accidentally falling from a train, such fall having merely hastened the loss of sight in the eye, which would have been ultimately lost independent of the accident because of a cataract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1178, 1186; Dec. Dig. § 466.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Rockingham County; W. J. Adams, Judge.

Action by Aaron T. Penn against the Standard Life & Accidental Insurance Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Morehead & Morehead and Sapp & Williams, for appellant. G. S. Bradshaw and T. H. Calvert, for appellee.

WALKER, J. The defendant issued to the plaintiff an accident policy which insured him against "the irrecoverable and entire loss of one eye" in the sum of $2,500, with the proviso that the insurance should only be "against bodily injuries effected, directly and independently of all other causes, through external, accidental, and violent means." Plaintiff alleged that he fell from a train, and was so injured that he lost the sight of one eye. There was evidence tending to cast some suspicion on his statement that he had accidentally fallen; but, in the view we take of the case, it is not necessary to further refer to it or make any comment upon it. There was also evidence tending to show that at the time of the fall he had a cataract on the eye that he alleges was injured which would have resulted eventually in destroying it, and the plaintiff introduced evidence to the contrary.

The case turns upon the construction of the language in the policy which we have quoted, and with reference to it and the evidence as to the cataract the court charged the jury as follows: "The court charges you that if you find that the plaintiff fell from the car and was thereby injured, and that this injury was soon thereafter followed by a loss of sight, and you further find that the condition of the plaintiff's eye at that time was such that, independent of that injury, he would ultimately have lost his sight, and that this injury, falling from the car, merely hastened the loss of his sight, in that event you will not find that the injury was caused directly and independently of all other causes through external, accidental, and violent means; but if you find from the evidence and by the greater weight of it that the plaintiff has suffered the entire loss of sight of his eye, that the loss of his sight is irrecoverable, that the loss was caused directly and independently of all other causes, through external, accidental and violent means, your answer to the second issue will be 'Yes.' If you do not so find, your answer will be 'No.'" The plaintiff excepted to this instruction. There was a verdict for the defendant, and, judgment having been entered thereon, the plaintiff appealed. If the instruction was a correct one, and we think it was, the rule for a new trial was properly discharged. When the terms of a policy are free from uncertainty or ambiguity, they "should be understood in their plain, ordinary and popular sense"; and it is only when "any provision, condition or exception" is "uncertain or ambiguous in its meaning or is capable of two constructions" that it "should receive that construction which is most favorable to the insured." 1 Cyc. pp. 243, 244; May on Insurance, § 172. As long as parties who are capable of so doing shall be permitted to make their own contracts, it is the plain duty of the court to enforce them as they are written, unless fraud or public policy shall intervene. Binder v. Accident Ass'n, 127 Iowa, 25, 85, 102 N. W. 190. While the rule is thoroughly settled that policies of this and like character are to be construed liberally, and that ambiguous provisions, or those capable of two constructions, should be construed favorably to the insured, and most strongly against the insurer, plain, explicit language cannot be disregarded, nor an interpretation given the policy at variance with the clearly disclosed intent of the parties. Taking the policy, in the case at bar, by its four corners, it will admit of but one construction. White v. S. L. & Accident Ins. Co., 95 Minn. 77, 103 N. W. 735, 884.

In Carr v. P. M. Life Ins. Co., 100 Mo. App. 602, 75 S. W. 180, the court said that the question of proximate and immediate cause is not raised under the conditions of a policy which in terms excludes disease or bodily infirmity, and which could have no more force than the general provision, "Independent of all other causes." See, also, C. T. Mut. Ass'n v. Fulton, 79 Fed. 423, 24 C. C. A. 654. If the jury had found that the injury was caused by the sum of two causes—that is, that the accident and the pre-existing cataract and diseased condition of the eye were together responsible for the subsequent blindness—the plaintiff could not have recovered, as the injury must have resulted from the accident, "Independent of all other causes." In White v. S. L. & Accident Ins. Co., 95 Minn. 77, 103 N. W. 734, 884, the policy, in terms, had reference to injuries or death resulting "solely from such injuries as the proximate cause thereof," and provided that the insurance did not cover accident or death "resulting wholly or partly, directly or indirectly, from bodily or mental infirmity, or disorder, or disease in any form." In that case the court said: "Similar policies have been before both the state and federal courts, and the consensus of judicial opinion is that, subject to the exceptions contained in the policy, if the injury be the proximate cause of death, the company is liable, but, if an injury and an existing bodily disease or infirmity concur and co-operate to that end, no liability exists. If, however, the injury be the cause of the infirmity or disease—if the disease results and springs from the injury—the company is liable, though both co-operate in causing death. The distinction made in this particular is found in that class of cases where the infirmity or disease existed in the insured at the time of the injury, and, on the other hand, that class of cases where the disease was caused and brought about by the injury. And even in cases where the insured is afflicted at the time of the accident with some bodily disease, if the accidental injury be of such a nature as to cause death solely and independently of the disease, liability exists. The rule of proximate cause, as applied to actions of negligence, cannot be applied in its full scope to contracts of this nature." See, also, M. C. Company v. Glass, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 159, 67 S. W. 1062. Ward v. Aetna Life Ins. Co., 85 Neb. 471, 123 N. W. 456, was an action on a policy which permitted recovery only when the injury or death resulted from accidental means "Independently of all other causes"; and the court said: "Plaintiff was not entitled to recover if death was caused by the sum of these two causes."

We may thus summarize another case: "It is conceded that the disease of appendicitis, with its consequences and complications, caused the death of the insured, but the real question of fact lies further back, and is whether the fall against the dashboard, acting independently of any other cause, produced this disease. If the insured recovered from his former attacks of this disease, so that it no longer existed in his body, and there was only a susceptibility to have it in case a proper exciting cause should arise, and in this case the fall against the dashboard proved to be such exciting cause, the case would be one for recovery under the policy; but if because of the former attacks there was not merely a susceptibility to a further attack, but the actual disease itself existed, liable to be rendered active and virulent by an injury such as that suffered by the insured, in that event the active disease which resulted in death would not be regarded as the result of the fall alone, but as the joint result of the fall and the latent disease, and hence there could be no recovery under the policy." N. A. Casualty Co. v. Shields, 155 Fed. 54, 85 C. C. A. 122. In still another important case a similar ruling was made: "If Shryock suffered an accident and his death was caused by that alone, the association agreed by its certificate to pay the promised indemnity. But, if he was affected with a disease or bodily infirmity which caused his death, the association was not liable under this certificate, whether he also suffered an accident or not. If he sustained an accident, but at the time it occurred he was suffering from a pre-existing disease or bodily infirmity, and if the accident would not have caused his death if he had not been affected with the disease or infirmity, but he died because the accident aggravated the effects of the disease, or the disease aggravated the effects of the accident, the express contract was that the association should not be liable for the amount of this insurance. The death in such a case would not be the result of the accident alone, but it would be caused partly by the disease and partly by the accident, and the contract exempted the association from liability therefor." N. M. Acc. Ass'n v. Shryock, 73 Fed. 774, 20 C. C. A. 8. The policy in that case contained a clause similar to the one we have quoted from the policy upon which this suit was brought.

In Binder v. Accident Ass'n, supra, the policy provided that it must appear that the death or disability "was purely accidental, and the direct result of an accident, and that the accident was the sole and only cause of the said member's death or disability." The court said: "If it be true, as the jury might have found under the evidence, that the diseased condition of the arteries aggravated the effect of the accident, if there was one, and contributed to the disability occasioned thereby, then, under the express terms of the contract, there was no liability on the part of the association." Freeman v. M. Accident Ass'n, 156 Mass. 351, 30 N. E. 1013, 17 L. R. A. 753, was an action on a policy containing a provision similar to the one in the policy upon which this suit was brought. Speaking to the question now under discussion, the court said: "The question as to whether peritonitis, if that caused his death, is to be deemed a disease within the meaning of this policy, so far as to prevent a recovery, depends upon the question whether or not before the time of the fall, and at the time of the fall, he had then the disease—was then suffering with the disease. If he was, then, in the sense of the policy, although (the disease was) aggravated and made fatal by the fall, he cannot recover." See C. T. Accident Ass'n v. Fulton, 79 Fed. 423, 24 C. C. A. 654.

There is some conflict in the authorities, but we believe that those best considered hold with the courts whose decisions we have cited. The charge of the court placed the vital issue fairly and squarely before the jury, and they have found the facts against the plaintiff, which means that he had a cataract at the time he fell, if he did fall, and that it united actively and efficiently with the fall in producing the unfortunate result. In some cases where the words "proximate cause" have been used in the policy to describe the causal connection between the accident and the resultant injury, some courts have held that the words thus employed to express the nature of the risk should be construed according to their common and accepted meaning as adopted and approved in law under like conditions and circumstances, and as thus interpreted they refer to the efficient cause from which the injury results, whether such cause produces the injury directly or through the medium of an intervening cause or agency, which it sets in motion, and which are then untied by close causal relation to each other, and this rule was applied to a case in which it appeared that the insured sustained an accidental fall which caused an abrasion of the skin of his leg, with the result that blood poisoning set in and death ensued, and it was very correctly held that the evidence should be submitted to the jury to find whether the death resulted proximately and solely from the fall. And some, at least, of the cases cited by appellant's counsel, may be harmonized with our decision in this case by adverting to the distinction pointed out in those cases. Cary v. P. A. Ins. Co., 127 Wis. 67, 106 N. W. 1055, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 926, 115 Am. St. Rep. 997; 7 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 484. No such words are to be found in this policy. The case we have just put was somewhat like the one cited by us from the Massachusetts court, and in the latter case it was held that, where the accident itself causes the disease which then unites with it in producing the injury, the insurer is liable, but not where the disease pre-existed and contributed proximately to the injury. If this distinction is kept clearly in view, many of the authorities, which apparently conflict, may be reconciled. In our case there is no question of proximate cause. The parties have solemnly contracted, the plaintiff to be protected and the defendant to insure him against loss, under well-defined conditions, and the contract must be construed, being unambiguous, as it is written, under the maxim of the law, which prohibits us to make a contract for the parties, but allows us only to construe the contract which they have made (In haec fœdera non veni).

The other exceptions do not suggest to us any reversible error. A careful consideration of this case discloses nothing that should induce us to reverse the judgment.

No error.

LUTHER et al. v. LUTHER et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 20, 1911.)

1. PARTITION (§ 30*)—PROCEEDINGS.

Tenants in common cannot, as a matter of right, have partial partition of the lands owned by them, and when only a part of the land is described in the petition the defendant may allege that there are other lands owned in common, and have them included in the partition; but he cannot by answer secure partition of lands in which others, who are not parties, are interested.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. §§ 80-82; Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

2. PARTITION (§ 113*)—APPEAL FROM CLERK.

In partition upon an appeal from the clerk, the proceeding being before the court, he may hear and determine all the matters in controversy between the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

3. PARTITION (§ 30*)—PROCEEDINGS—PETITION.

The petition in partition alleged that the defendants, who were husband and wife, were joint tenants, between themselves, of an undivided half interest in the land. In his answer the defendant husband sought partition of other lands owned in common by him and plaintiffs, but did not allege that his wife had any interest therein. Held, that he was entitled to partition of such lands, for the petition showed that the husband and wife were seised of an estate by entirety, with a right of survivorship; and hence no separate part of the land would be allotted to the wife.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; Lane, Judge.

Proceedings by R. L. Luther and another against D. P. Luther and another for partition. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

This is a proceeding by R. L. Luther and S. J. Luther against D. P. Luther and wife, Ida Luther, to have partition of two tracts of land, particularly described in the petition. The petitioners allege that R. L. Luther and S. J. Luther are owners of two undivided one-sixth interests in said lands, each being entitled to one-sixth thereof, and that the defendant D. P. Luther is the owner of an undivided one-sixth interest therein, and that he and his wife, the defendant Ida Luther, are, as between themselves, joint tenants of an undivided one-half interest. The defendants answer, and, among other things, allege that the petitioners and the defendant D. P. Luther are tenants in common of two other tracts of land described in the answer, and that they and three other persons, not parties to the proceeding, are tenants in common in a third tract of land, and ask that these three tracts be embraced in the order for partition.

The petitioners moved before the clerk to strike from the answer the allegations in reference to the three tracts of land, "for that the said portion of the answer is obnoxious, because it makes the above-entitled action multifarious, in that it asks for division of tracts of land separate and distinct from the tract of land, for a division of which the petition asks, and which said tracts of land are not held by the same tenants in common as the tract of land the division of which is prayed for in the petition, and in that it blends in one independent cause of action to which the same persons are not proper parties; that the said portion of the answer asked to be stricken out is irrelevant to the cause of action set forth in the petition of the petitioners." The clerk sustained the motion, and made an order appointing commissioners to divide the land described in the petition, and the defendants excepted and appealed to the judge.

At the September term, 1911, of court, the appeal came on for hearing, and the defendants, by leave of the court, struck from their answer the allegations as to the third tract of land, and his honor then decreed that the actions above mentioned be severed, and that the proceeding to partition the lands described in the petition herein constitute one proceeding, and the proceeding to partition the lands described in the answer herein constitute a separate proceeding, and that the order of the clerk, directing a partition of the lands set forth in the petition, be confirmed, and the exceptions of the defendant be overruled.

The defendants excepted and appealed.

Jas. H. Merrimon, for appellants. Locke Craig and Jones & Williams, for appellees.

ALLEN, J. [1,2] The authorities seem to agree that tenants in common cannot, as a matter of right, have partial partition of the lands owned by them, and that when only a part of the land is described in the petition the defendant may allege that there are other lands owned in common, and have them included in the order of partition. 30 Cyc. 177; Barnes v. Lynch, 151 Mass. 510, 24 N. E. 783, 21 Am. St. Rep. 473; Bigelow v. Littlefield, 52 Me. 24, 83 Am. Dec. 484. In the last case cited, the court says: "One tenant in common cannot enforce partition of part only of the common estate. Such a course would lead to fraud and oppression." If a different rule should be adopted, and three or four small tracts of land were owned in common, separate petitions could be filed for each, costs would be increased, and frequently sales for division would be necessary, when, if all were included in one petition, an actual partition would be practicable. It is, however, true, as contended by the petitioner, that the defendant cannot by answer introduce into the proceeding lands in which others, who are not parties, are interested. Simpson v. Wallace, 83 N. C. 477; Brooks v. Austin, 95 N. C. 474.

Applying these principles to the facts appearing in the record, the order of his honor was, in our opinion, erroneous. When the proceeding was before the clerk, the objection of the petitioners was well taken, because at that time, as to one of the tracts of land described in the answer, it was alleged that three persons were interested, who were not parties, but on appeal, by leave of court, this tract was eliminated, and, the proceeding being before the judge, he could hear and determine all matters in controversy. Roseman v. Roseman, 127 N. C. 498, 37 S. E. 518.

[3] But the petitioners further say that the elimination of the third tract did not cure the evil, because it is alleged in the petition that Ida Luther has an interest in the lands described in the petition, and it does not appear that she has any interest in the lands described in the answer. There would be much force in this contention but for the form of the allegation in the petition, which is that "the defendants, D. P. Luther and Ida Luther, are joint tenants, as between themselves, of an undivided one-half interest in said lands," which we understand to mean an estate by entireties, under Bruce v. Nicholson, 109 N. C. 205, 13 S. E. 790, 26 Am. St. Rep. 562, and other cases, with the right of survivorship. If so, no separate part of the land would be allotted to Ida Luther, but one share would be set apart to D. P. Luther and Ida Luther. This is in accord with the policy of our law, which is to discourage multiplicity of actions, and to administer the rights of the parties in one proceeding, when possible.

Reversed.

CAMPBELL v. FARLEY et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 23, 1911.)

1. JUDICIAL SALES (§ 4*)—APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONER—MOTION.

Where a commissioner, appointed to sell lands, dies before making a deed, the proper remedy for the purchaser who has paid the price is to move the court to appoint a new commissioner to make the deed; for until the deed is executed the land is in custodia legis.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judicial Sales, Cent. Dig. § 15; Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

2. JUDICIAL SALES (§ 22*)—PURCHASE MONEY—PAYMENT.

An order for the judicial sale of land, providing that the purchase money should be paid by a certain time, is merely directory, and does not affect the purchaser's title when payment has been accepted by plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judicial Sales, Cent. Dig. § 47; Dec. Dig. § 22.*]

3. JUDICIAL SALES (§ 31*)—CONFIRMATION NUNC PRO TUNC.

The confirmation of a judicial sale by the court upon the report of the commissioner may be made nunc pro tunc.

Appeal from Superior Court, Graham County; Cline, Judge.

Action by L. C. Campbell against John G. Farley and others, in which there was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants' lands were ordered to be sold. Motion by the Union Development Company, assignee of the purchaser at the sale, for the appointment of a commissioner to complete the sale. From an order granting the motion, Earl P. Tatham, a subsequent purchaser of the land, appeals. Affirmed.

J. S. Adams and Jas. H. Merrimon, for appellant. Morpew & Phillips, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This is a motion in the original cause by the assignee of the purchaser at a judicial sale for the appointment of a commissioner to complete the sale, left unfinished by a former commissioner, who has died, by executing a deed to the purchaser. Those who claim under the sale have had possession of the land ever since it was made. The court found as facts that the sale was made by the commissioner, and reported to the court and that the purchase price had been paid.

[1] A motion in this cause is the proper remedy. "There is no pretense that any deed has been executed to the purchaser of the land, sold under the order of the court, by an authorized servant of the court, and under its permission, and until that is done the land continues to be in custodia legis, and any relief which may be had in reference to it or the purchase money must be sought in the original proceeding." Kemp v. Kemp, 85 N. C. 496. This doctrine is approved in Wilson v. Chichester, 107 N. C. 386, 12 S. E. 139, 10 L. R. A. 572. See, also, Lord v. Beard, 79 N. C. 9; Mauney v. Pemberton, 75 N. C. 221; Long v. Jarratt, 94 N. C. 445.

[2] It is true that the order of sale provided for the payment of the purchase money, either the whole thereof or by installments, at a certain time, but this was not mandatory; it was merely directory, as time was not of the essence of the transaction; and if the purchase money has since been paid, and the court or the plaintiff has accepted it, it is immaterial that it was not paid ad diem, and this is so as to any other irregularity, not affecting the substance or prejudicial to the rights of the parties, as is the case here. The court finds that the purchaser, R. L. Cooper, assigned his bid to W. P. Rose, and the latter assigned to the Union Development Company, by which this motion is made. It is also found as a fact that Earl P. Tatham, to whom Campbell conveyed his interest by deed, acquired his interest with full notice of the appellee's rights, if the adverse possession of the land by the purchaser and those claiming under him by assignment did not constitute notice in law. Tankard v. Tankard, 79 N. C. 54; Edwards v. Thompson, 71 N. C. 177.

[3] There does not seem to be much stress laid upon the point as to the necessity for a confirmation of the sale by the court upon the report of the commissioner, but this can be done now by the court nunc pro tunc, if it is not dispensed with by agreement of the parties. Joyner v. Futrell, 136 N. C. 801, 48 S. E. 649. A fair construction of the proceedings of the court and the facts in the case, as found or admitted, leads us to the conclusion that there was no error committed by his honor in deciding this case.

No error.

MICHAEL v. MOORE et ux.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 20, 1911.)

1. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 95*)—GIFT TO WIFE—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS.

Where, pending suit against defendant for malicious prosecution, he mortgaged certain land belonging to him and gave the proceeds to his wife with which to improve her separate property, so that on recovery of a judgment against him there was no property on which to levy an execution, the judgment creditor could follow the proceeds of the mortgage into the improvements under the doctrine of unjust enrichment.

2. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 64*)—GIFT TO WIFE—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS—INTENT TO DEFRAUD.

Money given by an insolvent to his wife and used by her to improve her property may be followed by his creditors without showing actual intent to defraud, the transaction being void per se, under Revisal 1905, § 962, providing that no voluntary gift by one indebted shall be void in law as to creditors, but the debt of the donor shall be taken as evidence from which an intent to defraud creditors may be inferred, etc.

3. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 51*)—GIFT TO WIFE—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS—EXEMPT PROPERTY.

Where an insolvent gave the proceeds of a mortgage of his property to his wife, who used the same to improve her separate estate, the husband's personal property exemption should be first deducted from the amount expended in making the improvements; the clear balance being the basis of the estimate of the amount chargeable against the property for the benefit of the husband's creditors.

Appeal from Superior Court, Catawba County; Long, Judge.

Action by P. W. Michael against J. O. Moore and wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. New trial.

The plaintiff, at May term, 1908, of Catawba superior court, obtained a judgment against J. O. Moore, one of the defendants, for $300 and costs in a suit for damages for malicious prosecution. At the time the judgment was taken, the defendant J. O. Moore owned a tract of land in Alexander county. He gave notice of appeal from the said judgment to this court, being allowed time within which to perfect such appeal, which appeal was not, in fact, prosecuted. Before the time for perfecting said appeal had expired, and before the plaintiff caused a transcript of said judgment to be docketed in Alexander county, the defendant J. O. Moore and his wife, Dora Moore, joining him, executed a mortgage on the land in Alexander county to secure the payment of $2,000 borrowed from the mortgagee. The defendants, with the $2,000 so borrowed, erected a residence on a lot in the city of Hickory, the title to which was in the defendant Dora Moore. The feme defendant had actual notice of the suit, and of the judgment taken therein, before the execution of the mortgage and the use of the $2,000 in the erection of the dwelling house on her lot. At the time of the transaction the defendant J. O. Moore was insolvent. After plaintiff had exhausted his legal remedies by execution and supplemental proceedings, he instituted this proceeding for equitable relief. The jury returned the following verdict: "(1) Did defendant J. O. Moore dispose of all of the lands owned by him and expend the bulk of the proceeds therefrom in the erection of permanent improvements on lands of the defendant Dora Moore, for the purpose of defeating or delaying or defrauding the payment of the plaintiff's judgment against him, referred to in the complaint? Answer: No. (2) If so, did the defendant Dora Moore have knowledge of such purpose on the part of her husband and participate in the alleged fraud of her husband, as set out in the first issue? Answer: No. (3) What is the value of the lot of land owned by Dora Moore, independent of the improvement placed on it by the money of her husband? Answer: Six hundred dollars. (4) What amount of money of J. O. Moore, referred to in the first issue, was expended upon the lot of Dora Moore with her consent? Answer: About $2,000." Upon the verdict, the court rendered the following judgment: "This cause coming on before the undersigned and a jury, and the jury having found the third and fourth issues in favor of the plaintiff, and the male defendant, as it appears from the record, being indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $300 and costs $48.15, it is, therefore, upon the whole record, considered and adjudged that the plaintiff recover of the defendant J. O. Moore $348.15 and the costs of this suit. It is further considered and adjudged that the value of the lot owned by the defendant Dora Moore in her own right, independent of the interests of her husband in the house and lot, is $600. It is further considered and adjudged that the interest of the defendant J. O. Moore in the house and lot described in the complaint is $2,000, and that said sum was expended by J. O. Moore on the said lot of his wife, with her consent, in making improvements thereon, from his own moneys, and the said wife holds her said lot, subject to the equity in the same of her husband, in the sum of $2,000, to be pursued by the plaintiff as he may be advised." Defendants appealed.

Councill & Yount, for appellants. W. A. Self and A. A. Whitener, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] We entertain no doubt as to the plaintiff's right to follow the fund invested by his debtor in improvements upon his wife's land. No principle is better settled by our decisions than the one that an insolvent debtor cannot withdraw money from his own estate and give it to another to be invested by him in the purchase or improvement of his property, and, when it is done, creditors may subject the property so purchased or improved to the payment of their claims. Guthrie v. Bacon, 107 N. C. 338, 12 S. E. 204, and cases cited; McGill v. Harman, 55 N. C. 179; Gentry v. Harper, 55 N. C. 177. The doctrine is well stated and applied in Burton v. Farinholt, 86 N. C. 260, by Justice Ruffin, as follows: "The life policy in question was the property of the plaintiff's intestate. As soon as delivered, it vested in him, and, like any other chose in action, became an integral part of his estate, subject to every rule of property known to the law. Being indebted to a state of clear insolvency at the time of its voluntary assignment to his daughters, his act was fraudulent as to his creditors and void in law, whether made with an intent actually fraudulent or not. It is a principle of the common law, as old as the law itself, and upon which the preservation of all property depends, that, except so far as the same may be exempt by positive law, the whole of every man's property shall be devoted to the payment of his debts. He cannot gratuitously give away any part of it; the law meaning that he shall be just to his creditors before he is generous to his family. From the fact that he was at the time insolvent, and that his transfer to his daughters was without valuable consideration, it results, as a conclusion of law, that the assignment was void as to his creditors. As said in Gentry v. Harper, 55 N. C. 177, it is against conscience for debtors to attempt in any way to withdraw property or effects from the payment of debts, and, if the courts of law cannot reach the debtor's interest, a court of equity will." More apposite is the case of Pender v. Mallett, 123 N. C. 57, 31 S. E. 351, in which the present Chief Justice says: "If she were not a free trader, the action concerns property she claims as her separate property, and she can be sued in regard thereto, no matter when she acquired it; her husband being joined with her as defendant. Code, §§ 178, 424 (4). It cannot be allowed that when an insolvent husband (or his firm, as here charged) makes over his property to his wife in fraud of his creditors, she cannot be sued for the recovery thereof because she is a married woman. If in such case the specific property (money for instance) has been invested in some other shape, the fund may be followed. Edwards v. Culberson, 111 N. C. 844, 16 S. E. 238, 18 L. R. A. 204, and cases there cited."

[2] It is not necessary to show an actual intent to defraud. The transaction is void per se. Revisal 1905, § 962; McCanless v. Flinchum, 89 N. C. 378. Nor does her coverture protect the feme defendant. Bell v. McJones, 151 N. C. 85, 65 S. E. 646; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. (3d Ed.) § 945. The facts of our case are substantially like those in Trefethen v. Lynam, 90 Me. 376, 88 Atl. 335, 88 L. R. A. 190, 60 Am. St. Rep. 271, and with reference to the transaction in that case, by which the wife's property was improved, the court said: "The wife cannot rightfully retain, as against her husband's creditors, the value of permanent additions voluntarily made by him to her property. Outside of the statute exemptions, he cannot acquire any property which shall be free from the claims of prior creditors; nor can she acquire such property out of his principal or income. Whenever it appears that she has thus absorbed his money or estate, she can be compelled to account for it by this equitable trustee process. The prior creditor of the husband need not show an actual fraudulent intent on the part of either husband or wife. It is enough for him to show that the wife has acquired some property or value out of her husband's unexempted principal or income. This value thus obtained should be restored by her for the payment of his prior debts, though the husband or his representatives might have no legal or equitable claim to such restoration. The wife may owe a duty of restoration to her husband's prior creditors without owing any such duty to him. Under the principles above stated, however, the husband's right is not the test of his prior creditors' right. As to them, neither husband nor wife can erect buildings on her land with his money and retain the benefit. In the absence of fraudulent intent or active participation upon the part of the wife, it might not be equitable to require her to account for the full sum thus subtracted from her husband's means and appropriated to her property, since the benefit to her estate might not be so much; but she should not retain any benefit or increment in value of his estate made at the expense of her husband's prior creditors. To turn over to those creditors the benefit or increment, if any, thus obtained, would cause her no loss of her own property, but would simply transmit some part of the husband's property to his creditors—a most equitable proceeding." It is there said by the court that the principle so stated is fairly deducible from the cases. Our attention has been called to the case of Thurber v. La Roque, 105 N. C. 301, 11 S. E. 400, in which it is held that money of an insolvent husband invested in land, as a gift to his wife, and which is conveyed to her, may be followed by creditors and the land subjected to its payment; but money, when thus invested in improvements on her land, cannot be followed by them, and the latter decision seems to rest upon the idea that the right of the husband's creditors to follow the fund arises out of her implied promise or contract to pay for the improvements. We do not concur in this view. The two cases are affected by the same principle, which has nothing to do with the law of contracts. The creditor's right is an equitable one, and the money so invested, whether in land or improvements, is regarded as "a personal fund fraudulently withdrawn from the husband's creditors," as said by Justice Shepherd in his dissenting opinion, which fully and clearly states the true doctrine. The court proceeds to subject the property, which has derived a benefit from the improvement, not upon the theory that the wife has contracted, either expressly or impliedly, to pay for the improvements, but it follows the fund taken from the husband's estate, and which justly belonged to the creditors, into her hands and holds the property as security for its repayment, even against her consent. Any other ruling would be entirely opposed to the true principle upon which this equity of the creditors is based, as will appear in the numerous decisions of this court, some of which we have cited. If a husband is permitted thus to dispose of his estate, and without any accountability on the part of the wife to them, it would enable him to commit the most gigantic frauds in defiance of his creditors. The law cannot be supposed to have contemplated any such result in its attempts to protect the wife against the consequences of her improvident contracts. The general doctrine is nowhere better stated than in Perry on Trusts (5th Ed.) § 170: "Although courts of equity have not made general definitions stating what is fraud and what is not, they have not hesitated to lay down broad and comprehensive principles of remedial justice, and to apply these principles in favor of innocent parties suffering from the fraud of others. These principles, though firm and inflexible, are yet so plastic that they can be applied to every case of fraud as it occurs, however new it may be in its circumstances. The leading principle of this remedial justice is by way of equitable construction to convert the fraudulent holder of property into a trustee, and to preserve the property itself as a fund for the purpose of recompense. In investigating allegations of fraud, courts of equity disregard mere technicalities and artificial rules, and look only at the general characteristics of the case, and go at once to its essential morality and merit. Thus at law married women or infants are liable upon their contracts. But in equity, if a married woman has obtained property by fraud, the court disregards the technical rules of common law in regard to married women, and converts her by construction into a trustee, and compels her to do justice by executing the trust." We need not agree to all that is said in the passage just quoted for the purpose of disposing of this case, as there is no element of contract in the equity which we are now enforcing. The suit is for the purpose of recovering the husband's assets which should be devoted to the payment of his debts, and not the wife's. It would be against good conscience for her to retain the benefit accruing from his fraudulent act and not pay for it. It is not her property, but justly belongs to his creditors. There is no injustice or wrong in taking from her that which she does not own, as against the creditors, and restoring it to them. It is said in Wall v. Fairley, 73 N. C. 464: "It does not follow that the creditors cannot follow the funds of the debtor in the hands of his voluntary, and therefore, in law, fraudulent, donee. It is settled that in the case of a fraudulent donation, such as this appears to have been, they can do so"—and this must be true, without there being any implied promise to pay for the benefit that may have been derived from the improvement.

[3] But, in order to ascertain what the benefit is, the personal property exempted ($500) must first be deducted from the amount expended in making the improvement, and the clear balance will be the basis for the estimate. We need not decide whether the creditors can recover the entire sum wrongfully used in improving the property, less the exemption, or only the amount by which the property is enhanced in value, as it may not be necessary to do so. We are satisfied that, to the extent the property has been substantially benefited or increased in value by the improvement, the creditors are entitled to subject it to the satisfaction of their claims. The pleadings are not framed, nor were the issues, so as to allow to the debtor the benefit of his personal property exemption by deducting $500 from the amount put into the improvements. His creditors could not have reached this, if he had retained the money, and therefore are not entitled to have it considered in ascertaining the increased value of the land by reason of the improvement. The judgment as rendered is incomplete, in any view of the case, as it requires nothing to be done, but merely declares the right of the husband, and erroneously too, as he has acquired no equity in the property because of its improvement with his money. The transaction is valid as between him and his wife, and, thus considered, she is entitled to the benefit of the improvement; there being no resulting trust in such a case. It is the creditors who have the only equity and can follow the fund.

The case is remanded, with directions to reform the pleadings in accordance with the principles declared in this opinion. Issues should be submitted for the purpose of ascertaining the amount invested by the husband for his wife in the improvement, less the personal property exemption therein, and also the amount by which the property has been enhanced in value by reason of the improvement, with such other issues as may be necessary.

New trial.

WORLEY v. LAUREL RIVER LOGGING CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 20, 1911.)

1. TRIAL (§ 252*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONFORMITY TO EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action for injuries to a servant, the evidence shows that after an order of the defendant's superintendent another employé of the defendant, equal in authority to such superintendent, gave the plaintiff a different order, an instruction that, if the jury find that if the plaintiff had obeyed the orders of the superintendent he would not have been injured, they should find the defendant not negligent was not justified by the evidence, and was properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 596-612; Dec. Dig. § 252.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 234*)—LIABILITY FOR INJURIES TO SERVANT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

An employé may recover for an injury from a defective appliance, though he used such appliance, knowing it to be defective, and with some appreciation of the danger, unless he was guilty of an affirmative negligent act, or the danger was so obvious that the chances of injury were greater than those of safety.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 684-686; Dec. Dig. § 234.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 296*)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Though a requested instruction that, if the jury "find from the evidence that plaintiff was guilty of negligence which contributed proximately to the injury, even in the smallest degree, they should find the plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence" may be technically correct, it was properly refused for its tendency to confuse and mislead the jury; the proper practice being for the judge to explain the conduct which would amount to contributory negligence, and to state that if there is such negligence, which is the real cause of the injury, the plaintiff cannot recover.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1180-1194; Dec. Dig. § 296.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 252*)—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE.

In an action for injuries to a servant, requested instructions on contributory negligence were properly refused, where the only conduct of the plaintiff alleged in the answer to have been negligent was in the operation of a train, and there was no evidence introduced of negligence in this particular.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 596-612; Dec. Dig. § 252.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 252*)—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action for personal injuries, there was no evidence that the plaintiff was at any time unconscious, or that he suffered even momentarily an impairment of his mental powers, an instruction that the loss of mental powers by the plaintiff might be considered as an element of damages is improper, and ground for reversal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 596-612; Dec. Dig. § 252.*]

On Motion to Dismiss.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 539*)—REVIEW—NECESSITY OF EXCEPTIONS BELOW—STIPULATION.

While exceptions to evidence must be entered during the trial, and it is not sufficient to object, where the case was not settled by the judge, but by agreement of counsel, and the assignments of error began with the words "the defendant excepted for that," and are followed by the signatures of counsel for plaintiff and defendant, agreeing to the settlement, the signatures amount to an agreement that the exceptions set out in the assignments were duly entered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2357, 2358; Dec. Dig. § 539.*]

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 272*)—EXCEPTIONS—CHARGE OF COURT.

Exceptions to the charge of the court may be taken for the first time when the case on appeal is settled, so that, where a case was settled by agreement of counsel, and exceptions and assignments of error followed the charge, the exceptions were duly entered, and are sufficient to support the assignments.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1611-1619; Dec. Dig. § 272; * Trial, Cent. Dig. § 680.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Madison County; Lane, Judge.

Action by O. C. Worley against the Laurel River Logging Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed in part and reversed in part, and new trial as to part of issues granted.

This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries. The plaintiff, at the time of his injury, was employed as an engineer by the defendant, a corporation, engaged in the manufacture of lumber, and operating in connection therewith a logging road.

The plaintiff alleges that he was operating the train of the defendant on the 14th day of September, 1910, and was injured by reason of a derailment; that the defendant was negligent, in that it allowed and permitted the track and roadbed of its road to be and remain in a poor and dangerous condition, without ballast on its tracks, and with many heavy grades and sharp and dangerous curves; and it allowed and permitted the brakes on the cars which the plaintiff hauled over said road in the performance of his duties to become defective and out of repair, to such an extent that it was impossible to control and operate a train therewith, and permitted said brakes to remain in said defective and dangerous condition, though often notified of that fact and requested to repair the same; and it failed and neglected to keep and maintain its track and roadbed in a safe condition, and carelessly and negligently failed and neglected to keep and maintain its cars and rolling stock in good repair; so that they could be operated in safety, and did carelessly and negligently fail to furnish and equip its said road with the rolling stock, tools, and appliances in ordinary use at that time.

The defendant denies negligence, and alleges that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, in that he allowed the train of cars mentioned to get beyond his control by reason of careless handling of the same, or was running the same at a dangerous and reckless rate of speed down a grade, thereby causing the same to get beyond his control; or he otherwise operated said train in a negligent, careless, and reckless manner, by reason of which negligence and carelessness the plaintiff was injured, if any injury he sustained. The plaintiff offered evidence to sustain the allegations of negligence, and there was no evidence to the contrary.

It was in evidence that on the morning of the day the plaintiff was injured that he told Mr. Hill, a superintendent of the defendant, that the brake on the car, attached to his train, was defective, and that he was told by Hill to place the car on a siding, and not to take it out until it was repaired; that the plaintiff placed the car on the siding as directed, and when he returned later he found the car loaded with lumber, and took it out in his train under orders from one Anderson, who was the mill foreman, and who overlooked the taking out of cars, and who told the plaintiff that Lieb, a superintendent, equal in authority with Hill, said for him to do so. This car was a part of the train when the plaintiff was injured.

The defendant requested the court to instruct the jury as follows:

"(1) Before the plaintiff can recover, he must satisfy the jury, by the greater weight of the testimony, not only that defendant was negligent, but that such negligence, if the jury finds there was any, was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury, and if the jury do not so find they will answer the first issue, 'No.'

"(2) Proximate cause is the real effective cause of the injury, and if from all of the testimony you find that plaintiff's conduct was the real cause of the injury, then you will answer the first issue, 'No.'

"(3) If the jury find from the evidence that, if plaintiff had obeyed the orders of Hill, the superintendent, he would not have been injured they will answer the first issue, 'No.'

"(4) If you believe the evidence in this case, you will answer the second issue, 'Yes.'

"(5) If you find from the evidence that plaintiff knew the car and engine being run by him were defective, and was acquainted with the grades and curves of the roadbed, as testified by him, and knew that such operation by him was dangerous, then you will answer the second issue, 'Yes.'

"(6) Plaintiff having testified that he knew the dangers incident to operating the train under the circumstances, if you believe this evidence, you will answer the second issue, 'Yes.'

"(7) If you find from the greater weight of the evidence that plaintiff took out the car, which was attached to his engine, contrary to the orders of Hill, the superintendent, and that the use of this car was the proximate cause of the injury, you will answer the second issue, 'Yes.'

"(8) If you find from the evidence that the superintendent, Hill, ordered the plaintiff not to use the car which was attached to the engine at the time of the accident, and that plaintiff disobeyed such order, and such disobedience was the proximate cause of the injury, you will answer the second issue, 'Yes.'

"(9) If the jury find from the evidence that Worley reported to Superintendent Hill, on the day before the accident, that the car was out of order, and that Hill directed him to set the car out on the siding for repairs, and not to use it again until it was repaired, and that the plaintiff, Worley, in disobedience of this order, took the car out for use, knowing it had not been repaired; and that such use of the car was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury, you will answer the second issue, 'Yes.'

"(10) There is no evidence that Anderson, the mill foreman, had authority to give orders to the plaintiff, and if plaintiff obeyed an order of Anderson in taking out the car testified about, instead of obeying the orders of Hill, the superintendent, and was injured in consequence, you will answer the second issue, 'Yes.'

"(11) If you find from the evidence that plaintiff was guilty of negligence which contributed proximately to the injury, even in the smallest degree, you will answer the second issue, 'Yes.'"

There was a motion for judgment of nonsuit, which was overruled, and the defendant excepted. Verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant excepted and appealed.

Martin & Wright, for appellant. Gudger & McElroy, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. We have examined the entire record, and have considered the numerous exceptions entered by the defendant, and find nothing of which it can justly complain on the first and second issues.

The evidence does not disclose a real controversy between the plaintiff and the defendant as to negligence, and the court would have been justified in directing the jury to answer the first issue, "Yes," if the evidence was believed.

In addition to the presumption of negligence arising from a derailment (Marcom v. Railroad, 126 N. C. 200, 35 S. E. 423; Wright v. Railroad, 127 N. C. 229, 37 S. E. 221; Hemphill v. L. Co., 141 N. C. 487, 54 S. E. 420), there was ample evidence that the roadbed was unsafe, that the grades and curves were unusual and dangerous, and that the equipment was defective; and there was no evidence to the contrary.

Mr. Hill, superintendent of the defendant, who was introduced by the plaintiff, gives an account of the condition of the road and its equipment which shows utter indifference on the part of the defendant to the safety of its employes. He says: "I do not know the condition of the track where the engine ran off; from the mill down, there were some very bad places. The place where the wreck occurred had little to do with it; it was the place where the engine started—from where it left the mill to where it went off. The track has about a 4 per cent. grade in some places, and in others about 10 per cent.; it would perhaps run about the length of this hill at 4 per cent., and then dip suddenly to a 10 per cent. grade. There are some reverse curves and some very sharp curves. Just before you get to the point where the engine left the track, you come around a sharp curve, and take a right smart dip, and it is almost straight for 20 or 30 yards, and you make a curve, a good stiff curve, and that is where the accident occurred; it was a long and very continuous curve. I know that the car was loaded with lumber when he started out. I can't say that Mr. Worley was given orders to bring the car out, but I told Worley not to bring that car out until it was fixed. The mill foreman overlooked the bringing out of cars from the mill. He was Van Anderson, and Robert Lieb was over him. I can't recall who ordered the car loaded; don't know. All that was hearsay, so far as I am concerned. The brake was not put on properly; the rod that comes over and under the brakes—the brake rod, I suppose you call it—passed under the rocking bolster, which the plank laid on, and this rod, for some reason, would work back next to the king pin, that comes through the rocking bolster, that holds it, and when you went to make a curve that bolster would shut down on it, and you could not put the brakes on; and if there were several curves you would get a pretty good start, and it would be hard to control the train. The cars had wooden brake shoes. I don't think there was ever another car made like it, before or since. The wheels turned on the axles. They insisted on loading the cars so heavy at the mill that I gave orders not to load over 3,500 feet on this particular car, and on other cars, and they often had on 5,000 feet. It made them so heavy that a car of that size and the tonnage of the lumber would weigh 20 tons, and without proper brakes, behind a 10-ton engine. When you loaded with more than 3,500 feet, with the weight of the car, the weight was more than the engine had the capacity of controlling. The wheels on the cars were not regular car wheels in common use at that time; they were old car wheels. They looked like they were 20 or 30 years old. They turned on the axle, and we often had to take the axle out. Sometimes there would be an inch play, and the car wheel would wobble as it went down the track, and when loaded so heavy it sorter cut and dug into the rails and climbed off. This car had been practically in the condition I have stated ever since it was built; there was only a piece of iron that was supposed to hold the brake rod back, and it would break, and they would put another little piece of iron in there, and it would break, and the next week something would happen again. I don't know whether the brakes on that car were like those in ordinary use on railroads of that date or not.

I never saw a car like it before, and the brakes were in keeping with the car."

[1] His honor, however, instead of directing the jury to answer the first issue, "Yes," if they believed the evidence, submitted the question of negligence to them, and gave substantially the first and second prayers for instructions. He could not have given the third, because there was evidence that, after the order of Hill, an employé of the defendant, equal in authority to Hill, gave him a different order.

The principal contentions of the defendant on the issue of contributory negligence are that the plaintiff continued to operate the train with knowledge of the defects and the danger, and that he was acting contrary to the orders of his superintendent, Hill.

[2] We do not approve the doctrine that an employé is barred of a recovery, because he realizes that he is using a defective appliance, and has some appreciation of the danger of doing so, and think the better rule is that, under such circumstances, there is no contributory negligence, unless the employé is guilty of a negligent act in doing his work, or the danger is so obvious that the chances of injury are greater than those of safety. Thomas v. R. R., 129 N. C. 394, 40 S. E. 201; Hicks v. Naomi Falls Mfg. Co., 138 N. C. 332, 50 S. E. 703. The contention of the defendant, if sustained, would encourage employers to use antiquated and defective machinery, and to notify employés of the danger, as they would thereby escape liability for injury.

The prayers for instruction, based on the idea that the plaintiff could not recover if he acted contrary to the orders of Hill, were properly refused, because there was evidence that the plaintiff, at the time of his injury, was acting under the orders of another superintendent, who had the authority to control him.

[3] The principle embodied in the eleventh request for instruction is supported by authority, and may be technically correct; but we think, if applied in instructing juries, it would tend to confuse and mislead, and that it is wiser to adhere to the practice which requires the judge to explain the conduct of the plaintiff which will amount to negligence, and that if there is negligence which is the real cause of the injury he cannot recover. If we depart from this rule, and say that the slightest negligence on the part of the plaintiff contributing to his injury is fatal to his cause of action, we must apply the same standard to the conduct of the defendant, when considering the first issue, and in practical operation the search for the real, efficient cause of the injury may easily be lost sight of.

[4] Again, his honor could have denied all the prayers for instructions on the second issue, because the only conduct of the plaintiff alleged in the answer to have been negligent, was in the operation of the train, and there was no evidence of negligence in this particular.

[5] On the issue of damages, his honor told the jury that the loss of mental powers by the plaintiff might be considered as an element of damages, when, upon an examination of the evidence, there is no suggestion that the plaintiff was at any time unconscious, or that he suffered even momentarily an impairment of mental powers. We doubt if this affected the verdict, but we cannot say it did not, and under the authorities in this state this instruction was erroneous. Smith v. Railroad, 126 N. C. 712, 36 S. E. 170; Wilkie v. Railroad, 128 N. C. 113, 38 S. E. 289; Bryan v. Railroad, 134 N. C. 538, 47 S. E. 15.

In the Bryan Case, a new trial was ordered, because a charge was given that the jury might consider the loss of physical and mental powers in estimating damage, when there was no evidence of the loss of mental powers, and this case was approved in Jones v. Insurance Co., 153 N. C. 391, 69 S. E. 266.

We must therefore order a new trial, but it is restricted to the issue of damages.

Partial new trial.

On Motion to Dismiss.

This is a motion to dismiss the appeal or to affirm the judgment, upon the ground that there are no exceptions in the record upon which the assignments of error are based.

[8, 7] Exceptions to evidence must be entered during the progress of the trial, and it is not sufficient to object. The exception must be noted. Exceptions to the charge may be taken for the first time when the case on appeal is settled, and should point out the parts of the charge to which exceptions are taken. The preparation of the assignment of error is the work of the attorney for the appellant, and is not a part of the case on appeal, and its office is to group the exceptions noted in the case on appeal; and if there is an assignment of error, not supported by an exception, it will be disregarded.

Applying these principles to the record in this case, the motion of the appellee must be denied. The case was not settled by the judge, but by agreement of counsel. The exceptions and assignments of error follow the charge, and immediately thereafter we find the signatures of counsel for plaintiff and defendant, and each assignment begins, "The defendant excepted for that," etc. This is, in our opinion, an agreement by counsel that the exceptions set out in the assignments were duly entered.

Motion denied.

STATE v. DOSTER.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 20, 1911.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 88*)—CRIMINAL JURISDICTION—RECORDERS' COURTS.

Const. art. 4, § 27, provides that justices of the peace shall have jurisdiction of all criminal matters arising within their counties where the punishment cannot exceed a fine of $50 or imprisonment for 30 days. Section 14 authorizes the General Assembly to establish special courts for the trial of misdemeanors in cities and towns, and provides that such courts may be given exclusive jurisdiction of offenses committed within the corporate limits of the city or town where they are established. By Pub. Laws 1907, c. 860, the recorder's court of the city of Monroe was established, section 4, subsec. 3, of which conferred thereon exclusive jurisdiction of all criminal offenses within Monroe township in the county of Union, which then or thereafter might be within the jurisdiction of the justices of the peace. Held that, while such act was valid in so far as it vested the recorder's court with exclusive jurisdiction of offenses previously cognizable by a justice of the peace within the limits of the city of Monroe, it was invalid in so far as it attempted to extend such jurisdiction to offenses committed beyond the city limits and within the county, which, notwithstanding the statute, were still cognizable by a justice of the peace.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 127; Dec. Dig. § 88.*]

2. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 48*)—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

A statute will never be declared unconstitutional, unless it plainly and clearly appears that the General Assembly has exceeded its powers.

Appeal from Superior Court, Union County; Cooke, Judge.

J. E. Doster was convicted of a misdemeanor, and from an order denying his motion in arrest of judgment he appeals. Affirmed.

On the trial it appeared that defendant on October 29, 1911, the said date being Sunday, was found off his premises, and having a shotgun, etc., within Monroe township and outside of the city of Munroe, contrary to Revisal 1905, § 3842; that on warrant issued by M. L. Flow, a justice of the peace of Munroe township, resident within the city of Munroe, defendant was convicted for said offense, and on appeal to this court was again convicted and sentenced. Defendant, having raised question by motion to quash the indictment, etc., moved on arrest of judgment that under the statute establishing the recorder's court for the city of Munroe a justice of the peace had no jurisdiction to try the offense. Motion denied, and defendant excepted and appealed.

J. J. Parker, for appellant. T. W. Bickett, Atty. Gen., and Geo. L. Jones, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HOKE, J. [1] The act establishing the recorder's court for the city of Munroe (Pub. Laws 1907, c. 860), in section 4, subsec. 3, confers upon said court exclusive original jurisdiction of all criminal offenses within Munroe township, in said county of Union, "which are now or may hereafter be within the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace." Section 3842 creates an offense which is within the ordinary jurisdiction of the justice of the peace, and, if the act in question is valid, the position of defendant must be sustained. Const. art. 4, § 27, among other things, provides that "the several justices of the peace shall have jurisdiction of all criminal matters arising within their counties where the punishment cannot exceed a fine of $50.00 or imprisonment for 30 days." In State v. Baskerville, 141 N. C. 811, 53 S. E. 742, the court held that this provision as to jurisdiction, otherwise peremptory, was so far modified by section 14 of the same article, that authorizing the General Assembly to establish special courts for the trial of misdemeanors in cities and towns, that such courts could be given exclusive jurisdiction of all proper offenses committed within the incorporate limits of the city or town where the same were properly established.

[2] In Baskerville's Case the offense was committed within the incorporate limits and the exclusive jurisdiction given by statute to the recorder's court was to that extent upheld. The principles of construction approved in Baskerville's Case and the conclusion reached are set forth in the opinion as follows: "It is well established that an act of the Legislature will never be declared unconstitutional unless it plainly and clearly appears that the General Assembly has exceeded its powers. Sutton v. Phillips, 116 N. C. 502, 21 S. E. 968; State v. Lytle, 138 N. C. 738, 51 S. E. 66, supra. It is also an accepted canon of construction that, in case of ambiguity, the whole Constitution is to be examined in order to determine the meaning of any part, and the construction is to be such as to give effect to the entire instrument, and not to raise any conflict between its parts which can be avoided. Black on Interpretation of Laws, p. 17, cl. 10, citing Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 53, and Manly v. State, 7 Md. 135. And the same idea is expressed by our court in State v. Pender, 66 N. C. 318, supra, where the judge says: "It is the duty of the courts of this state, and one which the court has endeavored faithfully and impartially to perform, to give to the Constitution such an interpretation as will harmonize all of the parts, and without violating any leading idea in it as a whole." From the principles here stated and the decisions of our courts from the language of the Constitution itself, and considering the two sections together and giving to each its proper effect, we think it a correct deduction, and hold it to be the law, that: (a) Section 27, art. 4, conferring jurisdiction on justices of the peace, is so modified by section 14 of the same article as to authorize and empower the Legislature to establish special courts in cities and towns, and give them exclusive jurisdiction of misdemeanors committed within the corporate limits of the same. Applying the principles approved in Baskerville's Case to the facts presented here, we think it follows as a necessary conclusion that when, as in this case, the offense is committed outside of the corporate limits of the city, the general provision of the Constitution conferring criminal jurisdiction on justices of the peace must prevail. And the act establishing the recorder's court in so far as it attempts to confer exclusive jurisdiction on such offenses occurring outside the city limits must be declared invalid.

There is no error, and the judgment of his honor must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

STATE et al. v. STAPLES.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 20, 1911.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 63*)—ORDINANCES—PUBLIC WELFARE—REVIEW.

Courts will not interfere with the exercise of the discretionary powers conferred on a municipal corporation for the public welfare, unless the exercise thereof is so clearly unreasonable as to amount to a manifest abuse of discretion.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 602*)—POLICE POWER — PUBLIC WELFARE — BILLBOARD ORDINANCE—REASONABLENESS.

Where the charter of a city authorized it to pass an ordinance regulating billboards generally, an ordinance prohibiting the erection or maintenance of any billboard within the city nearer the ground than 24 inches, except when erected against a solid wall, was a reasonable exercise of the city's police power for the public welfare.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 602*)—BILLBOARD REGULATION—NUISANCE.

Where a billboard maintained on private property is secure and is not per se an infringement on public safety, it is not a nuisance, and cannot be made so by legislative fiat and then prohibited, nor can its maintenance be regulated by mere aesthetic conditions under an alleged exercise of the city's police power.

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; Lane, Judge.

Action by the State and City of Asheville against W. J. Staples. Judgment for defendant, and the State appeals. Reversed.

It appeared that defendant was arrested, tried, and convicted on a warrant issued by the police judge of said city, and the testimony showed a violation by defendant of an ordinance of the city in terms as follows: "Sec. 773. That no person, firm or corporation shall erect or maintain within the city of Asheville any billboard or other similar structure used solely for the purpose of displaying posters or other public advertisements, the boards of which shall be nearer the ground than twenty-four inches, except where said billboards are erected and maintained against the wall of a building or other solid wall, and any person violating any of the provisions of this section, shall upon conviction, be subject to a penalty of twenty-five dollars for each and every such offense." In the superior court on motion there was judgment questioning the warrant which was based on and recited the ordinance, and the state excepted and appealed.

T. W. Bickett, Atty. Gen., G. L. Jones, Asst. Atty. Gen., and J. F. Glenn, for the State. Craig, Martin & Thomason, for appellee.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] It is well recognized in this state that "courts will not interfere with the exercise of discretionary powers conferred upon municipal corporations for the public welfare unless their action is so clearly unreasonable as to amount to an oppressive and manifest abuse of discretion." Rosenthal v. Goldsboro, 149 N. C. 123, 62 S. E. 905, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 809; Tate v. Greensboro, 114 N. C. 392, 19 S. E. 767, 24 L. R. A. 671. There was some limitation placed on the principle in the case of State v. Higgs, 126 N. C. 1014, 35 S. E. 473, 43 L. R. A. 446, but that case was expressly overruled in Small v. City of Edenton, 146 N. C. 527, 60 S. E. 413, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 145, and the opinion of the present Chief Justice in Small's Case is in full approval of the position as it had formerly prevailed. The charter of the city of Asheville confers ample power to pass an ordinance of the general character in question. State v. Whitlock, 149 N. C. 542, 63 S. E. 123, 128 Am. St. Rep. 670.

[2] And in the learned and well-considered brief of the counsel for the city it is suggested in support of the ordinance in question here that the same is reasonable and "necessary to protect the public generally from the unsafe condition caused by the accumulation of leaves, papers, and other waste material which accumulate against billboards when constructed against the ground. It is a necessary restriction to protect adjoining and other buildings contiguous thereto from the danger of fire, which could so easily be conducted from such condition. It is also necessary for the purpose of keeping vacant property in a sanitary condition." On authority here and elsewhere these considerations should in our opinion be allowed to prevail and the ordinance upheld as a valid exercise of the powers conferred. Rosenthal v. Goldsboro, supra; State v. Whitlock, supra; Small v. Edenton, supra; City of Chicago v. Gunning System, 214 Ill. 628, 78 N. E. 1085, 70 L. R. A. 230; City of Rochester v. West, 164 N. Y. 510, 58 N. E. 673, 53 L. R. A. 548, 79 Am. St. Rep. 659; City of Passaic v. Bill Posting Co., 71 N. J. Law, 75, 58 Atl. 348; In re Wilshire (C. C.) 103 Fed. 620.

In our present decision we do not intend to qualify or question in any way the disposition made of Whitlock's Appeal, supra. In that case it appeared that the ordinance prohibited the erection of billboards on private property, regardless of whether the same were secure or insecure. It seemed to have been based on aesthetic consideration alone, having no reference whatever to the protection and security of the public, and, on that account, it was held to be an unwarranted and unreasonable interference with the rights of the individual owner. In his forcible and learned opinion in Whitlock's Case, Associate Justice Brown states the doctrine applicable and the reasons upon which it rests as follows: "Aesthetic considerations will not warrant its adoption, but those only which have for their object the safety and welfare of the community. It is conceded to be a fundamental principle under our system of government that the state may require the individual to so manage and use his property that the public health and safety are best conserved. It is to restrict the owner in those uses of his property which he may have as a matter of natural right, and make them conform to the safety and welfare of established society, that the police power of the state is invoked."

[3] "While this is true, yet it is fundamental law that the owner of land has the right to erect such structures upon it as he may see fit, and put his property to any use which may suit his pleasure, provided that in so doing he does not imperil or threaten harm to others. Tiedeman, Lim. 439. All statutory restrictions of the use of property are imposed upon the theory that they are necessary for the safety, health, or comfort of the public, but a limitation which is unnecessary and unreasonable cannot be enforced. Although the police power is a broad one, it is not without its limitations, and a secure structure upon private property, and one which is not per se an infringement upon the public safety, and is not a nuisance, cannot be made one by legislative fiat and then prohibited"—citing Syates v. Milwaukee,

1. TRESPASS (§ 46*)—PROOF OF TITLE—EVIDENCE.

Where, in trespass quare clausum fregit, defendants introduced a state grant for the land, but did not connect themselves therewith, its only effect was to show that the state claimed no interest in the land, and relieved plaintiff from showing such fact.

2. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 115*)—UTILIZATION OF LAND—EVIDENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where land in controversy was steep, declivitous, very barren, and fit only for the timber upon it, evidence that plaintiff's ancestor for at least 30 years had occupied it, and, with his tenants, had cut timber for lumber, firewood, and housebote, was sufficient to require submission of the issue of his adverse possession to the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Polk County; Council, Judge.

Action by Francis S. Coxe and others, as trustees and executors of Col. Frank Coxe, deceased, against K. J. Carpenter and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

This was an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. The plaintiffs relied upon color of title and adverse possession. The defendants introduced a grant from the state, which covers the locus in quo but did not connect themselves with it, so that it had the effect only of showing that the title was out of the state. There was evidence tending to show that the plaintiffs, and those under whom they claim, had been in the actual possession of the land for more than 30 years, claiming it as their own. The witness John Pack testified that he had lived on the Coxe plantation a little over 20 years, and has known the land in dispute for more than 20 years. Col. Frank Coxe had possession of it when he first knew it, and used it for "timber, wood, pine, and such," and would cut wood there nearly every day—firewood and stove wood. There was a great deal of chestnut timber on the land, and Coxe got boards and rails from the land every once in a while. The witness cultivated a portion of the other part of the Elwood land, and lived on it 13 years as a tenant of Col. Coxe; cultivated it part of the time, and while he lived there he got all the wood he needed from the land in dispute every year, as did the other tenants of Col. Coxe. The witness also stated that the land in dispute was not cleared, it being ordinary timber land, and "mighty little" of it could be cultivated. It was rough land, and "some of it you could not stand upon without holding to the bushes." The land was poor, and Coxe had been cutting timber on it all these years. He opened and laid out roads on it, in order to haul the wood off; one of the roads was there when he first took possession. There was much other evidence of the same kind. There also was evidence that the land was not fit for cultivation, but was only useful and valuable for its timber—it could not be cultivated profitably; and also that Coxe was using it, as indicated, for its timber, and reserving it for the purpose of subsequently getting a water supply; it being in evidence that he had run a level on the branch to see if there was fall enough to the place he lived, so that he could utilize the water, which he found to be the case. The case was submitted to the jury under an instruction as to what would constitute, in law, adverse possession, and the only question, as was admitted on the argument, is whether the facts we have stated, if found by the jury, were sufficient to constitute such possession. The jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiffs, and from the judgment thereon the defendants appealed.

Smith & Shipman, for appellants. S. Gallert, for appellees.

WALKER, J. [1] The material issue in this case is easily apparent from the state of the proof and the admissions in the record. Plaintiffs did not have a paper title for the locus in quo, but relied solely upon their color of title and adverse possession. Defendants introduced a state grant for the land, but did not connect themselves with it. The only effect of this evidence was to show that the state claimed no interest in the land, and to relieve the plaintiffs from the necessity of showing that fact. But it is conceded that our decision must turn upon the character of plaintiffs' possession as being, or not, adverse, and sufficient in law to ripen their color into a good and perfect title to the land.

The evidence tends to show that the land was very barren and only fit for use as timber land. A large part of it was so steep and declivitous that it was necessary to hold to the bushes in order to stand and "keep your equilibrium." There was other evidence to the effect that the land was in the possession of plaintiffs, and those under whom they claimed, for many years, at least 30, and that Col. Coxe, who claimed the land (it does not appear under what title, except the color), occupied the land with those rightfully claiming under him, and asserted dominion over it for more than the period required by law to ripen the title; that he did not clear or cultivate any part of the land, because it was not fit for cultivation or clearing. It was mostly wild and unarable land, and only useful and valuable for the timber. It was further in evidence that Col. Coxe, his tenants, and those claiming under Coxe for many years cut timber, for the purpose of making it into lumber, and also for firewood and housebote. The witness described this user as being for "timber, wood, boards, pine, and such," and this was an everyday occurrence; and roads already there were used and new ones laid out, for the purpose of utilizing the land in its then state and condition. His tenants got firewood and stove wood from the land in the same way. There is no doubt but that the possession, if adverse, was open, visible, notorious, and continuous, and no owner of the land could have failed to take notice of it, as an assertion against his title, from the very beginning. There was also evidence that the plaintiffs and those under whom they claimed "had possession of the land" for more than seven years.

[2] We think this case is governed by Berry v. McPherson, 153 N. C. 4, 68 S. E. 892. There are two propositions decided in that case, which we take from the headnotes: (1) "The testimony of the plaintiff, unexplained and uncontradicted upon cross-examination, that he and his father had been in possession of the locus in quo for 30 years, in order to show possession under color of title as against the state under deeds he had introduced in evidence, is sufficient to go to the jury." (2) "While the evidence of title by adverse possession must tend to prove the continuity of possession for the statutory period in plain terms or by 'necessary implication,' it is sufficient to go to the jury, if it was as decided and notorious as the nature of the land would permit." We may well show the application of the principles, settled in that case, to those which have been established in the case at bar, in referring generally to what was said by the court, through Justice Brown: The evidence of plaintiff in the case was that "there is an island about midway of his possession, and a road leading across the swamp to the island; that he and his father kept up this road; that there was a road leading across the woods to the island for a third of the way, from which he and his father regularly got firewood; that his father sold timber off the land in controversy, and that six years ago defendant cut timber on this land, and promised to pay plaintiff for it; that on one occasion defendant, in presence of plaintiff and his brother, recognized plaintiff's possession by admitting the cedar corner claimed by plaintiff to be the true division corner. Plaintiff further testified that tenants on his farm cut wood on this land whenever they needed it, and that he had cut and sold shingles off it frequently, and his father had cut and sold railroad ties. Plaintiff further stated that he sold pine timber off the land, and allowed the neighbors to get wood off it whenever they desired. The land in controversy appears to be swamp land, uninclosed, and with no habitation upon it. The evidence indicates that plaintiff and his father, for more than 30 years, exercised acts of dominion over the land, and made from it the only profits and use of which it is susceptible. From the evidence of the witness, the jury may well infer that these acts were those of ownership, and not those of an occasional trespasser; and that they were repeated and continuous for a considerable period of time. The possession was as decided and notorious as the nature of the land would permit, and offered unequivocal indication that plaintiff and his father were exercising the dominion of owners, and were not pillaging as trespassers. Williams v. Buchanan, 23 N. C. 535 [35 Am. Dec. 760]; Tredwell v. Reddick, 23 N. C. 56; Hamilton v. Icard, 114 N. C. 538 [19 S. E. 607]; Simpson v. Blount, 14 N. C. 34; Baum v. Shooting Club, 96 N. C. 310 [2 S. E. 673]. It is true that in proving continuous adverse possession under color of title, nothing must be left to mere conjecture. The testimony must tend to prove the continuity of possession for the statutory period, either in plain terms or by 'necessary implication.' Ruffin v. Overby, 105 N. C. 83 [11 S. E. 251]. This possession need not be unceasing; but the evidence should be such as to warrant the inference that the actual use and occupation have extended over the required period, and that during it the claimant has, from time to time, continuously subjected some portion of the disputed land to the only use of which it was susceptible. Ruffin v. Overby, supra; McLean v. Smith, 106 N. C. 172 [11 S. E. 184]; Hamilton v. Icard, supra. While the evidence offered is not necessarily conclusive, if taken to be true, as to the fact of possession, we think it sufficient to be submitted to the jury, under appropriate instructions, that they may draw such inference as they see proper, bearing in mind that the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to establish the fact of possession for the statutory period by a preponderance in the proof."

This is practically a motion by the defendants to nonsuit the plaintiffs. We are of the opinion that there was sufficient proof of facts showing adverse possession, and the case was properly submitted to the jury for their consideration. There was consequently no error in the rulings of the court.

No error.

KELLER v. CHAMPION FIBRE CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 23, 1911.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 286, 289*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action for injuries to a servant by the derailment of a log train which he was operating down a mountain by gravity, whether defendant was negligent, and whether plaintiff was also negligent, held for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1010-1050, 1089-1132; Dec. Dig. §§ 286, 289.*]

2. NEGLIGENCE (§ 136*) — QUESTION FOR COURT OR JURY—NONSUIT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

A motion for nonsuit on the issue of contributory negligence can only be sustained when the facts necessary to show contributory negligence are established by plaintiff's evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 277-353; Dec. Dig. § 136.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Jackson County; Cline, Judge.

Action by B. B. Keller against the Champion Fibre Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

These issues were submitted to the jury:

"(1) Was the plaintiff injured by the negligence of the defendant, as alleged? Answer: Yes.

"(2) Did the plaintiff, by his own negligence, contribute to his own injury? Answer: No.

"(3) What damage is plaintiff entitled to recover? Answer: Six thousand dollars ($6,000)."

From the judgment rendered, the defendant appealed.

P. H. C. Cabell, Martin & Wright, Bourne, Parker & Morrison, and Bryson & Black, for appellant. Walter E. Moore and Moore & Rollins, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiff moved the court to dismiss the defendant's appeal, for the reason that the exceptions relied on are not grouped and numbered immediately after the end of the case on appeal, as required by rules 19 and 21 of the court (140 N. C. 660, 66 S. E. vii). The court is of opinion, upon an examination of the record, that the assignments of error are properly placed at end of case on appeal, and that assignments Nos. 1 and 2, relating to the refusal to sustain the motions to nonsuit the plaintiff, are properly assigned and worded, and that defendant is entitled to have them passed upon by the court. But the majority of the court is of opinion that the remaining assignments, all of which relate to the charge of the judge and the refusal to give special instructions asked by defendant, are not fully or properly assigned, and come within the rulings of this court in Thompson v. Railroad, 147 N.

C. 413, 61 S. E. 286; Lee v. Baird, 146 N. C. 361, 59 S. E. 876; Smith v. Mfg. Co., 151 N. C. 260, 65 S. E. 1009. Taking into consideration the motions to nonsuit, the court is of opinion that they were properly denied.

[1] There is much conflicting evidence upon the material issues of fact, but the evidence of the plaintiff tends to establish that he was brakeman on defendant's logging railroad; that in March, 1910, the defendant's superintendent directed plaintiff to let a string of eight cars, heavily loaded, run down the mountain incline grade without an engine attached; that in obedience to orders plaintiff did so; that the cars ran into a cow, and pushed it some distance on the track, and were then derailed, in consequence of which plaintiff was seriously injured; that, had the engine been attached, it could have controlled the cars, and the derailment would not have occurred; that the brakes were defective, out of order, and failed to stop the cars when applied; that plaintiff was furnished with only one person to assist in controlling the cars, and that was insufficient, in the absence of the engine.

[2] Upon the issue of contributory negligence, the court is of opinion that a motion to nonsuit can only be sustained when the facts necessary to constitute contributory negligence are established by the evidence of the plaintiff. In this case the evidence offered by plaintiff does not of itself make out contributory negligence upon his part; upon the contrary, it tends strongly to rebut such defense.

The judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

HOKE, J. (concurring in result). I think that the assignment of errors is sufficient under the rule, but concur in the result, being of opinion that no reversible error appears in the record.

REA v. STANDARD MIRROR CO. et al.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 23, 1911.)

1. REMOVAL OF CAUSES (§ 49*)—SEVERABLE CONTROVERSIES.

Where a servant was injured through the joint negligence of the master and its vice principal, the cause is a joint one, and no severable controversy exists.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Removal of Causes, Cent. Dig. §§ 95-99; Dec. Dig. § 49.*]

2. REMOVAL OF CAUSES (§ 25*)—SEVERABLE CONTROVERSIES—PETITION.

Whether a complaint states a joint wrong, in which there is no severable controversy, is not affected by an allegation in the petition for removal to the federal court that the resident defendant was fraudulently joined.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Removal of Causes, Cent. Dig. §§ 58, 59; Dec. Dig. § 25.*]

3. REMOVAL OF CAUSES (§ 95*)—PROCEEDINGS TO PROCURE—PETITION.

Where a verified petition for removal on the ground of diversity of citizenship alleges fraudulent joinder, with a statement of facts, sufficient, if true, to show that there has been a fraudulent joinder of a resident defendant, together with a sufficient bond, is filed in the state court, the case should be removed, and the jurisdiction of the state court is at an end; the plaintiff, if he desires to challenge the truth of any averments, having the right to do so in the federal court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Removal of Causes, Cent. Dig. §§ 204, 205; Dec. Dig. § 95.*]

4. REMOVAL OF CAUSES (§ 86*)—PROCEEDINGS TO PROCURE—PETITION—VERIFICATION.

A petition for removal of a cause into the federal court, upon the ground of diversity of citizenship, alleging that a resident party has been fraudulently joined to defeat the right of removal, must be verified.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Removal of Causes, Cent. Dig. § 177; Dec. Dig. § 86.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Davidson County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by Z. M. Rea against the Standard Mirror Company and another. From a judgment ordering the case removed to the federal court, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Walser & Walser and Bryant & Brogden, for appellant. Roberson & Barnhart and Craige & Craige, for appellees.

HOKE, J. At April term, 1911, of said court, plaintiff, a citizen and resident of Davidson county, N. C., having entered suit, filed his complaint in the superior court of Davidson county, alleging liability for physical injuries received by reason of the joint negligence on the part of the defendant the Standard Mirror Company, a corporation, citizen and resident of the state of Pennsylvania, doing business at High Point, N. C., and Frank Wineskie, a resident of this state, and secretary and general manager of the company's plant in this state, having direct charge and control of the work and the laborers employed therein, including the plaintiff. The wrong alleged being in part the negligent provision made, and directions given by said Wineskie when engaged in his duties as defendant's general manager, etc.

The defendant, in apt time, and accompanied by proper bond, with good and sufficient sureties, filed his duly verified petition for removal, setting forth the position and duties of defendant Wineskie in reference to his codefendant's plant at the time of the injury, with detailed and special averment that said Wineskie was not charged with the supervision and control of plaintiff or other laborers employed in the work, or of supplying them with safe and suitable machinery or placing, etc.; that his duties were entirely in the office of defendant company, disconnected with any direction or supervision of laborers, machinery, etc.; and the petition further proceeds as follows: "That he was not present or in the factory when the plaintiff was injured; that the injury received was neither the direct nor proximate cause or result of any negligence of defendant Wineskie, nor of any duty imposed upon him, nor of the failure on his part to use due care, caution, or prudence, and properly discharge his duties, which are, and were at and before the alleged injury of plaintiff, in the office of said company, as above set forth; that the rights of the real parties in interest to this controversy can be finally adjudicated without the presence of the defendant Wineskie; that the defendant Wineskie is an improper party to this proceeding; that he has no connection therewith, and that he is an unnecessary party; that defendant Wineskie has been improperly and fraudulently joined as a defendant in this suit, for the purpose of fraudulently and improperly preventing, or attempting to prevent, this defendant from removing this cause to the United States Circuit Court, and that the plaintiff well knew, at the time of the beginning of this suit, that Wineskie was not charged with the duties aforesaid, as alleged in the complaint; and that he was joined as a party defendant for the sole and only purpose of preventing the removal of this cause, and not in good faith." Upon these the controlling facts relevant to the question presented, we are of opinion that the order for removal was properly made.

[1] It is now very generally held that, on the facts stated in the complaint, the cause of action may be considered and dealt with as a joint wrong, and that when such allegations are made in good faith they must be considered and passed upon as the complaint presents them, and that when viewed as a legal proposition no severable controversy is presented which requires or permits a removal to the federal courts. Railway v. Miller, 217 U. S. 209, 20 Sup. Ct. 450, 54 L. Ed. 732; Ala. R. R. v. Thompson, 200 U. S. 206, 26 Sup. Ct. 161, 50 L. Ed. 441; Chesapeake & Ohio R. R. v. Dixon, 179 U. S. 131, 21 Sup. Ct. 67, 45 L. Ed. 121; Dougherty v. Railroad (C. C.) 126 Fed. 239.

[2] And it is held, further, that the position as stated is not altered or in any way affected by allegation of the petition that the resident defendant was joined for the mere purpose of avoiding removal, or with no honest intent of seeking relief against such resident, or the like, nor by general allegations of fraudulent joinder. Kansas City R. R. v. Herman, 187 U. S. 63, 23 Sup. Ct. 24, 47 L. Ed. 76; Foster v. Gas & Electric Co. (C. C.) 185 Fed. 979; Shane v. Electric Ry. (C. C.) 150 Fed. 801; Knuth v. Electric Ry. (C. C.) 148 Fed. 73; Thomas v. Great Northern R. Co., 147 Fed. 83, 77 C. C. A. 255; Hough v. Railroad, 144 N. C. 701, 57 S. E. 469; Tobacco Co. v. Tobacco Co., 144 N. C.

352, 57 S. E. 5; Ill. R. R. v. Houchins, 121 Ky. 526, 89 S. W. 530, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 375, 123 Am. St. Rep. 205; So. R. R. v. Grizzle, 124 Ga. 735, 58 S. E. 244, 110 Am. St. Rep. 191. To cite from one or two of the cases, in Railroad v. Miller, supra, it was held: "For the purposes of determining the removability of a cause, the case must be deemed to be such as the plaintiff has made it, in good faith, in his pleadings; and if a plaintiff, in a suit for personal injuries, joined with the foreign corporation one or more of its employes, residents of plaintiff's state, as defendants, and the state court holds that the joinder is not improper, the cause is not separable, and cannot be removed into the federal court. Ala. Great So. R. R. v. Thompson, 200 U. S. 206 [26 Sup. Ct. 161, 50 L. Ed. 441]; Railway Co. v. Bonon, 200 U. S. 221 [26 Sup. Ct. 168, 50 L. Ed. 448]." And in Kansas Ry. v. Herman, the court held: "While an action commenced in a state court against two defendants, one of whom is a resident and the other a nonresident, may be removed to the circuit court of the United States by the nonresident defendant, if it can be shown that the cause of action is separable, and the resident defendant is joined fraudulently, for the purpose of preventing the removal of the cause to the federal court, such removal cannot be had, if it does not appear that the resident defendant is fraudulently joined for such purpose. This rule will be adhered to, even if on the trial of the action the lower court holds that no evidence was given by the plaintiff tending to show liability of the resident defendant, and a second application for a removal from the state to the federal court has been made and denied after a trial, and the trial court has sustained a demurrer to the evidence as to the resident defendant, and where it appears that the ruling was on the merits and in invitum. Powers v. Chesapeake & O. Ry. Co., 169 U. S. 92, 18 Sup. Ct. 264, 42 L. Ed. 673, distinguished, and Whitcomb v. Smithson, 175 U. S. 635, 20 Sup. Ct. 248, 44 L. Ed. 803, followed. Where a fraudulent joinder of defendants is averred by the party petitioning for removal, and is specifically denied, the petitioner has the affirmative of the issue."

[3] These and other authorities are also to the effect that, where the petition for removal, properly verified, as in this case, and accompanied by proper and sufficient bond, has been filed in the state court, and the same contains allegation of fraudulent joinder, together with full and direct statement of the facts and circumstances of the transactions, sufficient, if true, to demonstrate that there had been such fraudulent joinder of the resident defendant, in such case, the order for removal should be made, and the jurisdiction of the state court is at an end. If the plaintiff desires to challenge the truth of these averments, he must do so on motion to remand or other proper procedure in the federal court. That court, being charged with the duty of exercising jurisdiction in such case, must have the power to consider and determine the facts upon which the jurisdiction rests. Chesapeake Ry. Co. v. McCabe, 213 U. S. 207, 29 Sup. Ct. 430, 53 L. Ed. 765; Wecker v. National Enameling, etc., Co., 204 U. S. 176, 27 Sup. Ct. 184, 51 L. Ed. 430; Kansas City Ry. v. Daughtry, 138 U. S. 298, 11 Sup. Ct. 306, 34 L. Ed. 963; Boatmen's Bank v. Fritzlen, 75 Kan. 479, 89 Pac. 915, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1235; McAllister v. Chesapeake Ry., 157 Fed. 740, 85 C. C. A. 316; Atlantic Coast Line v. Bailey (C. C.) 151 Fed. 891; So. Ry. v. Hudgins, 107 Ga. 334, 33 S. E. 442; Byson v. McPherson, 71 Iowa, 437, 32 N. W. 418.

[4] As we have heretofore intimated, we think a petition in cases like the present should be verified. Ordinarily, in causes coming within the direct provisions of the statute, such verification is not absolutely required, though it is usual to have it, and in these petitions, alleging fraudulent joinder, there are one or two cases in the lower federal courts which hold that no verification is necessary. But this is not a case coming directly within the terms of the statute, but rather a corollary, which arises from the necessity of the case, and the procedure therein should be to some extent the subject of judicial regulation and control. As it would be inexpedient, and to some extent an idle thing, to confer jurisdiction of a cause on the Circuit Court of the United States, and allow to some other tribunal the power to determine the facts upon which the jurisdiction rests, so it would be to seriously inconvenience and threaten the proper and timely exercise of jurisdiction on the part of the state courts to require them to stay their procedure on simple allegations which can be made without consideration or any sense of responsibility; and we think it rests on sound reason, and is a fair deduction from the authoritative cases, that the petition for removal by reason of fraudulent joinder should be duly verified. Louisville & Nashville R. R. v. Wangellin, 132 U. S. 599, 10 Sup. Ct. 203, 33 L. Ed. 474; Welch v. Cin., etc., R. R. (C. C.) 177 Fed. 760; Kelly v. Chicago, etc., R. R. (C. C.) 122 Fed. 286; Ross v. Erie R. R. (C. C.) 120 Fed. 703; Union Terminal v. Chicago (C. C.) 119 Fed. 209. In Wangellin's Case, supra, the affidavit of the vice president of the road, as to the truth of the facts contained therein, accompanied the petition of removal. In Ross' Case, it appears that the petition was duly and properly verified by defendant company. This is certainly the prevalent custom, and should always be required.

There is no error, and the judgment, directing removal of the cause, is affirmed.

Affirmed.

REXFORD et al. v. MARTIN et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 23, 1911.)

ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 113*)—EVIDENCE.

On a plea of adverse possession, evidence as to who claimed the land at the time defendants acquired possession was admissible to show the beginning of the possession, its notoriety, and continuity.

Appeal from Superior Court, Swain County; Cline, Judge.

Action by C. H. Rexford and others against John H. Martin and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff Rexford appeals. Affirmed.

W. L. Taylor, Bryson & Black, and Frye & Frye, for appellant. John W. Hinsdale, for appellees.

PER CURIAM. This case has received a careful examination, and we are of the opinion that no substantial or reversible error, if error at all, was committed during the trial. It is plain that the defendants had good color of title, and the case turned largely upon their possession—that is, whether it was sufficiently adverse, notorious, continuous, etc., to ripen their color into a good and valid title—and we entertain no doubt upon this branch of the case. The evidence as to who claimed the land was competent and relevant to show the beginning of the possession, its notoriety and continuity, and, if any of the questions or answers were incompetent, as contended by plaintiffs, we do not see that any error in this respect was prejudicial.

In view of the facts, it must certainly be considered as harmless. We do not intend even to intimate that there was error. The substantial merits are clearly with the defendants, and the jury, under an exceedingly fair and proper charge, have found the issue of fact against the plaintiffs, and their verdict in our judgment should not be disturbed.

No error.

SMITH v. MILLER et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 23, 1911.)

1. REMAINDERS (§ 16*)—CONTINGENT REMAINDERS—SALES—ORDERS—REVIEW.

The commissioner appointed by the court to sell property held by contingent remainder for reinvestment may properly except to rulings of the court during the several stages of the proceedings, and appeal from the final judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Remainders, Cent. Dig. § 11; Dec. Dig. § 16.*]

2. REMAINDERS (§ 16*)—CONTINGENT REMAINDERS—SALES—POWER OF COURT.

The court having power to sell property held by contingent remainder has jurisdiction to order the commissioner appointed to make the sale to pay taxes on the property, though such taxes were payable by the life tenant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Remainders, Cent. Dig. § 11; Dec. Dig. § 16.*]

3. REMAINDERS (§ 16*)—CONTINGENT REMAINDERS—SALES—POWER OF COURT.

An order of court in a suit for the sale of property held by contingent remainder, which directs the commissioner appointed to make the sale to pay all taxes "as are and have been laid against" the property, includes, not only taxes due and in the hands of the officers for collection at the time of the making of the order, but all such as thereafter accrue, as well as those previously paid by the commissioner for the estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Remainders, Cent. Dig. § 11; Dec. Dig. § 16.*]

4. LIFE ESTATES (§ 18*)—TAXES—LIABILITY.

Under Revisal 1905, § 2859, making a tenant for life liable for taxes, and providing that, where the life tenant suffers the property to be sold for taxes, the remainderman may redeem the land, a remainderman or reversioner may pay the taxes before a sale where the life tenant does not do so, and will be entitled to reimbursement therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Life Estates, Cent. Dig. § 39; Dec. Dig. § 18.*]

5. REMAINDERS (§ 16*)—CONTINGENT REMAINDERS—SALES—POWER OF COURT.

The court in a suit for the sale of property held by contingent remainder for reinvestment has no jurisdiction to order a sale of property adjudged to be the property of the commissioner appointed to make the sale; such property not having been levied on or seized.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Remainders, Cent. Dig. § 11; Dec. Dig. § 16.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; Lane, Judge.

Action by E. A. Smith against C. H. Miller and others for the sale of a contingent remainder for reinvestment. From a final judgment, C. H. Miller, the commissioner appointed to sell the property, appeals. Modified.

A. S. Barnard, for appellant. Mark W. Brown, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This case has been before us for adjudication of one question or another several times, and is reported in 151 N. C. 620, 66 S. E. 671; 152 N. C. 314, 67 S. E. 746; 155 N. C. 242, 71 S. E. 353; 155 N. C. 247, 71 S. E. 355.

[1] The defendant, C. H. Miller, who was the commissioner appointed by the court to sell certain realty, has brought the case here by appeal from the final judgment, he having excepted to rulings of the court during the several stages of the proceedings in the court below, which was the proper method of procedure, as we held in Smith v. Miller, 152 N. C. 314, 67 S. E. 746, and 155 N. C. 242, 71 S. E. 355. He relies upon the following exceptions taken to the rulings of Judge Peebles:

[2] 1. Miller, as commissioner, was allowed certain items in his account, and to this ruling of the judge there was no exception so that they must stand. But he was denied credit for other items, and to this ruling he has excepted. Among them is a claim he now makes for taxes and local assessments levied upon the property which he sold under orders of the court. It appears that at December term, 1904, Judge Shaw made an order directing or authorizing Miller, as commissioner, "to pay all such taxes and street assessments as are and have been levied against any of the property described in the petition (for a sale of the land) in this cause, same to be paid by him out of funds in his hands." No exception was taken to this order by any of the parties. The commissioner paid taxes and assessments since his qualification to the amount of $2,018.76, some before the order was made and some afterwards, but not included in the amount presently to be mentioned. He also paid taxes and assessments then in the hands of the sheriff and city tax collector for collection, amounting to $3,131.78, the total amount of taxes and assessments thus paid being $5,735.44. The appellees contend that he is not entitled to credit for this payment of taxes and assessments, first, because, as Judge Peebles ruled, Judge Shaw had no power to make such an order; second, because the amount paid over and above the sum of $3,131.78, which was then due and collectible, was not embraced by the terms of the order; and, third, because the life tenant, Mrs. Elizabeth A. Smith, was liable for the taxes and assessments, and they were not properly and legally chargeable upon the fund in the hands of Miller, as commissioner. We do not see why Judge Shaw could not make such an order. It was within the power and jurisdiction of the court to sell the land for partition, and, in order to give a clear title, it was certainly necessary that the taxes, which constitute liens upon the land, should be paid. What would be the use of dividing the lands if they could be sold for taxes and the estate of the parties therein be forfeited or lost? This proceeding would in such a case be a vain and useless one. The commissioner may not have been under any obligation to pay the taxes and assessment without an order, but it seems to us, at least, that the order was not only a proper and legal one, but absolutely necessary for the protection of the interests of the parties. It was clearly to their advantage, and, having profited by it, they will not now be heard to complain. He who is willing to reap the benefit should be made to take it with the burden which naturally and equitably goes with it. We think the court had the jurisdiction, and the order was a just and lawful exercise of his power.

[3] Our opinion, also, is that the order of Judge Shaw embraces, and was intended to include, if we are to construe it by the words employed, not only taxes and assessments then due and in the hands of the officers for collection, but all such as thereafter accrued, as well as those theretofore paid by Miller himself while commissioner for the estate. The language is, "All such taxes and assessments as are and have been levied." It would seem that these words are sufficient to take in the past, present, and future taxes and assessments. This meaning is not only apparent on the face of the order, but it would be hard to conclude that the court intended that only a part should be paid. If any of the taxes or assessments had been left unpaid, the property could just as well have been sold for that part as for the whole thereof.

[4] It is true the statute provides for the payment of the taxes by the life tenant. But, suppose she failed to pay them, either purposely or because she had no funds with which to pay them, must the property be sacrificed for this reason, and should we heed such an argument from the remaindermen, who are now enjoying the benefit which they derived solely from the payment? If the life tenant failed to pay, they may perhaps have an action against her, either at common law or under the statute (Revisal, § 2859) which reads as follows: "Every person shall be liable for the taxes assessed or charged upon the property or estate, real or personal, of which he is tenant for life. If any tenant for life of real estate shall suffer the same to be sold for taxes by reason of his neglect or refusal to pay the taxes thereon, and shall fail to redeem the same within one year after such sale, he shall thereby forfeit his life estate to the remainderman or reversioner. The remainderman or reversioner may redeem such lands, in the same manner that is provided for the redemption of other lands. Moreover, such remainderman or reversioner shall have the right to recover of such tenant for life all damages sustained by reason of such neglect or refusal on the part of such tenant for life. If any tenant for life of personal property suffer the same to be sold for taxes by reason of any default of his, he shall be liable in damages to the remainderman or reversioner." By this provision of the law the remainderman or reversioner may redeem from a tax sale, but must he wait until there is a sale and the accumulation of costs and expenses before he exercises the right? If it is inevitable that the land will be sold for the tax, why should he wait? The law evidently means that, if the life tenant does not pay and thereby exposes the land to sale, he may intervene and prevent a sale by paying the tax, and for the same reason that he can redeem from a tax sale already made. It may be that he could do so without the aid of the statute. Revisal, § 2857, provides for the payment of all taxes assessed upon real property ordered to be sold in judicial proceedings and remaining unpaid, and also for the payment of such as may be required to redeem the same, if it has been sold for taxes, and it then provides that payment of the taxes shall be made out of the proceeds of the sale. Sections 2857 and 2858 provide, also, for the payment of taxes assessed upon real estate by trustees, mortgagees, and lienors. The object of the law seems to be, not only to preserve the property for the benefit of all interested parties, but to pass a clear title to the purchaser when it is sold. This exception is sustained, and Miller will be allowed the full amount of taxes and assessments paid by him.

2. We also think that Miller, as commissioner, should be allowed commissions at least to the amount that they were ordered to be retained by him, which appears to be $1,400. There was no exception to this order at the time, and Judge Shaw is presumed to have made it upon full consideration of all the facts and circumstances; and, while we do not decide that the order was not reviewable by Judge Peebles, as it is not necessary to do so, we do not see why it should not stand as it was made. The learned judge in overruling it may have been influenced, at least to some extent, by the erroneous view taken of some of the questions we are now considering. This exception to the ruling disallowing commissions of $1,400 is sustained.

[5] 3. Miller, as commissioner, disbursed a large sum in the manufacture of concrete blocks for use in the construction of the new hotel building in Asheville. Judge Peebles refused to allow him any credit for this expenditure, and ordered his successor, Mr. Whitson, to sell the blocks, and apply the net proceeds as a credit on the judgment against Miller in this case, after finding as a fact that the blocks were manufactured by Miller "in his business, and are not the property of the Smith estate, but the property of Miller, as he could not sell them to himself as commissioner. He is not credited with them, but they are ordered to be sold." If they did not belong to the "Smith estate," but to Miller, it follows that the court had no right to order a sale of them. They had not been levied upon or seized in execution for any debt due by Miller to the "Smith estate." It is clear to us that the sale of them was not only irregular, but void, and Miller is entitled to have, at least, the proceeds or the amount thereof paid to him. This was said in the argument to be $600. He is also entitled, at least, to the proceeds of any other property of his which has been sold in like manner.

None of the exceptions we have considered are covered by our first ruling in the case, that the court did not have jurisdiction to authorize the building of the hotel. They relate entirely to other matters clearly within the cognizance of the court. The other exceptions of defendant are overruled.

It may be that some of the amounts are not correctly stated, and, if they are not, the court below may refer the matter for a finding as to the true amounts, unless the parties can agree, as to them.

The judgment of the superior court will be modified in accordance with this opinion. Error.

FISHER v. ENGLISH LUMBER CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 28, 1911.)

1. SALES (§ 340*)—ACTIONS FOR PRICE—REMEDY.

Where a seller suing for the price showed a contract of sale and delivery of goods in compliance therewith, he was entitled to recover the price, and was not required to allege and prove damages sustained because of the buyer's breach.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 927-942; Dec. Dig. § 340.*]

2. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 120*)—TRANSACTIONS BY AGENT—EVIDENCE.

Where there was some evidence that an agent was authorized to represent the principal in a transaction, and that the principal recognized the agent's authority to make a contract or ratified the contract, evidence of transactions between the agent and the other party to the contract with respect to the contract was admissible.

Appeal from Superior Court, Swain County; Oline, Judge.

Action by D. G. Fisher against the English Lumber Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This action was brought to recover the purchase price of lumber sold by the plaintiff to the defendant, and the question to be decided is whether the sale was executed or executory. The contract, as plaintiff alleged, was for the sale of oak, chestnut, and poplar lumber, except the chestnut culls; the "cull lumber" having been theretofore sold to Mr. Wilbar, as explained to defendant, who was to pay for the lumber $12 per 1000 feet. The plaintiff also alleged that the lumber "was sold pack run, and defendant was to take it just as it came to it, except the chestnut culls, which were to be thrown out." The stock was to run from three to six feet in length, and was supposed to be one face clear, but with some culls in it. The defendant denied that it made the contract as set out in the complaint, and alleged a different agreement. It also denied that Mac English, an officer of defendant company, was authorized to contract for it. The plaintiff introduced letters which passed between the parties, and other evidence which tended to show that English had such authority, and stating that the company would send Mr. Hayes "to take the stock up," and, after receiving a letter from the plaintiff explaining the agreement with Mac English, the defendant sent Mac English and Hayes to inspect the lumber or "to take it up," as expressed in the case, which we understand to mean that they were to inspect it, and, if found to be according to the quantity and quality represented by plaintiff, to accept it. Plaintiff asked Mac English if he had seen the lumber, and he said that he had seen it, and "it was all right." The defendant afterwards did accept one car load of the lumber, and it was shipped by it from the place of delivery, and it refused to take the other part of the lot because it was not of the quality represented. The court instructed the jury as to the bearing of the evidence, and the contentions of the parties, and the issues of fact and law. The defendant requested the court to charge the jury as follows: "If the jury should find from the evidence that there was a contract for the sale of lumber, as alleged in the complaint, and that the defendant failed and refused to comply with and perform the same, and refused to accept the lumber, then, before the plaintiff could recover in this action, he must both allege and prove the damages he sustained by reason of such breaches of the contract on the part of the defendant before he would be entitled to recover judgment for any amount because of such breach." The defendant excepted to some of the instructions, which will be noticed hereafter.

The jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) Did the defendant purchase from the plaintiff the lumber described in the complaint? A. Yes.

"(2) Did the defendant fail and refuse to take up and pay for the lumber covered by its contract with the plaintiff? A. Yes.

"(3) What amount, if any, is the plaintiff entitled to recover from the defendant? A. $504, with interest from December 3, 1909."

Judgment was entered upon the verdict, and defendant appealed.

J. G. Merrimon, for appellant. Bryson & Black, for appellee.

WALKER, J. There is not much in this case but a question of fact. Plaintiff contended that he had sold the lumber to the defendant, through its officer and agent, Mac English, and that it was an executed sale, and not a mere executory contract to sell and deliver, and, further, that it had performed the contract on its part. There can be no doubt of the character of the agreement, if the jury accepted the plaintiff's version of the contract, instead of the defendant's, which they seem to have done. The defense is that after inspecting and measuring the lumber and accepting it, through Mac English and Hayes, the defendant, with the assistance of the plaintiff, loaded and shipped one car, and then discovered, as it alleges that the balance of the lumber was not of the quality represented by the plaintiff. The jury passed upon this question under the instructions of the court, and found against the defendant, so that there is nothing in the case left but the naked question as to the measure of damages.

The jury have found, under proper instructions and upon sufficient evidence, that plaintiff sold the lumber to the defendant, the identity of the lumber, the place of delivery, and the price being ascertained, and it appears that the only reason for the refusal was that a part of the lumber did not correspond in quality with what it was represented to be. If the jury had found this to be true, it may be that the defendant, under certain circumstances, would be entitled to a reduction of the price, or to reject the lumber. Caldwell v. Smith, 20 N. C. 193. But there was some evidence to the effect that the defendant had the lumber inspected by English and Hayes, and loaded and shipped a car load of it. This was at least evidence of the fact that it had elected to accept the lumber, and the court having submitted the question of sale to the jury, and they having found, upon all of the evidence, that there was a sale and that the quality of the lumber was not misrepresented, we do not perceive that there was any legal impediment to the plaintiff's recovery.

[1] The prayer for instruction was properly refused, as the plaintiff is suing for the price, and not for unliquidated damages. If there was a sale, he is entitled to recover the price fixed by the contract; no fraud or any other vitiating fact having been shown.

[2] The objection to what occurred between the plaintiff and Mac English is not tenable. There was some evidence to show that he was authorized to represent the company, and, besides, the correspondence tended to show that he was recognized as defendant's agent, with authority to make the contract for it, or, at least, that the company ratified what he did in its behalf.

We find nothing in the record to indicate that plaintiff was not ready, willing, and able to comply with its contract.

No error.

STATE v. ARLINGTON.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 20, 1911.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 30*)—REGULATION—AGENTS—LICENSES.

Evidence held to sustain a conviction for acting as an insurance agent without a license tax, in violation of Revisal 1905, § 3484, making such act a misdemeanor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 35; Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 30*)—REGULATION—AGENTS—LICENSES—INDICTMENT.

Revisal 1905, § 3484, provides that if any person assumes to act as an insurance agent without having obtained a license prescribed by law, or shall act in any manner in any negotiation or transaction of unlawful insurance with a foreign insurance company not admitted to do business in the state, or, as principal or agent, shall violate any provision of the law in regard to the negotiation or effecting of contracts of insurance, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. Held, that an indictment charging that defendant did unlawfully and willfully assume to act as an insurance agent "for the Order of Owls," representing the same to be a fraternal insurance order having a sick, accident, and death benefit, the said order not being an insurance company lawfully licensed and authorized to do business in North Carolina, etc., was not objectionable for failure to directly aver that the order was a company subject to the insurance regulations of the state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 35; Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

3. INSURANCE (§ 687*)—MUTUAL BENEFIT SOCIETY—REGULATION—"FRATERNAL ORDER."

Where a benefit order having a central organization and local bodies throughout the United States and foreign countries had insurance features, and paid death and sick benefits from dues collected from members, etc., it was a fraternal order within Revisal 1905, § 4795, providing that every incorporated association, lodge, or society doing business in the state on the lodge system with ritualistic form of work and representative form of government, organized to pay benefits to members and their beneficiaries in case of disability resulting from disease, accident, or old age, is a fraternal benefit order, and subject to regulation by the state's authorities.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mecklenburg County; Biggs, Judge.

J. J. Arlington was convicted of soliciting insurance without a license, and he appeals. Affirmed.

The bill of indictment was as follows: "The jurors for the state upon their oaths present that J. J. Arlington, late of Mecklenburg county, on the 29th day of March, 1911, with force and arms at and in the said county, unlawfully and willfully did assume to act as an insurance agent for the 'Order of Owls'; the said J. J. Arlington representing the said 'Order of Owls' to be a fraternal insurance order or company, having a sick and accident benefit of $8 per week and a death benefit of $100; and the said J. J. Arlington assuming to so act as an insurance agent by soliciting B. S. Davis, B. C. Goldberg, and others to the jurors unknown to become members of the said 'Order of Owls' by keeping open an office and place of business in Charlotte, N. C., by advertising in the Charlotte Daily Observer and other papers to the jurors unknown, by using printed cards and other methods of advertisement, by receiving from B. S. Davis and other persons to the jurors unknown the sum of $5 each as initiation fee in the said 'Order of Owls,' the said 'Order of Owls' not being an insurance company lawfully licensed and authorized to do business in North Carolina, and the said J. J. Arlington having no license to act as an insurance agent, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state. And the jurors for the state upon their oaths do further present that at and in said county, on the day and year aforesaid, the said J. J. Arlington did engage in the negotiation of unlawful insurance for and with the 'Order of Owls,' a foreign fraternal insurance order or insurance company, not admitted nor licensed to do business in the state of North Carolina, by soliciting B. S. Davis, B. C. Goldberg, and other persons to the jurors unknown to become members of the said 'Order of Owls'; by soliciting from the said B. C. Goldberg, B. S. Davis, and others to the jurors unknown the payment of initiation fees, and by the receipt of the said initiation fee from B. S. Davis and other persons to the jurors unknown, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided and against the peace and dignity of the state." There was verdict of "guilty." Judgment, and defendant excepted and appealed.

Tillett & Guthrie, for appellant. T. W. Bickett, Atty. Gen., and Geo. L. Jones, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HOKE, J. [1] The statute law of North Carolina, more especially chapter 100, 2 Revisal, makes elaborate and minute provision for the protection of its people from imposition under the guise of insurance, real or pretended, and a department is created, charged with the especial duty of seeing that their rules are complied with. Under section 4691 and others bearing on the question all insurance companies must be "licensed and supervised" by the Insurance Commissioner, and, under section 4706, every agent must be licensed. By section 4715(3) every general agent is required to pay a license tax of $5 per annum, district agent or organizer a like tax of $3, and a local or canvassing agent a tax of $1. These and other special regulations apply to foreign companies doing business in the state, and such companies are also required to make deposit for the protection of their policy holders, etc. Under sections 4794-4798, inclusive, fraternal orders are defined and regulated orders, which make provision for sick and death benefits by assessment, and by section 4798 these orders are subject to the same rules, regulations, and supervisions as foreign insurance companies, except that they are not required to make the deposit or have the paid-up capital as in other companies. Having established these extended regulations, a violation of the same on the part of the companies is made a misdemeanor, under the following comprehensive statute (2 Revisal, c. 81, § 3484): "If any person shall assume to act as an insurance agent or insurance broker without license therefor, as required by law, or shall act in any manner in the negotiation or transaction of unlawful insurance with a foreign insurance company not admitted to do business in this state, or as principal or agent shall violate any provision of the law in regard to the negotiation or effecting of contracts of insurance, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be punished by a fine of not less than one hundred, nor more than five hundred dollars for each offense." Indicted under this section in form as above stated, it was made to appear on the trial that the Order of Owls is an association which seems to have had its origin in South Bend, Ind., consisting of the Home Nest, with power of self-perpetuation and operating under a plan by which branch nests may be and have been organized in large numbers in various sections of the country, under a form of by-laws, suggested by the Home Nest. These by-laws contain provision for sick and death benefits, but the rules or constitution established for the Home Nest do not profess to control the branch nest in this feature of benefits, except in section XXX, which is to the effect that each subordinate nest may pay death benefits to the executor, mother, wife, or child of a member who dies in good standing to an amount not exceeding $100. As showing the general nature of this organization, and the control and supervision vested in the Home Nest towards the subordinate nests, the following provisions appear in the constitution:

"I. This organization shall be named 'Order of Owls.' Its object the advancement of its members, socially, morally, intellectually and otherwise.

"II. This society shall consist of an organizer's branch and subordinate branches. The organizer's branch shall be known as 'Home Nest,' and the subordinate branches shall be respectively known as 'Nest No. _____'.

"III. The Home Nest shall consist of the organizers thereof or their successors elected by unanimous vote of the survivors to fill any vacancy caused by the death or resignation or removal of any member. No member of the Home Nest shall be expelled except on the unanimous vote of all other members thereof.

"IV. Branch nests shall consist of not less than 10 persons, and no male shall be a member of a branch having female members or vice versa.

* * * * *

"VIII. Each nest shall pay the 'Home Nest', for the support of the general organization, the sum of 10 cents per member quarterly at the end of each quarter for each member of the branch who was in good standing at any time during such quarter.

"XIV. The Supreme President may at any time revoke the charter of any nest or suspend for any length of time the existence of such nest, and in case of his doing so all the property and funds of the nest shall become the property of the Home Nest and be paid to it.

"XVII. The sum of $2.00 shall be remitted the Home Nest for each candidate initiated and $1.00 additional for each charter member.

"XVIII. The sole executive power of this organization shall be vested in the Home Nest and in the Supreme President when the Home Nest is not in session, including the right to grant dispensations of any and all kinds.

"XXVIII. The Supreme President shall designate the first place of holding all conventions. The Home Nest shall be at South Bend, Indiana, unless its members see fit to change it. Except as herein otherwise provided, the executive, legislative and all other powers of the Home Nest shall be vested in a trinity, consisting of the Supreme President, Secretary and Treas."

There was further testimony to the effect that the defendant, not having any license from the insurance commissioner, advertised and represented:

"(a) That the Order of Owls was there. (b) That he was their representative. (c) That the Order of Owls paid accident and death benefits. (d) He solicited people to come at once and join. (e) He gave a membership receipt to those who applied, and paid the required $5."

In view of this evidence, we concur in the ruling of the trial judge that, if the relevant facts were accepted by the jury, the defendant was guilty as charged in the bill of indictment. "He unlawfully assumed to act as insurance agent for the 'Order of Owls' represented by him to be a fraternal insurance order. He unlawfully engaged in negotiating for insurance in the 'Order of Owls,' a foreign fraternal insurance order, not admitted or licensed to do business in this state."

[2] It is urged that the first count of the bill is fatally defective, and no conviction can be had thereon, for that it contains no direct averment that the "Order of Owls" is a company subject to the insurance regulations, but in our opinion no such averment is required for a proper indictment and no such fact is essential to constitute the crime. The entire, certainly the chief, purpose of this legislation is to protect people from harmful imposition in contracts and dealings of this character, and the evil which the statute is designed to prevent is as threatening in the case of a bogus as a real company, perhaps more so. The language of the act relevant to the charges contained in the first count: "If any person shall assume to act as an insurance agent without a license therefor as required by law." The facts in evidence show that the defendant in his published advertisement and his cards circulated in the vicinity, in taking money and issuing receipts, assumed to be the agent of a company, paying sick and death benefits. His conduct comes within the permissible and proper meaning of the words used in the statute and clearly within the mischief contemplated, and the first count in the bill of indictment must be held sufficient. State v. Leeper, 146 N. C. 655, 61 S. E. 535; State v. Harrison, 145 N. C. 417, 59 S. E. 867. It was further contended that no conviction should be allowed in either count because it did not appear that any local nest was organized in the locality as stated, and, if otherwise, that the insurance feature was optional with the local nest. But on the facts in evidence neither position can be maintained. It appears that under the constitution these local nests, having the insurance features of death and sick benefits, have been organized in all portions of the country, doing business under by-laws furnished by the Home Nest, and in its scheme of government the authority of the Home Nest is so absolute and all-pervading that it must be judged and have its complexion and status fixed by what it sanctions and approves, and this condition may not be properly altered or affected because some particular nest does or does not adopt this insurance feature. According to defendant's cards by which persons were induced to apply for membership and pay their money, these are the relevant facts:

"Reasons why you should join the Order of Owls:

"1st. Order of Owls has sick and accident benefit of $8.00 per week.

"2nd. Order of Owls has $100.00 death benefit.

"3rd. Order of Owls furnished free physician for you and your family.

"4th. Order of Owls will help you to get a position when you are out of employment.

"5th. Order of Owls will help you in your business. They trade with each other.

"6th. Order of Owls furnish you social advantages.

"7th. The dues are 50 cents per month; no extra assessment.

"8th. After closing the charter the initiation fee in this city will be $25.00.

"9th. You will get in on the election of officers, if you join now, and are one of the leaders.

"10th. You do not have to take the initiation if you join now, and the total cost is only $5.00.

"Be a Leader!

"Hoo!

Join Now!

Hoo!

"The Order of Owls Is Here!

"The Order of Owls is more than six years old and have about 1,400 nests with a membership of nearly 200,000 in the United States, Canada, Alaska, Cuba, Mexico, Porto Rico, Philippines, Sandwich Islands, New Zealand, Australia and South Africa. The Order of Owls is made up of the

"Jolliest and Best Fellows on Earth."

[3] The company, therefore, which defendant assumed to represent, was a fraternal order, coming within sections 4795-4798 of Revisal, and in soliciting contracts and receiving money for it, when neither he nor his company had been properly licensed, defendant was guilty under the second count in the bill. The authorities relied upon by defendants, as far as examined, do not affect our conclusion. In some of them the bill was questioned because no overt act was charged, as in Fikes v. State, 87 Miss. 251, 39 South. 783. In others, as in State v. Campbell, 17 Ind. App. 442, 46 N. E. 944, the statute by correct interpretation was held to apply only to incorporated companies. In the case at bar the overt acts are fully set forth, and the law is not so restricted. Throughout the statute, in sections relevant to the inquiry, the words used are insurance companies, associations, and orders, and clearly contemplates both incorporated and unincorporated companies. This business of insurance and insurance companies has become of such great interest and importance that our statutes, as stated, have made extended regulations for its supervision and control. The department established for the especial purpose under the direction of its active and capable commissioner has done much valuable work in the protection of the people of the state, and in cases permitting constructions that interpretation should be adopted which is best promotive of the public policy and beneficent purpose of the law.

There is no error, and the judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

No error.

GARDNER & CLARK et al. v. MCCONNAUGHEY.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 20, 1911.)

1. EXEMPTIONS (§ 128*)—ALLOTMENT.

Report of appraisers appointed to appraise personal property prior to levy was void where none of the articles disclosed were specifically allotted to the defendant, as required by Revisal 1905, § 695.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Exemptions, Cent. Dig. § 157; Dec. Dig. § 128.*]

2. EXEMPTIONS (§ 128*)—LEVY—ALLOTMENT—TIME.

Under Revisal 1905, § 695, relating to execution, and providing that the officer shall make his levy on the entire personal estate subject to seizure, but, before he sells, he shall have so much of it set apart for the debtor within the limit of value as he may select, etc., the debtor is entitled to have his exemption ascertained up to and just before the process is executed by sale, the levy being subject to amendment before that time, and hence, in ascertaining the exemption, the debtor is not to be charged with articles which have been consumed or otherwise disposed of since the assessment, or with an increased deterioration in value since that date.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Exemptions, Cent. Dig. § 157; Dec. Dig. § 128.*]

3. EXEMPTIONS (§ 128*)—PERSONAL PROPERTY—LEVY—ALLOTMENT.

Where personal property of a debtor is sought to be subjected to a judgment, it must be first levied on, and then the debtor's personal property exemption allotted as prescribed by Revisal 1905, § 695; the debtor being entitled also to have such exemption reassigned whenever defendant's executions are levied.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Exemptions, Cent. Dig. § 157; Dec. Dig. § 128.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Burke County; Lane, Judge.

Action by Gardner & Clark and others against N. L. McConnaughey. Execution having been levied on certain of defendant's property and the court having refused to set aside an appraisement, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Spainhour & Mull, for appellant. J. T. Perkins and S. J. Ervin, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. Execution having been issued upon a judgment taken before a justice of the peace, the sheriff, without levying upon the personal property of the defendant, summoned a jury of appraisers, who filed an itemized valuation of such property, amounting to $740.62, and reported that, after deducting the $500 personal property exemption, the defendant possessed $240.62 of property which was subject to sale of execution, but without specifying and setting apart the articles which should be exempt from sale under the execution, as required by Revisal, § 697. The defendant filed exceptions to the report of the appraisers as provided by Revisal, § 699. At the term of the superior court next ensuing, the defendant moved to set aside the report of the appraisers as void, because it did not appear from the face thereof that there was any allotment of the articles set apart to the defendant as required by Revisal, § 697. The court refused to set aside the report, and directed the matter to be re-referred to the appraisers to specify the articles to be allotted to the defendant, and refused to direct that the allotment should be made out of articles possessed by the defendant at the time of said allotment. The ruling of the judge was, in effect, that the defendant should take as a part of the allotment the articles of personal property which should have been consumed since the first assessment.

[1, 2] The report was void because there were no articles specifically allotted to the defendant as his exemption, as required by Revisal, § 695. The judge further erred in directing that the defendant should be charged with the articles which had been consumed or otherwise disposed of since the assessment, and also ignored the fact that other articles may have increased or depreciated in value since that date. In Pate v. Harper, 94 N. C. 23, it was said: "We think the debtor is entitled to have his exemption ascertained up to and just before the process is executed by a sale. While the process is in the officer's hands in full activity, the preliminary action of the appraisers is not conclusive, but remains, in fieri, capable, at their instance, under the call of the officer, at least of correction and amendment. If property has been omitted which ought to have been put on the list, but was not known at the time to belong to the debtor, this could be done. The appraisers ought also to have the power, and we think do have it, to enlarge the exemption, so that none which should be exempt shall be sold from him. The mandate of the statute is that the officer shall make his levy upon the entire personal estate subject to seizure under execution, but, before he sells, to have so much of it set apart for the debtor within the limit of value, as he may select, and when insufficient, all being below the value, such selection is unnecessary." In Jones v. Alsbrook, 115 N. C. 46, 20 S. E. 170, the court quotes the above, and adds that the judgment debtor is entitled up to the last moment to have his exemption set apart before the sale, and that the same right belongs to the judgment creditor. There having been no levy, and the allotment not having been made at all, and it not appearing that the defendant was given the opportunity to select the articles, the report was fatally defective, and should have been set aside.

[3] It should be noted that there is a material difference between the allotment of the homestead under Revisal, § 687, which must be done "before levying upon the real estate," and as to which the levy must be only upon the excess, Revisal, § 692, and the allotment of the personal property exemption, for the personal property must be levied upon—that is, taken in possession by the officer—and the personal property exemption is then allotted in the manner provided by Revisal, § 695. The homestead exemption is permanent, unless there is a reallocation by reason of an increase in value in the manner provided by Revisal, § 691. But the personal property exemption is to be reassigned, whenever at subsequent dates executions are levied. The reason is that the realty is fixed and stable, whereas the articles of personal property may be increased or diminished in quantity between the levy of executions, especially so as to articles of food which are usually included in such exemptions. The report of the appraisers should have been set aside and the sheriff should proceed to levy his execution, and the personal property exemption must be allotted out of the personal property in the hands of the defendant at the time of such allotment; the articles being selected by the defendant as provided by the Code. In Campbell v. White, 95 N. C. 344, it was held: "Though the debtor's personal property exemption has been duly allotted, whenever it has been diminished by use, loss, or other cause, he has a right to have any other personal property he may have exempted up to the prescribed limit"—Smith, C. J., saying that the Constitution (article 10, § 1) is a continual mandate to the officer to leave so much of the debtor's personal estate untouched for his use, and, of course, the diminution from use, loss, or other cause must be replenished with other, if the debtor has such, up to the prescribed limits. It is plainly meant that, when any final process against the debtor's estate is to be enforced that much of his estate must be allowed to remain with him as not liable to sale.

Reversed.

Ex parte ALDERMAN.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 20, 1911.)

1. HABEAS CORPUS (§ 99*)—CUSTODY OF CHILDREN—GROUNDS.

The court, on habeas corpus to determine the custody of a child of divorced parents, is governed solely by what is for the best interests of the child, and, where the best interests of the child require that it shall remain in the custody of the mother, a judgment awarding her the custody is proper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Habeas Corpus, Cent. Dig. § 84; Dec. Dig. § 99.*]

2. DIVORCE (§ 326*)—FOREIGN JUDGMENT—FULL FAITH AND CREDIT.

The court must give full faith and credit to a judgment of the court of a sister state granting within its jurisdiction a divorce in a suit between citizens of the state and within the jurisdiction of the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 827-840; Dec. Dig. § 326.*]

3. DIVORCE (§ 332*)—FOREIGN JUDGMENT—FULL FAITH AND CREDIT—CUSTODY OF CHILD.

A judgment of a court of a sister state, which awards the custody of a child to the wife obtaining a divorce from her husband subject to the right of the husband to visit the child, and the child to visit the husband at reasonable times, has no extraterritorial effect, and the child, on becoming a citizen of North Carolina, is not under the control of the courts of the sister state, and such judgment is not entitled to full faith and credit, and in a contest for the custody of the child the courts of North Carolina are governed only by what is for the best interests of the child.

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; Webb, Judge.

Habeas corpus proceedings by William F. Alderman against Sarah E. Alderman to determine the custody of Hugh Alderman, an infant son of the parties. From a judgment awarding the custody to defendant, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

This is a proceeding in habeas corpus, instituted by the petitioner, Wm. F. Alderman, to determine the custody of Hugh Alderman, the infant son (four years of age) of petitioner and his former wife, the respondent, Sarah E. Alderman, who now resides with her child at Brevard, N. C. The cause was heard in the superior court of Buncombe county by his honor, Judge Webb, who made findings of fact and rendered judgment as follows:

"This cause coming on to be heard before the undersigned judge, Jas. L. Webb, and being heard upon the affidavits filed by both plaintiff and defendant, I find the following facts:

"(1) I find as a fact that W. F. Alderman and Sarah E. Alderman were married in the state of Florida about 7th day of June, 1899, and lived together as man and wife until about the ——— day of ———, 1909.

"(2) I find as a fact that during the years 1909 and 1910 W. F. Alderman abandoned Sarah E. Alderman, and thereupon, Sarah E. Alderman, who was then with her child, Hugh Alderman, visiting her parents in the state of North Carolina, instituted divorce proceedings in the courts of the state of Florida, alleging willful, continued, and obstinate desertion on the part of W. F. Alderman, and the said Sarah E. Alderman was on February 28, 1911, granted a divorce from the bonds of matrimony upon the ground of willful, continued, and obstinate desertion.

"(3) I find as a fact that during the relationship of man and wife, between the plaintiff and the defendant, there was born Hugh Alderman, the child in question, who is now a little more than four years of age.

"(4) I find as a fact that in the decree that was signed in the divorce proceedings in the state of Florida, rendered February 28, 1911, the following clause and paragraph appears: 'It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the complainant, Sarah E. Alderman, have and she is granted the custody of the child, Hugh Alderman, provided that the defendant, W. F. Alderman shall be allowed to visit said child at such times as may to the said Sarah E. Alderman seem reasonable, and the child, Hugh Alderman, may visit the defendant William F. Alderman at such times and under such circumstances and conditions as are reasonable and expedient, and the child may at least be permitted to visit said William F. Alderman for two weeks at a time every three months if the said William F. Alderman so desires or elects.'

"(5) I find as a fact that the child, Hugh Alderman, is a frail and delicate child, and that said child was at the time of the institution of the divorce proceedings in the state of Florida, and prior thereto, and has been at all times since, residing with its mother, Sarah E. Alderman, and grandparents, Rev. Paul F. Brown and wife, at Brevard, Transylvania county, N. C.

"(6) I find as a fact that the child's health is such that it would jeopardize it to carry it from the mountains of Western North Carolina to the state of Florida, especially during the warm season of the year.

"(7) I find as a fact that the mother of the child, Sarah E. Alderman, is an intelligent, refined, Christian woman, living with her parents, Rev. Paul F. Brown and wife at Brevard, N. C., and that Rev. Paul F. Brown is the pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Brevard, N. C.

"(8) I find as a fact that Sarah E. Alderman, the mother of Hugh Alderman, and her parents, Rev. Paul F. Brown and wife, the grandparents of Hugh Alderman, are people of sufficient means to properly care for and make comfortable and educate the child, and I further find that the moral welfare of the child, Hugh Alderman, is being well guarded.

"(9) I further find as a fact that prior to the institution of the divorce proceedings in the state of Florida by Sarah E. Alderman v. W. F. Alderman, and since said proceedings were instituted, and prior to and since the decree of separation and divorce was rendered therein, the said William F. Alderman had in his employ a stenographer, one Georgia V. Farmer, and that he became infatuated with said woman, conducting himself in a way not becoming a man of a family, with a living wife, that he showed the said Georgia Farmer many attentions in various ways, riding upon street cars with her, carrying her to restaurants, theaters, purchasing small articles of various kinds for her, taking trips with her on trains, visiting her boarding house, removing the photo of Sarah E. Alderman, his wife, from the locket on his watch chain, which locket contained the miniature photo of Sarah E. Alderman and one of their children, now dead, and placing in said locket the miniature of Georgia Farmer.

"I further find as a fact that William F. Alderman prior to the date of the decree in said divorce proceedings, and while the decree for alimony was being considered, had one Roena Floyd, a single woman, to deed to Georgia Farmer, his stenographer, for a nominal sum of $10, a house and lot in the city of Jacksonville, Fla., and the said deed was not registered until after said decree for divorce was signed, to wit, on March 23, 1911.

"I further find that after the institution of this suit in the superior court of Buncombe county to obtain the child Hugh Alderman the said William F. Alderman attempted to kidnap or get possession of the said Hugh Alderman by having a colored boy to secretly get him out of the possession of his mother, Sarah E. Alderman, carry him to Hendersonville, through the country, a distance of 20 miles, there to be turned over to William F. Alderman to be carried to the state of Florida.

"(10) I further find as a fact that William F. Alderman has no permanent place of abode, no settled home, in which to properly care for the child Hugh Alderman, and I further find as a fact that the said William F. Alderman is not a suitable person to have the care and custody of the child, Hugh Alderman, at this time.

"(11) I further find as a fact that Sarah E. Alderman, the mother of Hugh Alderman, is a fit and proper person to have the care and custody of Hugh Alderman, the child in question, in looking after the health, training, and moral development of the child.

"(12) I further find as a fact that Sarah E. Alderman does not object to W. F. Alderman visiting and being allowed to see the child, Hugh Alderman, under proper and reasonable conditions.

"The foregoing facts are found from the large number of affidavits, perhaps 50 or more, filed by both plaintiff and defendant, and from the facts appearing and found by me, I conclude as a matter of law:

"(1) That the court is of the opinion that this is not a proper case where the writ of habeas corpus will lie.

"(2) That if it is a case where such writ will lie, from the foregoing findings of fact, the court is of opinion that it is for the best interest of the child, Hugh Alderman, to be left in the possession of and under the care and custody of its mother, Sarah E. Alderman, and it is so ordered.

"(3) It is further ordered that W. F. Alderman be allowed to visit said child, Hugh Alderman, at the home of its mother at such times and under such conditions as the mother of said child may deem advisable.

"(4) It is further ordered that the prayer of the petitioner be and the same is hereby refused, and it is further ordered that the petitioner, W. F. Alderman, pay all the costs of this action to be taxed by the clerk of the superior court of Buncombe county."

D. L. English and Mark W. Brown, for appellant. Welch Galloway, for appellee.

BROWN, J. It appears from the findings of his honor that the petitioner and respondent were divorced by the courts of the state of Florida, where they resided in 1909 and 1910, at the instance of the respondent, upon the ground of willful, continued, and obstinate desertion by petitioner of his wife and only child, and the general custody of the child was awarded to the mother, who afterwards removed with her child to Brevard, N. C., where she now resides with her father.

[1] The custody of children in cases of the divorce and separation of their parents is a subject as delicate as any with which courts have to deal. The good of the child should be, and always is, the chief thing to be regarded and the governing principle which guides the judge. All other considerations sink into insignificance. Many cases and text-writers can be cited where the principle is announced that the physical, moral and spiritual welfare of the child is the only safe guide in cases of this kind; and the courts will be guided by those surroundings. In re Lewis, 88 N. C. 34; Jones v. Cotten, 108 N. C. 458, 18 S. E. 161; In re Turner, 151 N. C. 474, 66 S. E. 431; Hurd on Habeas Corpus, 528; Schouler on Dom. Rel. 248; 2 Bishop, M. & D. § 529; Umlauf v. Umlauf, 27 Ill. App. 378. One who reads the findings and the judgment of the just and learned judge who heard this matter in the court below must conclude that no other consideration than the child's welfare influenced his decision to remand the child to the care of its best friend, the mother. The love of the mother for her child, regardless of conditions and environments, has been proven by the history of the ages, and, while her devotion can be counted upon almost unfailingly, it is sad to say that sometimes the tie between father and child is a different matter, and requires the strong arm of the law to regulate it with some degree of humanity and tenderness for the child's good.

But the petitioner contends that under the Florida decree he has a vested right in the partial custody of the child, which this court is bound to respect and enforce under the full faith and credit clause of the federal Constitution. That part of the decree of the Florida court which petitioner invokes reads as follows: "W. F. Alderman shall be allowed to visit said child at such times as may to said Sarah E. Alderman seem reasonable, and the child, Hugh, may visit the defendant, W. F. Alderman at such times and under such circumstances and conditions as are reasonable and expedient, and said child may at least be permitted to visit W. F. Alderman for two weeks at a time, etc., if W. F. Alderman so desires." The language used would seem to indicate that the mother is expected to exercise careful supervision and control over the child, and that her consent or permission is necessary before the child can visit its father even for two weeks at a time. But nevertheless, if the language used was compulsory in its terms, that clause of the decree is not such a judgment of another state which the courts of this state are bound to enforce.

[2] All states and governments possess inherent power over the marriage relation, its formation and dissolution, as regards its own citizens, and, as both the husband and wife were citizens of Florida and properly before its courts as parties to the suit, we must give full faith and credit to the annulment of their marriage. Atherton v. Atherton, 181 U. S. 155, 21 Sup. Ct. 544, 45 L. Ed. 794; Haddock v. Haddock, 201 U. S. 563, 26 Sup. Ct. 525, 50 L. Ed. 867.

[3] But the infant child of their union is not property, and the father can have no vested right in the child or its services under a decree divorcing the parents. Such decree as to the child has no extraterritorial effect beyond the boundaries of the state where it was rendered. The child is now a citizen of North Carolina, and, as such peculiarly under its guardianship and the courts of this state will not remand it to the jurisdiction of another state, especially where, as in this case, it is so manifestly against the true interests of the child. "Minors are the wards of the nation, and even the control of them by parents is subject to the unlimited supervisory control of the state." 1 Tiedeman, State and Fed. Con. p. 325; Starnes v. Mfg. Co., 147 N. C. 559, 61 S. E. 528, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 602. In this case it is said: "The supreme right of the state to the guardianship of children controls the natural rights of the parent when the welfare of society or of the children themselves conflicts with parental rights." Therefore it follows that, when this child became a citizen and resident of this state and duly domiciled here, it is no longer under the control of the Florida courts. In the case of Frank Bort, 25 Kan. 308, 37 Am. Rep. 255, the full faith and credit clause of the federal Constitution was invoked by the petitioner in support of his supposed right under a decree in another state. Mr. Justice Brewer (afterwards of the Supreme Court of the United States) denied the correctness of such position, saying: "This claim seems to rest on the assumption that the parents have some property rights in the possession of their children, and is very justly repudiated by the courts of Massachusetts." 2 Bishop on Mar. & Div. (5th Ed.) 204. The same question was before the Kansas court again in 1885, and it held that the decree of the foreign court in no manner concluded other courts of the state where the child is then residing as to the best interests of the child. Avery v. Avery, 33 Kan. 1, 5 Pac. 419, 52 Am. Rep. 523, citing and approving In re Bort. To the same effect is the decision of the Court of Appeals of New York in People v. Allen, 105 N. Y. 628, 11 N. E. 143. In Wilson v. Elliott, 96 Tex. 474, 73 S. W. 946, 75 S. W. 368, 97 Am. St. Rep. 928, the same question was considered by the Supreme Court of Texas, and it was held that the decree of the court of another state awarding the custody of a child was not binding upon the courts of Texas under the full faith and credit clause of the federal Constitution after the child had become domiciled in Texas. The court says: "Were the subject-matter of the decree property or a matter in which the parents were solely concerned, the decree would, by reason of said article, be entitled to the effect which the trial court has given it. But neither of these propositions is true. The child is not in any sense property of the parents. It is also equally well established that the government has an interest in the welfare and consequently in the question of the custody and environments of the child, and to this the rights of the parents are entirely subordinate." See, also, Legate v. Legate, 87 Tex. 252, 28 S. W. 281; State v. Michel, 105 La. 741, 30 South. 122, 54 L. R. A. 927.

The judgment is affirmed.

ROBERTS v. PRATT.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 23, 1911.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 822*)—FOREIGN JUDGMENT—FRAUD—RES JUDICATA.

Where, after a judgment in South Dakota, a motion was made to set it aside for fraud and denied, such denial was res judicata, and precluded the defense of fraud to an action on the judgment in North Carolina.

2. JUDGMENT (§ 930*)—FOREIGN JUDGMENT—ACTION—COUNTERCLAIM.

In an action on a foreign judgment, defendant was entitled to plead as a counterclaim payments made since the rendition of the judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, McDowell County; Long, Judge.

Action between Grace Roberts and W. M. Pratt. Judgment for plaintiff for less than the relief demanded, and both parties appeal. Affirmed Civil action to recover on a judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff against defendant in the courts of South Dakota, tried before his honor, B. F. Long, and a jury at July term, 1911, superior court, McDowell county. Plaintiff declared on a judgment in her favor, rendered in the courts of South Dakota; said judgment having at the time jurisdiction of the cause and of the parties by personal service within that jurisdiction. Defendant answered, alleging fraud in the procurement of the judgment, and pleading a counterclaim by reason of payments and receipts bearing date since the rendition of the judgment.

The following issues were submitted and answered by the jury:

"(1) Is section No. 151, on page 594-5 of the Revised Code of South Dakota, the only statutory law of that state relating to remedies for setting aside judgments after the term?" (Answer dictated to stenographer. See page 55 of record.)

"(2) Was the judgment described in the complaint obtained by the fraud of the plaintiff, as alleged in the answer? Answer: Yes.

"(3) What amount, if any, has the defendant paid to plaintiff upon the judgment since the rendition thereof? Answer: $320.73.

"(4) What amount, if anything, has the defendant paid on note declared on in the South Dakota suit, and not included in the inquiry and pleadings in that suit, and now set up as a counterclaim in this action? Answer: $642.25."

The court, being of opinion that the matters involved on the issues of fraud had been determined by the judgment on a former appeal in the cause, set the verdict aside as to that issue, and entered judgment according to the facts as established by the verdict on the remaining issues. Defendant and plaintiff having duly excepted, appealed to this court.

W. T. Morgan, for plaintiff. Pless & Winborne, for defendant.

Defendant's Appeal.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The questions presented in this record have all been practically decided on a former appeal in the cause and reported. 152 N. C. 731, 68 S. E. 240. On that appeal it was held that, the issue of fraud having been decided against defendant on a motion made in the South Dakota court to set the judgment aside on that ground, defendant was precluded from raising a like question here. On this subject the former opinion is as follows: "This being the doctrine applicable on the facts as they now appear, the judgment of the Dakota court, as heretofore stated, denying the defendant's application to set aside the original judgment on the ground of fraud, will preclude all further inquiry on that question, and render said judgment an estoppel of record as to all matters embraced in the pleadings which may be considered as material to its rendition"—citing Turnage v. Joyner, 145 N. C. 81, 58 S. E. 757; Manufacturing Co. v. Moore, 144 N. C. 527, 57 S. E. 213, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 734, 119 Am. St. Rep. 983; Tuttle v. Harrell, 85 N. C. 456.

There are no new facts in any way bearing on this position, except the fact established that the statutes of South Dakota make provision substantially similar to our own in reference to setting aside a judgment for "mistake, surprise, or excusable neglect." As we endeavored to show on a former appeal, a motion to set aside a judgment by reason of facts alleged in this application would have been entertained at common law, and the statute puts no restrictions, certainly, on this power as formerly exercised in the common-law courts, except to require that the motion should be made within 12 months from the rendition of the judgment. In other respects the statutory provision contemplates and includes a motion on facts of the character presented in this hearing. Bronson v. Schulten, 104 U. S. 410, 26 L. Ed. 797; Bennett v. Jackson, 34 W. Va. 62, 11 S. E. 734; Craig v. Wroth, 47 Md. 281.

There is no error, and the judgment must be affirmed.

No error.

Plaintiff's Appeal.

[2] The plaintiff appeals, alleging errors in allowing the amounts allowed defendant in his counterclaim. These amounts consisted of alleged payments by defendant, made since the rendition of the judgment, as indicated in the verdict in the third issue, and amounts received by defendant or his agent from rents of property in South Dakota, for which plaintiff was accountable, as ascertained and determined in the fourth issue. These amounts were largely dependent on disputed matters of fact. They were not allowed or considered in the proceedings in South Dakota, by which the original judgment was obtained. On the facts as now presented, they come clearly within the principle sustained in the case of Tyler v. Capehardt, 125 N. C. 64, 34 S. E. 108, stated as follows: "(1) A judgment is decisive of the points raised by the pleadings, or which might be properly predicated upon them; but does not embrace any matters which might have been brought into the litigation, or causes of action which the plaintiff might have joined, but which in fact are neither joined nor embraced by the pleadings. (2) Although the present cause of action might have been set up as a second cause of action in a former suit, but was not, and was not actually litigated, and was not 'such matter as was necessarily implied therein,' the plea of res judicata will not avail."

We find no error that would justify us in disturbing the judgment, and the same is in all respects affirmed.

No error.

STATE v. DAVIS.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 20, 1911.)

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 242*)—DISCRIMINATION—CLASSIFICATION OF SUBJECTS.

Revised 1908, § 3712a, provides that any person who shall loan money on any article of furniture and reserve a greater rate of interest than 6 per cent. either before or after such interest shall accrue shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. Held, that the Legislature had power to classify lenders so as to place those loaning money on household and kitchen furniture in a separate class, and the statute was not in violation of the fourteenth amendment of the federal Constitution as discriminatory, and depriving such lenders of the equal protection of the laws.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 691; Dec. Dig. § 242.*]

2. USURY (§ 149*)—OFFENSES—ELEMENTS.

Under Revisal 1908, § 3712a, making it a misdemeanor for any person to charge more than 6 per cent. for loans on household and kitchen furniture, where defendant, for a loan of $10, took a note for $16.75 secured by a mortgage on household and kitchen furniture worth at least $25, reserving at the time the money was supplied $1.75 to pay interest in advance for 30 days, he was guilty of violating the act, notwithstanding the actual amount of the loan had not been repaid on a sale of the furniture.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Usury, Cent. Dig. §§ 441, 442; Dec. Dig. § 149.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Forsyth County; Lyon, Judge.

J. J. Davis was convicted of taking unlawful interest, and he appeals. Affirmed.

There was evidence on the part of the state tending to show that on or about October 24, 1910, John Wolff, desiring to borrow $10, applied to one A. R. Bridgers, who was lending money for defendant; that the said Bridgers, with the knowledge, assent, and direction of defendant, advanced to said Wolff $8.25, taking his note to himself as attorney for defendant in the sum of $16.75 payable in 30 days, and to secure same took a chattel mortgage on the household and kitchen furniture of said Wolff; that the property included in the mortgage had originally cost about $75, and was worth at the time the mortgage was executed about $25; that Wolff paid on the debt $3.50, and, default having been made, the property was seized under claim and delivery and sold at public auction for $10.45. "The auctioneer cost $1, costs claim and delivery $3 or $4, credit on mortgage about $4, and, after applying proceeds as indicated, there was balance claimed by defendant of about $2.50." There was evidence on part of defendant tending to show that there were claims included in the mortgage other than the money loaned, and that the usurious features of the transaction were without the knowledge or approval of the defendant. On a charge correctly stating the law as declared in the statute there was verdict "Guilty." Judgment, and defendant excepted and appealed.

L. M. Swink, for appellant. The Attorney General and Geo. L. Jones, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts as above).
[1] The statute law of the state more directly relevant to the question presented (Revisal 1908, § 3712a), among other things, makes provision as follows: "If any person, firm or corporation who shall or may loan money in any manner whatsoever by note, chattel mortgage, conditional sale or otherwise, upon any articles of household or kitchen furniture, shall take, receive, reserve or charge a greater rate of interest than six per cent. either before or after such interest shall accrue * * * shall be guilty of a misdemeanor," etc. Under a charge which correctly states the provisions of the statute, the jury have found that usurious interest has been charged by defendant; that the obligation was secured by a mortgage on the household and kitchen furniture of the debtor. There is ample evidence to justify the verdict, and the conviction must be upheld if the statute itself is a valid law. It is insisted for the defendant that the statute is in contravention of the fourteenth amendment to the federal Constitution, in that it "unlawfully divides money lenders into two classes, those lending on household and kitchen furniture and on other kinds of property, and unlawfully discriminates against borrowers, putting borrowers, having only one class of property, to wit: household and kitchen furniture, into a class different from the borrower having other kinds of property to offer," but the position cannot in our opinion be maintained. The power of the Legislature to make the taking of usury under certain conditions a criminal offense is well recognized (Ex parte Edward Berger, 193 Mo. 16, 90 S. W. 759, 3 L. R. A. [N. S.] 530, 112 Am. St. Rep. 472; State v. Wickenhoefer, 6 Pennewill [Del.] 120, 64 Atl. 273); and the right of classification, in the enforcement of reasonable and proper police regulations on this and other subjects, is referred, very largely, to legislative discretion.

In Insurance Co. v. Daggs, 172 U. S. 562, 19 Sup. Ct. 282, 43 L. Ed. 552, the Supreme Court of the United States, the court having, with us, the final word on this subject, referred to this right of classification as follows: "It is not necessary to state the reasoning upon which classification by legislation is based or justified. This court has had many occasions to do so, and only lately reviewed the subject in Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Savings Bank, 170 U. S. 283, 18 Sup. Ct. 594, 42 L. Ed. 1037. We said in that case that 'the state may distinguish, select, and classify objects of legislation, and necessarily the power must have a wide range of discretion.' And this because of the function of legislation and the purposes to which it is addressed. Classification for such purposes is not invalid because not depending on scientific or marked differences in things or persons or in their relations. It suffices if it is practical, and is not reviewable unless palpably arbitrary"—the limitation being that "the classification has been made on some reasonable ground, something that bears a just and proper relation to the attempted classification, and is not a mere arbitrary selection." Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Ellis, 165 U. S. 151, 17 Sup. Ct. 255, 41 L. Ed. 666, Morris-Scarboro Co. v. Express Co., 146 N. C. 170, 59 S. E. 667, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 983, and numerous and repeated decisions of that court are in affirmance and illustration of this principle. Avenue Coach Co. v. New York City, 221 U. S. 467, 31 Sup. Ct. 709, 55 L. Ed. 815; Lindsley v. Gas Co., 220 U. S. 61, 31 Sup. Ct. 337, 55 L. Ed. 369; Engel v. O'Malley, 219 U. S. 123, 31 Sup. Ct. 190, 55 L. Ed. 128; Bank v. Kansas, 219 U. S. 121, 31 Sup. Ct. 189, 55 L. Ed. 123; McLean v. Arkansas, 211 U. S. 540, 29 Sup. Ct. 206, 53 L. Ed. 315; Heath & Milligan Manufacturing Co. v. Worst, 207 U. S. 338, 28 Sup. Ct. 114, 52 L. Ed. 236; N. Y. v. Van De Carr, 199 U. S. 552, 26 Sup. Ct. 144, 50 L. Ed. 305; Soon Hing v. Crowley, 113 U. S. 704, 5 Sup. Ct. 730, 28 L. Ed. 1145. In Coach Co. v. N. Y., supra, it was held: "Classification based on reasonable distinctions is not an unconstitutional denial of equal protection of the laws; and so held that an ordinance of the city of New York prohibiting advertising vehicles in a certain street is not unconstitutional as denying equal protection to a transportation company operating stages on such street either because signs of the owners may be displayed on business wagons, or because another transportation company may display advertising signs on its structure. There is a purpose to be achieved, as well as a distinction, which justifies the classification." In Lindsley v. Gas Co. the court again said: "The equal protection clause of the fourteenth amendment admits of a wide exercise of discretion, and only avoids classification which is purely arbitrary, being without reasonable basis. Nor does a classification having some reasonable basis offend because not made with mathematical accuracy or resulting in some inequality." And in Engle v. O'Malley, supra, it is said, approving the same statement in Heath & Milligan Co. v. Worst, 207 U. S. 338, 28 Sup. Ct. 114, 52 L. Ed. 236: "That legislation which regulates business may well make distinctions depend upon the degree of evil, and although, when size is not an index, a law may not discriminate between the great and the small, proper regulations based thereon, when size is an index of the evil to be prevented, do not offend the equal protection clause of the fourteenth amendment." In McLean v. Arkansas, 211 U. S. 540, 29 Sup. Ct. 206, 53 L. Ed. 315, supra, a regulation establishing a different method of mining coal, by which the wages of laborers were to be ascertained between miners when less than 10 miners were employed and those having a larger number, was implied. And on this very subject of usury and in Berger's

Case, supra, differing penal provisions were upheld in case of ordinary usury and when the charge was greater than 2 per cent. per month. And in Wickenhoefer's Case, supra, between loans not exceeding $100 and loans of that sum or greater. If these various classifications have been sustained by our highest court, assuredly a law designed and intended to protect and maintain the home of the citizen should be upheld. If the schools of thought which tend to corrupt and undermine, if the forces which make for disorder and anarchy should ever be able to combine and so far increase as to threaten our social fabric, it is the home, the influences that hallow and emanate from it, which will arise and be potent to save. Referring to this subject as a proper basis for classification, our Attorney General in his argument before us has well said: "Prior to the adoption of the present Constitution, household and kitchen furniture to the value of $200 was exempt from execution. The lawmaking power of this state has always realized that the loss of those articles necessary for comfortable and decent living entails great suffering upon women and children, frequently resulting in the breaking up of a home, and in the creation of conditions which are a menace to the public health and to the public prosperity. The statute under consideration is a logical and lawful extension of the protection which it has always been the policy of the law to afford this peculiar class of property. The General Assembly knew that the man who mortgages his household goods does so because he has nothing else to mortgage. He is the poor man, the illiterate man, and his poverty and his ignorance make him the easy prey of the usurer. The General Assembly also knew that in some of the cities of the state there were springing up a class of men who were selling money, like furniture, on the installment plan. It was to save the things necessary to the existence of a home from the grasp of such men that the act of 1907 was passed. We submit that the statute tends to preserve the domestic peace, to promote the family health and prosperity, and is a valid exercise of the police power of the state. It is not class legislation. It operates alike on all who take mortgages on household and kitchen furniture. It regulates a business, and does not create a class."

[2] It was further contended that, inasmuch as the property on its sale had not repaid the actual amount of the loan, no usury had been received, and therefore no violation of the statute had been established—citing Rushing v. Bivins, 132 N. C. 273, 43 S. E. 798. That was an action by the debtor to recover a penalty allowed by the statute of "twice the amount of usury paid," and the court held, in effect, that, to justify a recovery, it must be made to appear that usurious interest had been paid in money or money's worth, and a note of the debtor, given therefor, did not amount to such payment. The case does not apply here, when the statute makes it a misdemeanor to take, receive, reserve or charge a greater rate than 6 per cent. The evidence of the state tends to establish that "for a loan of $10 a note of $16.75 was taken, secured by a mortgage on household and kitchen furniture, worth at least $25," which would constitute an usurious transaction within the meaning of the statute (5 A. & E. p. 886), citing Bank v. Wareham Co., 49 N. Y. 635, and, in any event, it appears, further, that on a loan of $10 for 80 days $1.75 was reserved at the time the money was supplied. There is no error, and the judgment must be affirmed.

No error.

BATEMAN v. HOPKINS.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 20, 1911.)

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 110*)—CONTRACTS FOR SALE OF REAL ESTATE—DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY.

A memorandum, which recites the receipt of money to confirm the bargain on the purchase of the farm on which the signer lives, sufficiently describes the land to be conveyed within the statute of frauds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. §§ 225-236; Dec. Dig. § 110.*]

2. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 108*)—CONTRACTS FOR SALE OF REAL ESTATE—CONSIDERATION.

A memorandum of a contract to convey land is good under the statute of frauds, though it does not express the consideration, which may be shown by parol.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. §§ 214-221; Dec. Dig. § 108.*]

3. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 101*)—CONDITIONS PRECEDENT—TENDER OF PAYMENT—WAIVER.

Where a vendor repudiates the contract, and thereby indicates that a tender of the price will be refused, tender of payment by the purchaser before suing for specific performance is unnecessary, but it is enough that he is ready and willing and offers in his pleading to perform.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 290, 295; Dec. Dig. § 101.*]

4. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§§ 147, 148, 169, 170*)—CONTRACTS—PERFORMANCE.

Where stipulations in a contract for the sale and purchase of real estate are mutual and dependent, an actual tender and demand by one party is necessary to put the other party in default and to cut off his right to treat the contract as still subsisting, and, where time is of the essence, the tender and demand must be made on the day named.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 285-295, 343-348; Dec. Dig. §§ 147, 148, 169, 170.*]

5. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 101*)—CONTRACTS ENFORCEABLE—CONDITIONS PRECEDENT.

Where a vendor waives tender of performance by his repudiation of the contract, the purchaser, ready, able, and willing to comply with the contract, may compel specific performance, and the vendor may not then put the purchaser in default by tendering a deed and demanding the price which the purchaser is unable to produce at the time of demand.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 290, 295; Dec. Dig. § 101.*]

6. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 130*)—CONTRACTS FOR SALE OF REAL ESTATE—JUDGMENT.

The court, decreeing specific performance of a contract to convey real estate after the vendor has repudiated the contract and waived tender of performance, should require the purchaser to pay the price due into court within a reasonable time to be fixed, and, on his failure to do so, his right to specific performance will be denied; but, where he performs on or before the last day named, the vendor must execute a valid deed of the premises.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 424, 425; Dec. Dig. § 130.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Tyrrell County; O. H. Allen, Judge.

Action by W. E. Bateman against E. B. Hopkins. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

This action was brought to compel the specific performance of a contract to convey land, by the vendee against the vendor. The memorandum is as follows: "Received of W. E. Bateman five dollars to confirm the bargain on the purchase of the farm on which I now live. This January 8, 1910. [Signed] E. B. Hopkins."

The defendant alleged that the memorandum was as follows: "Received of W. E. Bateman $5.00 to confirm the bargain on the purchase of the farm on which I now live, and if I fail to make the said W. E. Bateman a deed, then I will pay his $5.00 back and $5.00 more, making in all $10.00."

The jury returned the following verdict: "(1) Did the defendant execute the contract set out in the complaint? Answer: Yes. (2) Did the plaintiff, Bateman, tender the defendant, Hopkins, the $1,000 part purchase money of the lands described in the complaint? Answer: No. (3) If not, was it waived by defendant, Hopkins? Answer: Yes. (4) Was the plaintiff, Bateman, ready, willing, and able to pay off the indebtedness of said Hopkins to J. C. Meekins, Sr., and to pay the defendant, Hopkins, in addition, the $1,000 balance of the purchase money? Answer: Yes. (5) What is the yearly rental value of the same? Answer: $150." The court, after refusing a new trial, rendered judgment upon the verdict for the plaintiff, and defendant appealed.

M. Majette and E. F. Aydlott, for appellant. W. M. Bond, I. M. Meekins, and M. H. Tillitt, for appellee.

WALKER, J. It will be seen that, upon the issue as to the contents of the memorandum, the jury decided in favor of the plaintiff, and we must therefore consider the case with reference to the contract as it is alleged in the complaint.

[1] We do not entertain any doubt as to the sufficiency of the memorandum under the statute of frauds, as it has been construed in our decisions. "Every deed of conveyance (or contract) must set forth a subject-matter, either certain in itself, or capable of being reduced to a certainty, by a recurrence to something extrinsic to which it refers." Gaston, J., in Massey v. Belisle, 24 N. C. 170. In Carson v. Ray, 52 N. C. 609, 78 Am. Dec. 287, the deed described the land as, "My house and lot in the town of Jefferson, Ashe county, N. C."; and the court, with reference to this description, said: "A house and lot, or one house and lot in a particular town, would not do, because too indefinite on the face of the instrument itself. See Plummer v. Owens, 45 N. C. 254; Murdock v. Anderson, 57 N. C. 77. But 'my house and lot' imports a particular house and lot, rendered certain by the description that it is one which belongs to me, and upon the face of the instrument is quite as definite as if it had been described as the house and lot in which I now live, which is undoubtedly good." See Blow v. Vaughan, 105 N. C. 199, 10 S. E. 891; Farmer v. Batts, 83 N. C. 387. To the same effect is the language of the court in Manufacturing Co. v. Hendricks, 106 N. C. 485, 11 S. E. 568: "No decree, however, for specific performance can be granted the defendant unless 'his land where he now lives' (the descriptive words of the receipt) is fully identified by competent testimony. These words are clearly susceptible of being applied to a particular well-defined tract of land—id certum est, quod certum reddi potest—and, if the defendant can supply the requisite proof, he will be entitled to relief."

[2] It is further objected that the consideration is not expressed in the memorandum; but it is well settled that this is not required, and it may be shown by oral evidence. Miller v. Irvine, 18 N. C. 103; Thornburg v. Masten, 88 N. C. 293; Manufacturing Co. v. Hendricks, supra; Hall v. Misenheimer, 137 N. C. 183, 49 S. E. 104, 107 Am. St. Rep. 474. In Gordon v. Collett, 102 N. C. 532, 9 S. E. 486, a simple receipt of a sum of money, in part payment of a certain tract of land described in the paper, was held to be sufficient. There was evidence in the case identifying the land and fixing the amount of the consideration. This action is by the vendee against the vendor. It was not necessary, therefore, for the memorandum to set forth the obligation of the vendee to pay the price. There is a difference, as we have often said, between the consideration necessary to support a contract, which was required at common law before the statute of frauds was adopted and is still required, and the promise of the vendee to pay the purchase money, which must be stated in the writing in order to bind him, if he is sued and is, therefore, the party to be charged. Hall v. Misenheimer, supra; Brown v. Hobbs, 154 N. C. 544, 70 S. E. 906. "Under the statute of frauds, a contract, in writing, to sell land, signed by the vendor, is good against him, although the correlative obligation of the buyer to pay the price is not in writing and cannot be enforced against him." Mizell v. Burnett, 49 N. C. 249, 69 Am. Dec. 744. See, also, Improvement Co. v. Guthrie, 116 N. C. 382, 21 S. E. 952. As the vendee is suing in this case, he agrees to perform the contract, and therefore waives the benefit of the statute, or rather is not seeking to rely upon it.

[3] The overshadowing question in this case is whether the plaintiff has made a proper tender or been relieved therefrom by the conduct of the defendant, and, if so relieved, whether he has been ready, willing, and able to perform his part of the contract. As to the first question, the jury have found, upon sufficient evidence, as we think, that the defendant waived a tender of the purchase price by the plaintiff, not only by his conduct, but by denying the contract and refusing to comply with its terms. The denial and refusal continued to the very time of the trial. The court did not order a sale of the land, but required the defendant to execute a deed for the same and deposit it with the clerk of the court, and the latter to deliver it to the plaintiff upon his paying into court the money due under the contract, and otherwise complying fully with its terms and conditions on his part. Where the vendor has repudiated the agreement, thus making it appear that, if the tender were made, its acceptance would be refused, tender or offer of payment by the vendee before suit is unnecessary. Equity does not require a useless formality. 36 Cyc. 705. In general the rules of equity concerning the necessity of an actual tender are not so stringent as those of the law.

[4] The following are special rules upon the subject, which seem to be settled: "(1) An actual tender by the plaintiff is unnecessary when, from the acts of the defendant or from the situation of the property, it would be wholly nugatory. Thus, if defendant has openly refused to perform, the plaintiff need not make a tender or demand; it is enough that he is ready and willing and offers to perform in his pleading. Hunter v. Daniel, 4 Hare, 420, 433; Mattocks v. Young, 66 Me. 459, 467; Crary v. Smith, 2 N. Y. 60, 65; Kerr v. Purdy, 50 Barb. [N. Y.] 24; Maxwell v. Pittenger, 3 N. J. Eq. 156; White v. Dobson, 58 Va. 262; Brock v. Hidy, 13 Ohio St. 306, 310; Brown v. Eaton, 21 Minn. 409, 411; Gill v. Newell, 13 Minn. 462, 472 [Gil. 430]; Deichmann v. Deichmann, 49 Mo. 107; Gray v. Dougherty, 25 Cal. 266, 280, 281. (2) Where the stipulations are mutual and dependent—that is, where the deed is to be delivered upon the payment of the price—an actual tender and demand by one party is necessary to put the other in default, and to cut off his right to treat the contract as still subsisting. Hubbell v. Von Schoening, 49 N. Y. 326, 331; Leaird v. Smith, 44 N. Y. 618; Van Campen v. Knight, 63 Barb. [N. Y.] 205; Irvin v. Bleakley, 67 Pa. 24, 28; Crabtree v. Levings, 53 Ill. 526." Where time is essential or of the essence of the contract, the tender and demand must be made on the day named, and a fortiori where it is stipulated that if tender and demand are not made by one of the parties at the time specified, the other party may treat the contract as at an end. When time is not essential, another rule has been adopted in a group of decisions, which is said to be more in accordance with principles of equity, viz., that in such contracts an actual tender or demand by the plaintiff prior to the suit is not essential. It is enough that he was ready and willing, and offered, at the time specified, and even that he is ready and willing at the time of bringing the suit, unless his rights have been lost by laches, and that he offers to perform in his pleading. The plaintiff's performance will be provided for in the decree, and his previous neglect will only affect his right to costs. The foregoing principles are considered in 4 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. (3d Ed.) § 1407, and note, at page 2776, where a full citation of the authorities will be found. See, also, Pomeroy on Contracts, §§ 360-364. The general rule is thus stated by Pomeroy, in section 1407: "The doctrine is fundamental that either of the parties seeking a specific performance against the other must show, as a condition precedent to his obtaining the remedy, that he has done or offered to do, or is then ready and willing to do, all the essential and material acts required of him by the agreement at the time of commencing the suit, and also that he is ready and willing to do all such acts as shall be required of him in the specific execution of the contract according to its terms."

[5] But in this case the tender of the money was waived by the defendant, and the jury have found that the plaintiff was ready, able, and willing to comply with his part of the contract. If he was not, in the sense that he did not have the money under his control and within his reach, so that he could put his hands on it and pay it over to the defendant at any moment, the defendant has not put him in default by tendering a deed for the land, thus "cutting off plaintiff's right to treat the contract as still existing," as said above. How can the defendant be hurt, in that respect, by the judgment of the court? The payment of the money is assured, for the plaintiff must pay it into court before he is entitled to receive the deed. This subject was fully discussed in Harris v. Greenleaf, 117 Ky. 817, 79 S. W.

267, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 1940, and also reported, with an elaborate and useful note, in 4 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. at page 849. The court there held that it was not necessary to allege a tender or to bring the money into court upon filing the bill, and said: "In Hunter v. Daniel, 4 Hare, 420, a case very much like this one in lacking a tender by the plaintiff before suit brought for specific performance, the argument was submitted that payment was a condition precedent to the right of the plaintiff to call for the execution of the agreement, and it was argued that the bill could not properly be filed before the plaintiff had, out of court, fully performed his agreement. The court responded: 'The general rule in equity certainly is not of that strict character. A party filing a suit submits to do everything that is required of him, and the practice of the court is not to require the party to make a formal tender, where, as in this case, from the facts stated in the bill, or from the evidence, it appears that the tender would have been a mere form and that the party to whom it was made would have refused to accept the money.' " The same ruling was made in Webster v. French, 11 Ill. 254, where the court said: "The result of my examination of this subject clearly shows that the court of chancery is not bound down by any fixed rule on this subject, by which it will allow the substantial ends of justice to be perverted or defeated by the omission of an unimportant or useless act, which nothing but the merest technicality could require. The money may, at any time, be ordered to be brought into court, whenever the rights of the opposite party may require it; but while he is insisting that the money is not his, and that he is not bound to accept it, it would seem to be a matter of no great consequence to him whether it is in the custody of the court or not. The court possesses a liberal and enlarged discretion on this subject, by the proper exercise of which the rights of all parties may be protected. * * * It is time enough for the party to bring the purchase money into court, when he is called upon to do so." Lord Chancellor Hardwick said, in Vernon v. Stephens, 2 P. Wms. 66: "If the defendant has his money and interest and costs, he will have no reason to complain of having suffered; on the contrary, it would be a very great hardship on the plaintiff to lose all the money he has paid. Lapse of time in payment may be recompensed with interest and costs. And as to these agreements they were all intended only as a security for payment of the money, which end is answered by the payment of principal, interest and costs."

The weight of authority is that it is unnecessary for the purchaser to pay the money into court at the time he commences his suit. It is sufficient for him to plead a tender of the purchase money and to offer by his bill to bring in his money, whenever the same is liquidated and he has a decree for performance. Johnson v. Sukeley, 2 McLean, 562, Fed. Cas. No. 7,414; Mason v. Atkins, 73 Ark. 491, 84 S. W. 630; Kerr v. Hammond, 97 Ga. 567, 25 S. E. 337; Webster v. French, 11 Ill. 254; Hunter v. Bales, 24 Ind. 299. See, also, Lamprey v. St. Paul, etc., R. Co., 86 Minn. 509, 91 N. W. 29; Birdsall v. Waldron, 2 Edw. Ch. (N. Y.) 315. The purchaser, if he offers in his bill to perform, may maintain a suit for specific performance, though he made no tender of the purchase money before the suit, where he shows that the vendor would have refused the tender if it had been made. Stewart v. Cross, 66 Ala. 22; Jenkins v. Harrison, 66 Ala. 345; Root v. Johnson, 99 Ala. 90, 10 South. 293; Dargin v. Cranson, 12 Colo. App. 368, 55 Pac. 619; Ebert v. Arends, 190 Ill. 221, 60 N. E. 211; Tyler v. Onzts, 93 Ky. 331, 20 S. W. 258, 14 Ky. Law Rep. 321; Deichmann v. Deichmann, 49 Mo. 107; Christiansen v. Aldrich, 30 Mont. 446, 76 Pac. 1007; Connely v. Haggarty, 65 N. J. Eq. 596, 56 Atl. 371; Selleck v. Tallman, 87 N. Y. 106. In Cheney v. Libby, 134 U. S. 68, 10 Sup. Ct. 498, 33 L. Ed. 818, it was held that the discretion which the court has to decree specific performance may be controlled by the conduct of the party who refuses to perform the contract because of the failure of the other party to strictly comply with its conditions. If the vendor notifies the purchaser that he regards the contract as forfeited, and that he will not receive any money from him, the latter is not required, as a condition of his right to specific performance, to make tender of the purchase price. It is sufficient if he offer in his bill to bring the money into court. In a case involving the question of tender of performance by the party seeking relief in equity, and analogous to this, the court said: "This, being a proceeding in equity, will be governed by rules and principles prevalent in those courts where relief of that character is prayed. Among those rules, having application here, is one to be presently mentioned. The true meaning of the rule whose frequency of invocation would seemingly argue a better knowledge of its import, that 'he who seeks equity, must do equity,' is simply this: That, where a complainant comes before a court of conscience invoking its aid, such aid will not be granted except upon equitable terms. These terms will be imposed 'as the price of the decree it gives him.' The rule 'decides nothing in itself,' for you must first inquire what are the equities which the plaintiff must do in order to entitle him to the relief he seeks. * * * The above are only a few out a large number of examples which might be cited in illustration of the rule referred to, which finds its application, not in questions of pleading, nor by what the plaintiff offers to do therein, but in the form and frame of the orders and decrees, both interlocutory and final, whereby equitable terms are imposed as a condition precedent to equitable relief granted." Wheeler v. Reilly, 61 Mo. 565. See, also, Campbell v. Lombardo, 153 Ala. 489, 44 South. 862.

[6] The general and clear result of the best-considered authorities is that the vendor, especially when he has been and is in default himself, or when he has denied or repudiated the contract, cannot insist upon the failure to tender the money or to bring it into court for the purpose of performance, but will be left to such protection as the court can afford in the decree, which will be shaped so as to carry out the purposes of the contract fairly and equitably, without any great regard for technicalities; the object being to do justice to both parties without unnecessarily sacrificing the rights of either. This is the wisest and safest doctrine. In this case, the defendant will be fully protected in the enjoyment of every right he should have by requiring the payment of the money into court for his benefit, before he is called upon to part with his deed. This is all he has a right to expect under the circumstances. The decree in this case conforms to established precedents, except, perhaps, in one respect, and that objection to it can be cured by amendment. It should have set a time, say 60 days after the adjournment of the court, for the payment of the money into court by the plaintiff, and then directed, if it was not paid by the expiration of that time, the suit should be dismissed with costs, which, of course, would deny to the plaintiff any right to an enforcement of the contract, by reason of his own default after notice and reasonable time to pay or perform his part of the agreement. The plaintiff must not have any order for the sale of the land, but, in such a case as this, should be made to perform strictly according to the terms of the contract. If he asks equity, he must do equity. The court, in Webster v. French, supra, referring to this matter, said: "In Bourke v. Bocquet, 1 Desaus. [S. C.] 142, which was a bill for a specific performance, it does not appear that either a tender or a deposit in court of the purchase money was made, and yet it was decreed 'that it be referred to the master, to state and report what is the balance due on the contract in the bill mentioned, and that on the payment thereof, with interest, and of the costs of the suit, within one month from this day, the defendant execute title to the complainant in the bill. From the brevity with which this case is reported, we cannot learn its particular circumstances; but the decision itself shows that the suit might be maintained without a deposit of the purchase money. The suit of Louthler v. Anderson, 1 Bro. Ch. R. 347, was of the same character, and, upon a rehearing before the chancellor, 'his lordship varied the decree, in the manner prayed, by ordering it to be referred to the master to appoint a short day for the payment of the money, and to compute subsequent interest till that time, and if, upon a tender of a sufficient conveyance, the principal money and interest should not then be paid, the plaintiff's bill to be dismissed (as against defendant), with costs.' Here is the same case, of time given to the complainant, even beyond the hearing, for the payment of the purchase money." And in Whelan v. Bally, supra, the court thus refers to the subject: "The objection was made, in Quin v. Brittain, 1 Hoff. Ch. [N. Y.] 353, that in the bill (which was substantially a bill to redeem) there was no offer to pay the amount due. But it was held that this was not essential, and the reasons given were that on such a bill no decree would go for the payment of the amount personally; that, if the amount found due were not paid, there would be a decree for dismissal of the bill, which would operate as a foreclosure. Bishop of Winchester v. Paine, 11 Vesey, 194."

The other exceptions of the defendant have received our careful scrutiny and found to be without merit, in view of our decision upon the principal matters. We must not be construed as implying that there was error in any of the rulings to which exceptions were taken; but, if there was, it does not call for a reversal of the judgment.

The court below will modify its decree substantially as follows: Require the plaintiff to pay the money due into court and otherwise to comply with his part of the contract, within a reasonable time, to be fixed by the court, and, upon his failure to do so, his right to specific performance to be denied and the action dismissed; but if he does perform, on or before the last day named, that the defendant execute a good and sufficient deed for the premises, properly acknowledged or proven, and deposit it with the clerk of the court, at a time to be named, to be delivered to the plaintiff, and, when this is done, the money so deposited in court shall be paid to the defendant. As the defendant is in default, the court properly taxed him with the costs.

No error.

BUCKNER v. SOUTH & W. R. CO. et al.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 20, 1911.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 515*) — RECORD — STENOGRAPHER'S NOTES.

In preparing the record on appeal, the stenographer's notes of the evidence should be stated in condensed narrative form where possible, as required by Supreme Court Rule No. 22 (66 S. E. vii).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2322-2325; Dec. Dig. § 515.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 332*) — LIABILITIES FOR INJURIES TO THIRD PERSONS — ACTS OF SERVANT—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether wrongful acts of servants to a third person were done within the scope of their employment so as to hold the master liable therefor held for the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; Lane, Judge.

Action by Charles Buckner against the South & Western Railroad Company and others. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and new trial granted.

Tucker & Lee and W. T. Morgan, for appellant. Locke Craig, A. Hall Johnston, and J. Norment Powell, for appellees.

BROWN, J. [1] This appeal is in forma pauperis and comprises 134 typewritten pages, of which 110 pages comprise the evidence in chief, cross-examinations, and re-examinations as taken down by the stenographer in the form of question and answer. The defendant offered no evidence, and the witnesses for plaintiff were few in number. At the end of the stenographer's notes is this entry: "It is agreed that the record proper and stenographer's notes shall constitute case on appeal." There is no other attempt to make out a case on appeal as required by law. This is in direct violation of the rule of this court, No. 22 (66 S. E. vii), and of its express decision in Cressler v. City of Asheville, 138 N. C. 483, 51 S. E. 53. That such of the evidence as is necessary to present the assignments of error could easily have been stated in condensed narrative form is manifested by the fact that the counsel for plaintiff and defendants have set out in their respective briefs very clear and brief statements of the evidence, which substantially agree. Under the circumstances of this case, we will make an exception and not dismiss the appeal; but we will be compelled to do so in the future unless our rule is observed.

[2] We have been saved the great labor of a close perusal of this bulky transcript by adopting practically the facts as stated in defendant's brief, as follows: "In February, 1906, the defendants, Carolina Company and South & Western Railway Company (no question being made in this case as to their relation to each other or to the work), were engaged in grading and constructing a line of railway through McDowell county, em-playing several thousand men at different camps. During that month plaintiff, then at Spartanburg, S. C., was employed by one Redricks to work on said road. In company with others, he went from Spartanburg via Asheville, to Marion, walked nine or ten miles from Marion to Camp 9, where he was told Capt. Harris (who the evidence shows was superintendent at Camps 8 and 9) that he was not needed at Camp 9 and directed to go to Camp 8. Plaintiff thereupon walked to Camp 8, three miles distant, reached there late in the day, had his name given to the walking boss there, was employed at Camp 8, made arrangements to go to work there, and the next morning went to work and worked half a day and then, in company with Wheeler and Wyatt, two of the men who had come with him, started home carrying his baggage. When about half way on the road to Camp 9, they were met by two men, one of whom they identify as Capt. Harris. Harris drew a pistol on Wheeler, and the other man drew a pistol on plaintiff and Wyatt, and all were commanded to throw up their hands, which they did. Harris then asked where they were going and, upon being informed that they were going home, told them to go back to Camp 8, which they refused to do. Thereupon Harris asked their reason, and they answered that it had been misrepresented to them. Harris then said that Redricks was at Camp 9 and they would go down and see whether he misrepresented things or not. Harris and the other man rode behind them, Harris cursing them all the way, with his pistol drawn, and upon their arrival at Camp 9 Harris called to a man, "Sheriff, here are some more hoboes," and directed the man whom he called Sheriff to put them in one of the overseer's houses that had a sufficient lock on it. The evidence shows that the man addressed as "Sheriff" was Geo. Carson, and that he was a walking boss or camp superintendent of one of the defendants at Camp 9, with authority to employ and discharge men at that camp. This man thereupon told plaintiff and his two companions to consider themselves under arrest, searched them, took their money, valuables, and baggage, and drove them before him with drawn pistol to a room where he locked them up. Some time that night, plaintiff was called to the door by this man, who drew a sack over his head and with others not identified, led, dragged, and kicked him some distance from the house, flogged him severely, ordered him to leave, fired off pistols, and ran him away from the camp. As a result of this cruel treatment, plaintiff was severely and permanently injured."

The defense is that the defendants are not liable for the acts of their superintendent and other agents, as such acts were beyond the scope of their authority. The facts as stated by the defendants' counsel show a degree of severity, abuse, and violation of law which should bring upon the servants of defendants who committed them the punishment of the criminal law. As stated by plaintiff's brief, they disclose a degree of brutality almost unbelievable.

In addition to the statement copied from defendant's brief, the evidence tends to prove that the defendants were engaged in building the railroad, and no question as to an independent contractor is raised. One Fred. Redricks was defendants' labor agent employed to secure laborers for defendants, and in such capacity he employed plaintiff and furnished his transportation to defendants' camps, and there some little provisions, etc., were advanced him. Harris was the superintendent of the work of construction and in control of the labor camps and laborers. Carson and Foster were the walking bosses at camps and had absolute control in superintendent's absence. The arrest was made by the superintendent of defendants while about his master's business, and in the furtherance of the interests of the master; the evident purpose of the arrest being to force the plaintiff to return to work and pay his transportation. When the pistols were leveled at plaintiff, the purpose of the arrest was then and there made known by the superintendent: "He told us that we would have to go back to Camp 8; that we were not going to leave there." "Go back up there and go quick." "Go on back up there and pay your transportation." "We don't owe any transportation." "O yes you do, damn you, and you will go back and pay it," etc. Harris had charge of both Camps 8 and 9, and while on duty and looking after his master's interests, and not for any purposes of his own, he took plaintiff under arrest and held him helplessly imprisoned until he was taken out and beaten that night.

It is contended, and it may be inferred from the evidence, that the very room in which plaintiff was confined was constructed by defendants for prison purposes in order to enforce obedience to the commands of its superintendent and foreman and to prevent escapes.

[3] We recognize the well-established rule that the master is not responsible for the tort of his servant when done without his authority and not for the purpose of executing his orders or doing his work, but wholly for the servant's own purposes and in pursuit of his private and personal ends. But that is not the only inference that can be drawn from the evidence in this case. There is nothing to show that Harris and Carson had any private ends of their own to pursue, or that they had quit sight of the company's work and were following the suggestions of their own malice. On the contrary, the evidence shows that they assaulted and imprisoned plaintiff to force him to pay the alleged debt to the company and to compel him to work against his will on the company's road. This question has been very elaborately discussed in several recent opinions of this court, and it is useless to "thresh over old straw."

The principles laid down in Jackson v. Telegraph Co., 139 N. C. 353, 51 S. E. 1015, 70 L. R. A. 738, May v. Telegraph Co., 72 S. E. 1059, at this term, and Berry v. Railway, 155 N. C. 287, 71 S. E. 322, are clearly applicable to the facts of this case as now appearing.

The subject is also fully discussed, and distinctions drawn, in Daniel v. Railroad Co., 136 N. C. 527, 43 S. E. 816, 67 L. R. A. 455; Sawyer v. Railroad Co., 142 N. C. 1, 54 S. E. 793, 115 Am. St. Rep. 716; Stewart v. Lumber Co., 146 N. C. 49, 59 S. E. 545; Marlowe v. Bland, 154 N. C. 140, 69 S. E. 752, and Dover v. Manufacturing Co., 72 S. E. 1067, at this term; *Roberts v. His honor should have submitted the issues to the jury under appropriate instructions.

The judgment of nonsuit is set aside. New trial.

HICKS v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 23, 1911.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 137*)—DEATH OF SERVANT—DANGEROUS INSTRUMENTALITIES.

Where a telegraph company was stringing wires in close proximity to other wires carrying high voltage for light and power purposes, it was the telegraph company's duty to assume that such light and power wires were dangerous, and to conduct its operations accordingly.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 137.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 149*)—DEATH OF SERVANT—DANGEROUS INSTRUMENTALITIES—ELECTRIC WIRES.

Where defendant telegraph company in stringing wires over the highly charged wires of a light and power company did not use a rope according to custom while working in close proximity to other highly charged wires, and decedent, a lineman, in taking hold of one of the wires by order of his foreman, received a shock from which he died, the telegraph company was guilty of actionable negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 291-295; Dec. Dig. § 149.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1068*)—REVIEW—INSTRUCTIONS—PREJUDICE.

Where, in an action for death of a servant, the jury found that the alleged fellow servant was not negligent, defendant was not prejudiced by the modification of a requested charge as to the negligence of a fellow servant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4225-4228; Dec. Dig. § 1068.*]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 265*)—DEATH OF SERVANT—RES IPSA LOQUITUR.

Where defendant telegraph company was stringing wires over those of a light and power company, and decedent, a ground man, on being ordered by his foreman to take up one of the wires which was being fastened on the pole, received an electric shock from which he died, the happening of the accident raises a presumption, in the absence of explanation, of want of ordinary care on defendant's part, under the rule that where a thing causing injury is shown to be under defendant's management, and the accident is such that in the ordinary course of things does not happen, if proper care is used, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation, that the accident arose from want of care.

Appeal from Superior Court, McDowell County; Long, Judge.

Action by Thomas M. Hicks, as administrator, etc., against the Western Union Telegraph Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This action was brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate, which is alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant. The intestate was employed by the defendant telegraph company, as a groundman, or assistant lineman, and on the day he was killed was at work for the defendant in a squad of men, who were engaged in stringing wires in the town of Marion, along the right of way of the Southern Railway Company; the defendant being represented there, at the time, by W. K. McClaren, its general superintendent, and R. R. Robinson, foreman of the construction gang, of which plaintiff's intestate was a member. The said railway passes under a bridge which is a part of the main street of said town. The street runs north and south and the railway east and west. The Marion Light & Power Company, which was engaged in furnishing power and light for the citizens of the town, had strung its wires on poles over the wires of the telegraph company, along the street and across the bridge and at right angles to the wires of the said company. The wires of the power company carried about 2,300 volts of electricity, and they were in plain view of everybody in the vicinity. On the day in question, McClaren and Robinson, with certain employees of the company, were engaged in stringing wires above those of the power company; Robinson being in charge of a portion of the squad. He was stationed on the bridge, where he gave directions to the men under him as to how to place the wires, which were in immediate proximity to the power company wires. McClaren was below, to the east of the bridge, under the cut, and not in sight of Robinson. McClaren had a part of the squad with him and under his direction, among whom was plaintiff's intestate. McClaren ordered the intestate to take hold of one of the wires with his naked hand, which intestate did in obedience to the order. He had hold of the wire but a very short time, when it was allowed to sag and drop upon the wires of the power company, and thereby the current in those wires was transferred to the wire held by the plaintiff's intestate, and he was killed by the deadly fluid. There was no request made to the power company to cut off this current while the work of changing the wires was going on, nor any guard wires put up for the purpose of preventing an accident, or any other protection taken to prevent the wire which was being changed from falling on the heavily charged wires of the power company.

The defendant mainly relied upon the fact that the death of the plaintiff's intestate was caused by the negligent act of Ashurst, who was a fellow servant, though it was contended also that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of defendant company.

The court explained the evidence to the jury and stated the contentions of the parties, and, among others, the following instruction was given to the jury: "If you find from the evidence that the telegraph company employed the young man Hicks to work along its telegraph line under the circumstances testified to by the witnesses, it owed him the duty to exercise reasonable and ordinary care, such care as a person of prudence would ordinarily employ with regard to his own business, to prevent any personal injury to the person transacting such work as was agreed upon between the plaintiff and defendant, and the duty devolved on young Hicks to use ordinary prudence to avoid danger in connection with any labor which he agreed to perform." The court then, at the request of the defendant telegraph company, gave the following instructions: "(1) The burden is upon the plaintiff to prove by a preponderance or greater weight of the evidence that the defendant, the Western Union Telegraph Company, was negligent, and that such negligence was the proximate cause of the death of the plaintiff's intestate, and if the plaintiff has failed so to prove, or if upon the whole evidence the minds of the jurors are evenly balanced as to whether or not the telegraph company was negligent, or as to whether or not such negligence was the proximate cause of the death of the plaintiff's intestate, then the jury should answer the first issue, 'No.' (2) That the defendant, the Western Union Telegraph Company, would not be liable for any negligence on the part of one of its employes who was a fellow servant of the plaintiff's intestate, and if the jury shall find from the evidence that the death of the plaintiff's intestate was caused by the negligence of his coemployé, Ashurst, this would not be negligence upon the part of the Western Union Telegraph Company, and the jury should answer the first issue, 'No.' (3) If the jury shall find the facts to be as testified to by the witnesses introduced by the Western Union Telegraph Company, the telegraph company was not guilty of negligence, and the jury should answer the first issue, 'No.' * * * (7) Upon the whole evidence, if believed, the plaintiff's intestate, Willard Y. Hicks, and the employé, Ashurst, were fellow servants, and if the jury shall find from the evidence that the plaintiff's intestate was killed by reason of Ashurst's negligence in permitting the telegraph company's wire to come in contact with the wire of the Marion Light & Power Company, this would not constitute negligence upon the part of the telegraph company, and the jury should answer the first issue, 'No.' (8) If the jury shall find from the evidence that Ashurst was instructed to throw the rope over the Light & Power Company's wire preparatory to stringing another wire, and in disregard or in disobedience of such instruction he attached the rope to the wire which was being taken down, and pulled the wire so that it came in contact with the wire of the light and power company, and this act on the part of Ashurst was the proximate cause of the death of the plaintiff's intestate, the telegraph company was not negligent, and would not be liable for the negligence of Ashurst, and the jury should answer the first issue, 'No.' Given with this modification: Provided you find the method he was instructed to employ by his superior was reasonably safe under the circumstances. (9) If the jury shall find from the evidence that Hicks was told by the superintendent, McClaren, to take hold of the wire and hold it, this would not constitute negligence, unless McClaren knew or could have reasonably anticipated that the wire might come in contact with the light wire and thus produce an injury to Hicks, and if the jury should find from the evidence that after Hicks took hold of the wire, and while he was holding it, Ashurst or some other fellow servant of Hicks pulled the wire against the light wire, or carelessly permitted the wire to come in contact with the light wire, this would not constitute negligence on the part of the telegraph company, and the jury should answer the first issue, 'No.' (10) If the jury shall find from the evidence that it was safe, at the time McClaren told Hicks to take hold of the wire, for Hicks to obey this instruction, and thereafter in the conduct of the work some coemployé and fellow servant of Hicks either pulled the wire against the light wire or negligently permitted it to come in contact with the light wire so that the current passed to the wire Hicks was holding, this act on the part of the coemployé or fellow servant of Hicks would be regarded as the proximate cause of Hicks' death, and not the orig-

final instruction of McClaren to Hicks to take hold of the wire, and the jury should answer the first issue, "No."

Under these instructions there was a verdict for the plaintiff, upon which a judgment was entered, and the defendant appealed.

Geo. H. Fearons and A. S. Barnard, for appellant. Hudgins & Watson and A. Hall Johnston, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). It seems to us that no case could have been more accurately tried, under the rules of law, than this one was by the able and learned judge who presided at the trial in the court below. The charge was full and complete in every respect, and surely there is nothing in it of which the defendant has any just or valid reason to complain. The jury have acquitted the light and power company of any negligence upon evidence supporting the verdict and under instructions free from any error, and it is not necessary that we should consider that part of the case.

[1, 2] There was evidence coming from defendant's own witnesses that the wires of that company were regarded as live and dangerous, and work in the proximity of such wires was always conducted with reference to that fact, and it was its legal duty to assume that those wires were dangerous. Haynes v. Gas Co., 114 N. C. 203, 19 S. E. 344, 26 L. R. A. 810, 41 Am. St. Rep. 786. There was also evidence that it was the general custom of this telegraph company, and of linemen generally, while working in close proximity to the wires of other companies, which are assumed to be live and dangerous, to use a rope in stretching wires when they are likely to come in contact with the wires of other companies, and this is done to prevent the necessity of taking hold of the wires with the naked hand, which would result in injury if the two wires should come in contact with each other. No guard wires were used so as to prevent such contact, nor were any other precautions taken to make the work of the plaintiff's intestate reasonably safe. Under the evidence and the instructions of the court, the jury must necessarily have found that the death of the intestate was not due to any negligence of Ashurst, who is alleged to have been a fellow servant, and who was on the bridge manipulating one of the wires, for the court instructed the jury that, if the negligence of the fellow servant, Ashurst, caused the death of the intestate, they should answer the first issue, "No," that is, that his death was not caused by defendant's negligence, and the jury answered the issue, "Yes," and that instruction was without reference to any orders from a superior officer or vice principal, under which Ashurst may have been acting at the time. [3] If Ashurst was not negligent, and the jury have so found as a fact, what difference can it make, if the judge did modify the defendant's eighth prayer for instructions, for it is predicated entirely on the negligence of Ashurst, and it is, of course, immaterial whether his negligence, if in fact there was any, consisted in disobeying safe orders or in pulling or dragging the wire negligently and in disregard of them, so that the wire sagged and fell on the live wires of the company, causing a deadly current of electricity to be transmitted to the body of the plaintiff's intestate, which resulted in his death. Let us repeat, and in a more definite manner, that the court, in giving the instruction contained in the defendant's seventh prayer, told the jury that Hicks and Ashurst were fellow servants, and if they found from the evidence that intestate's death was caused by his negligence in handling the wire—that is, any kind of negligence—it could not be imputed to the telegraph company as its negligence, although he was employed by it, and they should answer the first issue, "No." It follows logically from their affirmative answer to that issue that the next prayer, which was modified, was immaterial, as it would be vain and idle for the jury to consider whether the company was negligent by reason of any unsafe orders to Ashurst, or otherwise, after they had found that Ashurst was not negligent at all. Of course, the company could not be made answerable for a negligence that did not exist. Besides, the court expressly told the jury, as we have seen, that, if it was Ashurst's negligence that caused intestate's death, it would not be the negligence of the company, and they should answer the first issue, "No"; so the defendant virtually got the benefit of the instruction it asked for in its eighth prayer, in the instruction given in response to its seventh prayer.

[4] We think, that, perhaps, this is a case which calls for the application of the rule laid down in Turner v. Power Co., 154 N. C. 181, 69 S. E. 767, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 848, as follows: "When a thing which causes injury is shown to be under the management of the defendant, and the accident is such that in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have the management use the proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendant, that the accident arose from a want of care. And this statement will be found to be in accord with well-considered cases in other courts, as in Griffen v. Manice, 166 N. Y. 188 [59 N. E. 925, 52 L. R. A. 922, 82 Am. St. Rep. 630]; Howser v. Railroad, 80 Md. 146 [30 Atl. 906, 27 L. R. A. 154, 45 Am. St. Rep. 332]; Sheridan v. Foley, 58 N. J. Law, 230 [33 Atl. 484]; Armour v. Golkowska, 95 Ill. App. 492." And again: "These and numerous other authorities on the subject will disclose that it is not the injury alone that can call for the ap plication of this doctrine or maxim, but the injury and the facts and circumstances immediately attending it and constituting together the occurrence or event which present the conditions when it may properly be allowed to prevail. Thus in Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, § 59, the authors say: 'In many cases the maxim res ipsa loquitur applies; the affair speaks for itself. It is not that in any case negligence can be assumed from the mere fact of an accident and an injury; but in these cases the surrounding circumstances, which are necessarily brought into view, by showing how the accident occurred, contain without further proof sufficient evidence of the defendant's duty and of his neglect to perform it. The fact of the casualty and the attendant circumstances may themselves furnish all the proof that the injured person is able to offer or that it is necessary to offer.'

But it is not necessary that we should go so far, for his honor put the case to the jury practically upon the rule of the prudent man, both as to the conduct of the defendant and of Hicks, and they found that the defendant had not, under the circumstances, exercised ordinary care. Cases showing the measure of duty of those who employ this dangerous agency in their business have been decided by this court. Haynes v. Gas Co., supra; Horne v. Power Co., 144 N. C. 375, 57 S. E. 19; Harrington v. Wadesboro, 153 N. C. 437, 69 S. E. 399; Turner v. Power Co., supra. In the Haynes Case, Justice Burwell, speaking for the court, said: "The danger is great, and the care and watchfulness must be commensurate with it." It appears in this case that the defendant did absolutely nothing to provide for the safety of its servant, who was killed. Our attention has not been called to any precautionary method adopted by it for that purpose. There is no doubt as to what was the duty of the defendant to its servant occupying a position of great danger in performing his work, and there is very little law in the case. It presents substantially and largely a question of fact, which, under a faultless charge, the jury have found against the defendant. We take this extract from defendant's brief, adding that we think it states a correct principle of law: "It may be taken as settled by the overwhelming weight of authority that a company maintaining electric wires carrying a high voltage of electricity is fixed with the duty of using all necessary care and prudence to make the wires safe at places where others might have the right to go either for work, business, or pleasure. Mitchell v. Electric Company, 129 N. C. 166 [39 S. E. 801, 55 L. R. A. 398, 85 Am. St. Rep. 735]." "The defendant company was engaged in the business of manufacturing, producing, leasing, and selling light made from the use of electricity, which is the most deadly and dangerous power recognized as a necessary agency in developing our civilization and promoting our comfort and business affairs. It differs from all other dangerous utilities. Its association is with the most inoffensive and harmless piece of mechanism, if wire can be classified as such, in common use. In adhering to the wire, it gives no warning or knowledge of its deadly presence; vision cannot detect it; it is without color, motion, or body; latently and without sound, it exists; and, being odorless, the only means of its discovery lies in the senses of feeling, communicated through the touch (of a person) which, as soon as done, he becomes its victim. In behalf of human life and the safety of mankind generally, it behooves those who would profit by the use of this subtle and violent element of nature to exercise the greatest degree of care and constant vigilance in inspecting and maintaining the wires in perfect condition." Mitchell v. Electric Co., 129 N. C. 169, 39 S. E. 802, 55 L. R. A. 398, 85 Am. St. Rep. 735.

We do not think there was any error in the other rulings or in the charge to which exceptions were taken.

No error.

FERRELL v. DIXIE COTTON MILLS.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 23, 1911.)

1. NEGLIGENCE (§ 23*)—DANGEROUS INSTRUMENTALITIES—ELECTRIC WIRE—CHILDREN TRESPASSERS.

Defendant cotton mill company maintained various dwelling houses for employes around its plant, and, back of a garden patch connected with one of the houses rented to plaintiff, defendant maintained an electric pole which had been partially sustained by a guy wire fastened in the ground. The pole supported uninsulated electric wires carrying a high voltage for power purposes, and the guy wire was fastened to the pole above the cross-arm and came down between two of the electric wires passing within eight inches of one of them. The guy wire had become loose some six or eight months prior to the accident and had been permitted to hang against the pole which, though located entirely on defendant's ground, was in an open space where the children of the neighborhood, including plaintiff's intestate, a child six years old, were wont to play, and who, to defendant's knowledge, had been in the habit of catching hold of the wire and swinging on it out from the pole and back. On the day of the accident the wire had become charged, and plaintiff's intestate took hold of it and was instantly killed: Held that, even though the child was a trespasser, defendant was guilty of actionable negligence in permitting such dangerous condition to exist on its premises, known to be frequented by children, and was therefore liable for decedent's death.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 33, 34; Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

2. NEGLIGENCE (§ 23*)—DANGEROUS PREMISES—TRAPS—ELECTRIC WIRES.

Where defendant maintained on its premises a guy wire highly charged with electricity at a point where it knew children of the age of plaintiff's intestate were wont to play, defendant was not relieved from liability for decedent's death by being shocked while playing with the wire, by the fact that defendant's watchman had told the children to stay away from the pole.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 33, 34; Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

3. NEGLIGENCE (§ 23*)—DANGEROUS INSTRUMENTALITIES—CONTROL.

Where plaintiff's child, six years old, was killed by coming in contact with a highly charged guy wire attached to a pole belonging to defendant, and it appeared that no one other than defendant had charge of the pole or authority to remedy any defects in or about it, it was not material to defendant's liability whether the pole was located on or off premises rented by defendant to plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 33, 34; Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

4. DEATH (§ 24*)—DEATH OF CHILD—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE OF PARENTS.

That the parents of a boy six years old permitted him to play in a yard from which he went onto defendant's nearby premises, and was killed by coming in contact with a live wire attached to one of defendant's poles, was insufficient to charge the parents with contributory negligence precluding a recovery for the child's death.

Appeal from Superior Court, Iredell County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by M. C. Ferrell, as administrator, etc., against the Dixie Cotton Mills. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This action was brought by the plaintiff to recover damages for the death of his son, which is alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant. The intestate of plaintiff, his six year old son, was killed by an electric shock received from a loose guy wire, suspended from a pole on which was strung the wires supplying defendant with power to run its cotton mill. This pole was on defendant's property and belonged to it. The guy wire was attached to the top of the pole, and fastened at the other end to a piece of timber in the ground. This guy wire was for the purpose of holding the pole in place. The wires—three of them—which carried the current were naked; that is, they were uninsulated except where they were fastened to the cross-arm on the poles. This guy wire was fastened to the pole above the cross-arm and came down between two of the electric wires, passing within some eight inches of one of them. Some six or eight months prior to the boy's death, the earth had been removed from the place where the guy wire was fastened in the ground, so that it became loose. It was permitted to hang loose against the pole for several months before the injury. The plaintiff, with his family, lived in one of the defendant's dwelling houses. Two of his children worked in the mill. The house was only a short distance from this pole, only 50 yards or more. Plaintiff testified that the pole was just beyond the corner of his garden patch. The evidence indicates that there were some 20 or more of the mill dwellings; that there were no fences about them; and that people, children and others, were accustomed and were permitted to go about the settlement pretty much as they pleased. This pole stood some 10 feet or more from the railway track, which at that point ran through a cut. There was a path on the side of the cut and between it and the pole. Any one who desired to do so used this path. There is much evidence in the record that children had been accustomed to play about this pole, on the railway bank, and they were seen on several occasions playing about it, playing with this loose guy wire, swinging on it out from the pole and back. This fact had been reported to the agents of the defendant. It was admitted that the wires on the pole carried a current of 2,200 volts, and the evidence shows that such a current is highly dangerous and deadly. At the close of the testimony, the defendant moved to nonsuit the plaintiff. This motion was overruled, and whether it should have been granted depends upon the state of the evidence. Defendant appealed.

H. P. Grier and Z. V. Turlington, for appellant. L. C. Caldwell, Burwell & Cansler, and Gillett & Guthrie, for appellee.

WALKER, J. [1] The negligence charged against the defendant is the maintaining by it of a highly dangerous and deadly condition and instrumentality on premises which were uninclosed, and which were in an attractive place to children, and on which premises defendant knew, or by the exercise of reasonable care ought to have known, that small children were accustomed to play. There was ample evidence to sustain this allegation. The contention of the appellant is that the child was a trespasser, to whom it owed no duty except to refrain from willfully injuring it. If the injury had been to a person of such mature age that he could appreciate the nature of his acts, and the dangers attached to the situation, we would agree with this contention. But when, as in this case, the injury is suffered by a six year old boy, under such circumstances and surrounding conditions as the evidence showed to exist, a different rule of law governs the conduct and liability of the defendant. What did this six year old boy know about the dangers of electricity? What could he possibly have known about the rules of property and the laws of trespass? Technically he may have been a trespasser on defendant's land; but all he knew about it was that it was an attractive place to play, and that it was where he and the other little children of the neighborhood were accustomed to play, and had been playing for months past. The defendant knew, or ought to have known, that this pole with the loose guy wire attached to it was an instrument of death, which might become effective to any one who came in contact with it. The defendant also knew, or ought to have known, that the children were in the habit of playing about this pole, and that they were also in the habit of swinging on this loose guy wire. Under these circumstances, the law will not permit the defendant to allege a technical trespass and thereby shield itself from the consequences of its negligence, resulting in the death of the son of the plaintiff.

The doctrine of the "turntable cases" was first before this court in the case of Kramer v. Railroad, 127 N. C. 328, 37 S. E. 468, 52 L. R. A. 359. There the nine year old son of plaintiff was killed by climbing upon a pile of cross-ties negligently stacked by defendant in an unused portion of one of the streets of the town of Marion. The court held that plaintiff's son was not a trespasser; but it further says: "If he was too young to be bound by any rule as to contributory negligence and had a habit of playing, with other boys, on the cross-ties, with the knowledge of defendant, and without the defendant's attempting to prevent such sport or to take precautions against injury to the children, then the defendant was negligent. In such a case the defendant's negligence would not consist in piling the cross-ties in the street, but it would consist in its failure to guard against injury to the children, after it had learned of their habit of playing on the ties, and its failing to provide against their injury."

In Briscoe v. Power Co., 148 N. C. 396, 62 S. E. 600, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1116, plaintiff was not permitted to recover, as the evidence failed to show that the premises of defendant were especially attractive to children, or that children were accustomed to play there; and also that this rule of law had never been held applicable in the case of a boy 13 years of age. But, in the course of the opinion, Mr. Justice Connor states his approval of the rule of law, which we think is applicable to the case in hand. On page 411 of 148 N. C., on page 606 of 62 S. E. (19 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1116), he says, quoting from 21 A. & E. Enc. 473: "A party's liability to trespassers depends on the former's contemplation of the likelihood of their presence on the premises and the probability of injury from contact with conditions existing thereon." Immediately following this language, the editor says: "The doctrine that the owner of premises may be liable in negligence to trespassers whose presence on the premises was either known or might reasonably have been anticipated, is well applied in the rule of numerous cases that one who maintains dangerous implements or appliances on uninclosed premises of a nature likely to attract children in play, or permits dangerous conditions to exist thereon, is liable to a child who is so injured, though a trespasser at the time when the injuries were received; and with stronger reason, when the presence of a child trespasser is actually known to a party, or when such presence would have been known had reasonable care been exercised."

In the case of Harrington v. Wadesboro, 153 N. C. 437, 69 S. E. 399, plaintiff was permitted to recover for the death of her son, a 17 year old boy, who was killed by catching hold of a wire which was hanging low over a path used by people in going to a moving picture show. The Harrington Case, supra, Haynes v. Gas Co., 114 N. C. 203, 19 S. E. 344, 26 L. R. A. 810, 41 Am. St. Rep. 786, Mitchell v. Electric Co., 129 N. C. 166, 39 S. E. 801, 55 L. R. A. 398, 85 Am. St. Rep. 735, as well as other cases in our reports, lay down the rule that persons and corporations dealing in electricity are held to the highest degree of care in maintenance and inspection of their wires, poles, etc. This rule is well stated in Mitchell's Case, supra: "In behalf of human life, and the safety of mankind generally, it behooves those who would profit by the use of this subtle and violent element of nature to exercise the greatest degree of care and constant vigilance in inspecting and maintaining the wires in perfect condition." See Hicks v. Telegraph Co., 73 S. E. 139, at this term.

Henderson v. Refining Co., 219 Pa. 384, 68 Atl. 968, 123 Am. St. Rep. 668, presents a state of facts almost exactly similar to the facts in this case. There the 11 year old son of plaintiff was killed by getting into a gas engine erected on a vacant uninclosed lot by defendant. The lot lay between two dwelling houses owned by defendant, in one of which the parents of the boy had formerly lived. The lot had been used as a sort of common, and as a playground for the children. There was a path across it. The court says: "A fair inference is that heedlessly, or without appreciating the danger, the child ventured too near and was injured. Under these circumstances he cannot be regarded as a mere trespasser. The lot was really an appurtenance to the two houses and was a part of the curtilage."

As in the above case, we think that from the evidence in this case it is reasonable to infer that this pole was within the curtilage of plaintiff's dwelling. He says that it was right at, or near to, the corner of his uninclosed garden patch, only a short distance from his home.

In sustaining a recovery by the plaintiff in Mattson v. Railroad, 95 Minn. 477, 104 N. W. 443, 70 L. R. A. 503, 111 Am. St. Rep. 483, it is said: "It (the defendant) failed to take proper care of dynamite brought into this vicinity, and left it exposed upon premises where children had, to the knowledge of its servants, been in the habit of loitering and amusing themselves."

In City of Pekin v. McMahon, 154 Ill. 141, 39 N. E. 484, 27 L. R. A. 203, 45 Am. St. Rep. 114, an eight year old boy was drowned in a gravel pit situated on an uninclosed vacant lot belonging to defendant. The court says: "The owner of land where children are allowed or accustomed to play, particularly if it is unfenced, must use ordinary care to keep it in a safe condition; for they, being without judgment, and likely to be drawn by childish curiosity into places of danger, are not to be classed with trespassers, idlers, and mere licensees. 2 Sher. & Redf. Neg. (4th Ed.) § 705; 4 A. & E. 53, and cases in note. In such case the owner should reasonably anticipate the injury which has happened. 1 Thompson on Neg. 304."

Tacket v. Henderson, 12 Cal. App. 658, 108 Pac. 151, cites at length the cases of Mitchell v. Electric Co. and Haynes v. Gas Co., supra, and approves the doctrine there laid down. It is there held: "A person or corporation using wires charged with electricity is bound, while the public is not, not only to know the extent of the dangers arising from them, but to use the very highest degree of care practical to avoid injury."

In Olson v. Gill, 58 Wash. 151, 108 Pac. 140, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 884, it is said: "Here the appellants, having no apparent use for the dynamite, and knowing of the trespassing proclivities of the boys, needlessly stored it, a most dangerous agency, where in the exercise of ordinary prudence they should have anticipated the trespassing boys would really find, be attracted by, and take it. Under such circumstances, we cannot hold that the trespassing of the boys should as a matter of law excuse the appellants from liability." The boys above mentioned were 13 and 14 years of age, and the dynamite was stored in an unlocked building on a vacant, uninclosed lot.

In Branson v. Labrot, 81 Ky. 638, 50 Am. Rep. 193, it is held: "Defendants piled lumber, in a large city, on an unfenced lot which the public were accustomed to cross and children to play upon, in a negligent manner, so that it fell upon and killed a young infant who was playing on the lot near it. Held, that a recovery was justifiable."

In Brown v. Salt Lake City, 33 Utah, 222, 93 Pac. 570, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 619, 126 Am. St. Rep. 828, an eight year old boy was drowned in a conduit situated near a schoolhouse. Entrance to the conduit was barred up; but one of the bars had been broken for a year or more, and children had played in and about it for several years, and its condition had been brought to the notice of the city authorities. The court says: "We are constrained to hold, therefore, that the doctrine of the turntable cases should be applied to all things that are uncommon and are artificially produced, and which are attractive and alluring to children of immature judgment and discretion, and are inherently dangerous, and where it is practical to guard them without serious inconvenience and without great expense to the owner."

In Price v. Water Co., 58 Kan. 551, 50 Pac. 450, 62 Am. St. Rep. 625, an 11 year old boy was drowned in defendant's reservoir. The reservoir was fenced; but there was a kind of stile over the fence, and defendant had knowledge that boys played about the reservoir, fishing and indulging in other sports. The court says: "To maintain upon one's property enticements to the ignorant or unwary is tantamount to an invitation to visit and to inspect and to enjoy, and in such case the obligation to endeavor to protect from the dangers of the seductive instrument or place follows just as though the invitation had been express. * * * It would be a barbarous rule of law that would make the owner of land liable for setting a trap thereon, baited with meat so that his neighbor's dog, attracted by his natural instincts, might run into it and be killed, and which would exempt him from liability for the consequences of leaving exposed and unguarded on his land a dangerous machine, so that his neighbor's child, attracted to it and tempted to intermeddle with it by instincts equally strong, might thereby be killed or maimed for life. Such is not law."

In Decker v. Paper Co., 111 Minn. 439, 127 N. W. 183, a five year old boy was killed while playing on an elevator in defendant's mill. The evidence showed that defendant permitted children and others to go about the premises, and that it had knowledge that children were accustomed to play in this room and on this elevator, and with reference to these facts the court said: "The elevator, in the condition in which defendant maintained it, was extremely dangerous as a playground for young children, and the precise manner in which the accident happened is not of serious moment as respects defendant's liability, since it is clear that death resulted from playing about the elevator. * * * Defendant offered evidence tending to show that small boys were forbidden the premises, and, when found, that they were driven away, and it is claimed that defendant performed its full duty in keeping them away. This evidence, in connection with that offered by the plaintiff upon the same subject, presented a question for the jury."

In Franks v. Cotton Oil Co., 78 S. C. 10, 58 S. E. 960, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 463, a 10 year old boy was killed by drowning in a reservoir on defendant's premises. The reservoir was unfenced, and children were accustomed to play about it. The court says, quoting from Thompson on Neg. § 1030: "Although the dangerous thing may not be what is termed an attractive nuisance—that is to say, not have especial attraction for children by reason of their childish instincts—yet where it is so left exposed that they are likely to come into contact with it, and where their coming in contact with it is obviously dangerous to them, the person so exposing the dangerous thing should reasonably anticipate the injury that is likely to happen to them from its being so exposed, and is bound to take reasonable pains to guard it, so as to prevent injury to them.” Again, quoting from Thompson, Neg. § 1026: “One doctrine under this head is that if a child (technically) trespasses on the premises of defendant, and is injured in consequence of something that befalls him while so trespassing, he cannot recover damages unless the injury was wantonly inflicted, or was due to the recklessly careless conduct of the defendant. This cruel and wicked doctrine, unworthy of a civilized jurisprudence, puts property above humanity, leaves entirely out of view the tender years and infirmity of understanding of the child, indeed, his inability to be a trespasser, in sound legal theory, and visits upon him the consequences of his trespass just as though he were an adult, and exonerates the person or corporation upon whose property he is a trespasser from any measure of duty toward him which they would not owe, under the same circumstances, toward an adult.” See, also, Bridger v. Railroad, 25 S. C. 24; Railroad v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. Ed. 745; Union Pac. R. Co. v. McDonald, 152 U. S. 262, 14 Sup. Ct. 619, 38 L. Ed. 434; Townsend v. Wathen, 9 East. 277; Thompson, Neg., §§ 1024–1030; 2 Wood, Railway Law, § 321; Cooley on Torts, p. 634; Bishop, Noncontract Law, § 854; 7 *A. & E. R. A. 655; Dobbins v. Railroad, 91 Tex. 60, 41 S. W. 62; Kopplekom v. Cement Co., 16 Colo. App. 274, 64 Pac. 1047, 54 L. R. A. 284; Powers v. Harlow, 53 Mich. 507, 19 N. W. 257, 51 Am. Rep. 154.

In Snare, etc., v. Friedman, 169 Fed. 1, 94 C. C. A. 369, it is said: “We think, in reason, and in consonance with the legal principles by which the duty of individuals to protect others from dangers that may result from the use of their own property is determined, and by which they are held responsible for their negligent acts in that regard, this defendant owed a duty to children of tender years who, to its knowledge, were accustomed to play on the public streets in the vicinity of these piles of beams, and also to play and sit thereon, to use due care under the circumstances to prevent the piles from being in such an unstable condition as would be likely to cause injury to such of these children as might come in contact therewith.”

Peirce v. Lyden, 157 Fed. 552, 85 C. C. A. 312, holds: “Defendant maintained a shed in a railroad yard of about two acres near a schoolhouse in a city, in which he kept open barrels of oil. During the daytime the shed was left unlocked, and for several months children living in the vicinity who played in the yard had been in the habit of stealing oil from the barrels and making fires with it in the yard, which fact was known to defendant's watchman. On one such occasion, plaintiff, who was an infant, was burned and injured. Held, that defendant was chargeable with notice of such practice of the children from its long continuance and the knowledge of its watchman, and that the question of its keeping the place in such condition in view of the danger of their injury therefrom was for the jury.”

In Akin v. Bradley, 48 Wash. 97, 92 Pac. 903, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 586, defendant had thrown some dynamite caps on a vacant lot in rear of its place of business. A path ran through this vacant lot, and school children used the path. Plaintiff was a boy of 11 years of age. The court said: “We think that when the respondent left these dangerous explosives by the wayside, where it knew that children, naturally attracted by such things, were constantly passing and repassing and playing therewith, it must be held to have known that such children were liable to cause some of said caps to explode in a manner likely to cause them serious injury, and that the explosion of such a cap by a dry battery in the manner shown here in did not constitute an intervening cause that should relieve respondent from liability.”

In Stollery v. Railway Co., 243 Ill. 290, 90 N. E. 709, a boy of 10 years was killed, and his body found beside a conveyor operated by defendant on a vacant lot in a city. Held: “Under the decisions of this state unguarded premises supplied with dangerous attractions to children are regarded as holding out an implied invitation to them, which will make the owner of the premises liable for injuries to them, even though the children be technically trespassers.” This case also holds: “The rule of law is, as already stated, that the proof of negligence on the part of the appellee's intestate, as well as all the other elements of the action charged in the declaration, may be established by circumstantial evidence.”

The principles of the law of negligence laid down in the foregoing cases, as well as in others too numerous to cite, is both just and humane, and, under the authority of these cases, the court committed no error in submitting the facts in the case to the jury for their decision.

[2] Appellant's fifth exception is to the court's refusal to charge that the defendant was not guilty of negligence in that its watchman, the witness W. D. Plyler, had told the children to stay away from this pole. Considering the well-known propensity of children of the age of plaintiff's intestate and his playmates to desire to do what they are forbidden, the watchman's warning was hardly more than an invitation. The snip of a pair of wire cutters was all that was necessary to render this death trap perfectly harmless. The defendant, having negligently failed to perform this insignificant act, and thereby caused the death of this six year old boy, now asks the court to excuse its negligence by charging the jury that it is not liable because its watchman told those boys to stay away from this pole. This, we think, is hardly short of trifling with human life. In the excerpt already quoted from Decker v. Paper Co., supra, the court, in speaking to this very question, says: "Defendant offered evidence tending to show that small boys were forbidden the premises, and, when found, that they were driven away, and it is claimed that defendant performed its full duty in keeping them away. This evidence, in connection with that offered by the plaintiff upon the same subject, presented a question for the jury." We think that this disposes of appellant's fifth exception.

[3] Appellant's sixth exception is equally without merit. The defendant's liability in this case is in no wise dependent on the question as to whether the pole was on or off of the premises which it had rented to plaintiff, father of the dead boy. In either event, the pole was not rented to the plaintiff. Nor would it make any difference if it had been, except that it may have rendered the question of the negligence of defendant more positive and clear. Turner v. Power Co., 154 N. C. 181, 69 S. E. 767; Haynes v. Gas Co., supra. There was no evidence tending to show that any one except defendant had charge of this pole, or had any authority to remedy any defects in or about it. The defendant, therefore, was responsible for its dangerous and deadly condition.

[4] Appellant's seventh exception is to the refusal of the court to charge the jury that plaintiff's cause of action was barred by his contributory negligence. Under the facts disclosed by the evidence in this case, the plaintiff and his wife were not guilty of contributory negligence in permitting their six year old boy to go out into the yard to play.

In Day v. Power Co., 136 Mo. App. 274, 117 S. W. 81, plaintiff's six year old boy was killed by contact with a live wire which was strung near the end of a roof. Plaintiff lived on the third story of a building, and this roof was used as a kind of back yard. As to the mother's contributory negligence, the court says: "There is no sufficient ground in the facts before us for declaring the mother of the child guilty in law of negligence. Under the facts disclosed, the characterization of her conduct was an issue for the jury to solve. There is no merit in the suggestion that the child, only six years old, was guilty of contributory negligence." In Henderson v. Refining Co., 219 Pa. 384, 68 Atl. 963, 123 Am. St. Rep. 668, the court says: "As to the suggestion that the parents were guilty of contributory negligence, they could not be so held as a matter of law, merely because they allowed a seven year old boy to go around by himself upon the streets in the vicinity of his home, or to visit a neighbor's house. At most the question would be for the jury. Enright v. Railroad, 204 Pa. 543, 54 Atl. 317. The same may be said as to the contention that the parents were negligent in not warning the boy to keep away from the machinery. It was not so clear a duty that the court could declare it as a matter of law." In Enright v. Railroad, 204 Pa. 543, 54 Atl. 317, holding a father not guilty of contributory negligence in permitting an 11 year old son to stroll along railway tracks $1\frac{1}{2}$ blocks away from home, the court says: "The doctrine which imputes negligence to a parent in such a case is repulsive to our natural instincts and repugnant to the condition of that class of persons who have to maintain life by daily toil." In Colorado Springs Electric Co. v. Soper, 38 Colo. 126, 88 Pac. 161, twins five years of age were permitted to play in the grounds of a nearby public institution for deaf and dumb. A passing teamster allowed them to ride with him some two blocks away. One of the children, after being put down, took hold of a piece of barb wire lying in the grass, the other end of which was attached to an electric light pole and in contact with electric wires. The child was injured. In speaking to the question of the contributory negligence on the part of the child's parents, the court says: "They were away from the traveled portion of the street, safe and secure from all dangerous things rightfully on the street. The barbed wire charged with electricity had no right to be there. If parents are negligent in permitting children to play out of doors, on public grounds in the daytime, unattended by the parents themselves or others, then, in the majority of cases, it will be necessary to go out of the business of raising or attempting to raise children, because parents cannot be with children at all hours of the day; neither is it practical to employ others to be with them to guard them against unseen dangers." In Comptey v. Starke, 129 Wis. 622, 109 N. W. 650, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 652, the court says: "Upon the issue of contributory negligence of plaintiff's mother, the evidence tends to show that she lives in a house something more than a block and a half from the place of injury, and around two street corners; that she is a woman who earns her own living as a nurse, and had the care of the housekeeping for her family, consisting of her mother, an adult brother, herself, and three children; that she had never known the plaintiff to go where the pile driver was at work; that on the day in question her brother was sick in bed, and she was engaged in her Saturday housecleaning; that she gave plaintiff his lunch in the kitchen, which had a door leading into the back yard which was not locked; that after giving him his lunch she turned to her work in another room and was out of sight only 10 or 15 minutes when she learned of his injury. * * * We think that the ordinary mother of a family, under these circumstances, would be very much surprised to hear that she had been guilty of negligence in the care of an approximately three year old child. Certainly the fact of such negligence is not clear enough to be declared so as a matter of law." In Tecker v. Railroad, 60 Wash. 570, 111 Pac. 791, a boy 6½ years of age went to the post office with his 10 year old sister. She went in and got the mail, and when she came out the boy had gone into the street, and had been run over and killed by one of defendant's cars. The court says: "Nor can it be said as matter of law that the parents of a child are negligent in permitting him to go upon the streets in the care of another child of sufficient age to appreciate and avoid danger, or other competent custodian. In such cases the question of negligence should be submitted to the jury. 29 Cyc. 558. The parent is only required to exercise ordinary care in watching and controlling the child. 29 Cyc. 556; Cameron v. Duluth Co., 94 Minn. 104, 102 N. W. 208." In Saxton v. Railroad, 219 Pa. 492, 68 Atl. 1022, a boy 6½ years of age was injured. The court says: "The father of the boy was not precluded from recovering because he permitted his son to go upon the streets in a business part of the city unattended." It appeared in Gunn v. Railroad, 42 W. Va. 676, 26 S. E. 546, 36 L. R. A. 575, that two boys, five and six years of age, were run over and killed by a train of defendant. They lived 300 to 400 yards from the railroad. In speaking to the question of the contributory negligence of the mother, the court says: "The mother sent them that morning to turn the cows up the road, and come back by the corn lot and garden—a different direction from the trestle, I understand. They could not pen or imprison their children from light and air and exercise and play. They could not always keep unflinching watch upon them."

The evidence in this case shows that the father was away from home from early in the morning until late at night, earning a living for himself and family; that the mother was at home taking care of her household duties, which the presence of several children must have rendered both numerous and exacting. Under such circumstances, surely it cannot be held as matter of law that these parents were negligent in permitting their six year old boy to go out in the yard to play without constantly watching him. If such a rule should be adopted, a large majority of the mothers would be forced to keep their little children in the house, or else be responsible for any injury suffered by them at the hands of others.

As to the eighth exception, upon the question of contributory negligence, there is no evidence that the plaintiff knew of the condition of the pole and loose guy wire till August. The same may be said as to the contention that the parents were negligent in not warning the boy to keep away from the wire. It was not so clear a duty that the court could declare it as a matter of law.

The ninth exception is to the court's definition of "negligence." This exception is without merit, particularly as the court charged the jury as follows: "But if you find a reasonably prudent man ordinarily would have permitted that wire to remain as it was in the place as it was, detached from the ground, then it would not be negligent in the company in having it in that condition, or, if you should find that it was not the proximate cause of the plaintiff's intestate's death, why you should answer the first issue, 'No.'" Hicks v. Telegraph Co., 73 S. E. 139, at this term.

What has been said in regard to the preceding assignments of error, together with the authorities set out, and the principles stated, dispose of the other exceptions. Those facts of this case which are uncontested present a clear case of negligence; the jury having found against the defendant's contention, under the charge of the court, which gave to it the benefit of every principle of law to which it was fairly entitled. At very small expense, the defendant, with notice of the dangerous situation, could, by the exercise of the slightest care, have prevented this accident, and the wonder is that it did not, at once, take steps to do so. It may be that the courts, in view of so many injuries from this deadly agency, which without proper care is a constant menace to the public, will have to suggest that companies who make use of it in their business must either convey it by wires laid under ground, or so safeguard their wires as to remove this ever-increasing danger to those who, in their ordinary avocations, must come in close proximity to this subtle, dangerous, and oftentimes fatal current. It is no injustice or hardship to the defendant that we hold it liable under the conceded facts of this case.

No error.

(187 N. C. 623)

STATE v. GRAINGER et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 20, 1911.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 153*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—PREMEDITATION.

On a charge of murder in the first degree, evidence as to the accused filling up on whisky and shooting up the town a short time before the murder, and of his threats made to his woman companion to kill the deceased and of her identification to him of the victim, was properly admitted to show premeditation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 293-296; Dec. Dig. § 153.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 829*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction in an action for a homicide that the defendant is not on trial for selling whisky, nor for making an assault upon a third person, was properly refused where the charge of the court clearly stated for what offense the defendants were tried and restricted the trial to that issue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2011; Dec. Dig. § 829.*]

3. HOMICIDE (§ 309*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where in a prosecution for homicide the defendant requested an instruction that if when defendant shot the deceased they were struggling together, and the deceased entered into the combat willingly, they could only convict of manslaughter, unless it had been shown by the state that the shooting resulted from a premeditated purpose, which would have been carried out even if the deceased had not entered into the struggle, the instruction was properly refused for leaving out of consideration the presumption of murder in the second degree which arises from the killing with a deadly weapon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 649-656; Dec. Dig. § 309.*]

4. HOMICIDE (§ 7*)—MOTIVE.

While in a prosecution for homicide the case of the state may be strengthened by the showing of a motive when the evidence is circumstantial, proof of a motive is not necessary to justify a conviction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 12; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 770*)—TRIAL—PROVINCE OF COURTS.

It is the duty of the court to call the attention of the jury to the contentions of the parties which are supported by the evidence, so that a recital of the contentions of the state in summing up the contentions of both parties in a prosecution for homicide was proper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1806; Dec. Dig. § 770.*]

Brown and Allen, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Columbus County; Whedbee, Judge.

Robert Grainger and Missie Marlow were convicted of murder in the second degree, and appeal. Affirmed.

Lewis, Lyon & Greer and Irvin B. Tucker, for appellants. T. W. Bickett, Atty. Gen., and Geo. L. Jones, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

CLARK, C. J. The prisoners, Robert Grainger and Missie Marlow, were convicted of murder in the second degree. The evidence for the state showed: That they were living together without being married. That on the morning of April 28, 1911, in company with one Tyson, they went to Cerro Gordo, where Grainger got an express package out of the depot containing whisky. Grainger had a gun, and, before he got back into the buggy, Missie Marlow said to him: "You had better get a box of shells. You will have need of them this evening." Grainger bought the shells, and they started to Grist's, four miles away. On the way the parties took some 15 or 20 drinks of the whisky to which they had added some water, and the witness said they were "neither drunk nor sober" when they got to Grist's. On the way Grainger was constantly firing his gun, and Missie Marlow reloading the gun every time he fired it. On the road Grainger and Missie Marlow talked about Bud Nobles, the deceased. Grainger said: "Ain't you got an old sport at Grist's?" She denied it, and Grainger said, with an oath, that she knew she had, that it was Bud Nobles, and that he "would tend to him this evening." He made the same threat to her three or four times that he "would tend to Nobles" that evening. When they got to Grist's, Grainger shot and scared some little children, who ran into a ditch about 200 yards from the post office. Then Grainger said: "Let's drink some whisky." As the parties passed Smith's store, Bud Nobles was standing between the store and the old post office. Missie Marlow said to Grainger, "Yonder is the man you want;" and Grainger said, "How do you know it is?" Missie said, "I know him by the suit of clothes, and I want you to shoot his d—d head off;" and Grainger said, "I will do anything you say do." This was about half an hour before he shot Nobles. Grainger fired the gun twice at the house of Mr. Struthers. They then went on down the road about 300 yards, and Grainger said, "Let's stop and take a drink," and they all did so. They then drove up to a negro house and shot a time or two, and, after some profanity and rowdiness, Grainger jumped out of the buggy with his gun in his hand and his knucks on the other, and took after the darkey, whom he overtook and struck two or three times. Missie Marlow overtook him, and they went up the road together, and saw Bud Nobles standing in the yard of Wiley Hammond. Grainger then opened his gun and said, "Bring me some shells." Missie Marlow said, "Run here, Robert, I have got the shells." They ran towards each other, and Grainger got the shells from her. Nobles went on off up the street, when Grainger ran across and cut him off. Nobles' hands went up, palms out, and Grainger shot Nobles, and the latter fell.

He was unarmed. Grainger was four feet from Nobles when he shot him. Nobles died from the wound. There was other evidence of Grainger "shooting up" the town; Missie Marlow being with him.

The above was, in substance, the evidence for the state somewhat condensed. The evidence offered by the defendant tended to show that there was a fight between the two men, and that the prisoner Grainger was cut with a knife. McCumple, witness for the state, testified that he arrested Robert Grainger and Missie Marlow about 2 o'clock that night; that he saw his undershirt, and it was cut in several places; that there was a scar on his arm and two or three cuts in his back, but the cuts were not bleeding, and Grainger said that he had been cut in the arm the day before at Tyson's in trying to part some men in a row. He did not allude to the cuts on his back.

[1] The first 11 exceptions are to the allowance of the evidence as to the prisoner "tanking up" on whisky, his threats to Missie Marlow in regard to Nobles, and the conversation between them, and as to her identifying Nobles, and telling Grainger to shoot his head off, and his saying that he would do so, and the evidence generally in regard to Grainger "shooting up" the town. All this testimony was competent on the charge of murder in the first degree to show premeditation. The jury were lenient in not taking that view of it, but in letting the parties off with a conviction of murder in the second degree. It is true the prisoner testified that there had been a fight between him and the deceased, and on the trial the prisoner was stripped in the presence of the jury, and showed the cuts in his shirt and in his body. But the jury, in spite of the able defense of his counsel and the impassioned appeals to their sympathies, did not accept this version, but found that the prisoners were guilty of murder in the second degree. There is also further evidence for the state that the wounds on the prisoner's body were not fresh the night after the homicide. The jury rejected entirely the prisoner's allegation of self-defense.

The prisoner also relies upon an exception that the judge refused to give the following prayer for instruction: "The court instructs the jury that the prisoner is not on trial for selling whisky nor for making an assault upon Henry Johnson with a pair of knucks, and as independent facts should not be considered by the jury in arriving at a verdict in this case." The prisoner, Grainger, contends that at the time he fired the shots three persons were assaulting him with knives; that he was not in the wrong; that he attempted to get them to stop; that they cut him in the back, and knocked him down and he fired. The court told the jury that, if this was so, Grainger was not guilty of any offense, and it would be their duty to return a verdict of not guilty. The jury by their verdict utterly rejected the version of the affair contended for by the prisoners. Having rejected the prisoner's plea of self-defense, then, under the law, the jury would be compelled to return a verdict of murder in the second degree, unless the defendant had offered evidence tending to reduce the crime to manslaughter, and there was nothing in the evidence referred to in the above special instructions which tended to reduce or increase the grade of the crime committed. State v. Quick, 150 N. C. 820, 64 S. E. 168.

[2] The charge of the court clearly stated for what offense the prisoners were tried, and restricted the trial to that. This was a substantial compliance with the prayer. The prisoners refrained from arguing in their brief the eighteenth exception for refusal to give another prayer for instruction, though they do not expressly abandon it.

[3] That prayer could not have been given by the court, for it left out of consideration the presumption of murder in the second degree which arises from the killing with a deadly weapon.

[4] Nor was it error to refuse the prayer for instruction that it was incumbent upon the state to show motive on the part of Missie Marlow for desiring that death or bodily injury be inflicted on the deceased Bud Nobles. The law does not require that: "If such motive existed, it is the duty of the state to show the same to the jury." While the case may be strengthened by showing motive when the evidence is circumstantial, yet the state is never required to show such motive. State v. Adams, 136 N. C. 620, 48 S. E. 589; State v. Turner, 143 N. C. 642, 57 S. E. 158; State v. Stratford, 149 N. C. 483, 62 S. E. 882.

[5] Nor can we sustain exception 23, which is that the court recited the contentions of the state in summing up the contentions of both parties to the jury. In Walker v. Walker, 151 N. C. 167, 65 S. E. 925, Mr. Justice Manning said: "His honor was in this particular stating the contentions of the defendant, and there was evidence offered on the trial supporting this contention. It has been frequently held by this court that it is the duty of the trial judge to call to the attention of the jury those contentions of the parties which are supported by the evidence."

The prisoners were defended by able, eloquent, and zealous counsel. The case was tried by a very careful and able judge. The prisoners both testified in their own behalf. The jury, after weighing carefully and impartially all the evidence on both sides, have arrived at what may well be deemed a most merciful verdict. They might well have found upon this evidence the prisoners guilty of murder in the first degree.

In carefully considering the exceptions, we find no error committed which was prejudicial to the prisoners.

No error.

BROWN, J. (dissenting). Since I have been a member of this court I have never voted for a new trial in a criminal case unless I saw that some substantial and harmful error had been committed on the trial. I think that is the case here.

The court permitted the state to introduce evidence tending to prove that some time prior to defendant Grainger meeting with Nobles, the deceased, said defendant shot at Struther's house; that he came back up Hammond street, and met up with some negroes, and hit one of them; that he threatened to shoot one Hinson; that he shot at some colored children; that he made an assault on Henry Johnson with his gun and struck him with knucks; and that he was attempting to sell whisky. All this evidence it appears to me to be utterly incompetent and well calculated to seriously prejudice the defendants before the jury.

The plea of the defendant Grainger is self-defense, and his main reliance was his own testimony, and bringing all these extraneous and incompetent matters into the case undoubtedly greatly injured him. State v. Jones, 93 N. C. 611; State v. Barfield, 29 N. C. 299-308; 21 Cyc. p. 896; Whitaker v. State, 79 Ga. 87, 3 S. E. 403.

The prisoners ask the following instruction, which was refused, and they excepted: "The court instructs the jury that the prisoners are not on trial for selling whisky nor for making an assault upon Henry Johnson with a pair of brass knucks, and, as independent facts, should not be considered by the jury in arriving at a verdict in this case." The Attorney General, with his usual candor, says in his brief that in his opinion the court should have given that prayer, and admits that the evidence referred to in the instruction was not competent.

It is argued, however, that, inasmuch as the jury rejected the defendant's plea of self-defense, the error was harmless, as defendant would be guilty of murder in the second degree, the crime for which they stand convicted. It may be that the admission of all that incompetent evidence so prejudiced their minds that the jury rejected his plea and evidence entirely.

This was a proper and pertinent instruction, and, had it been given, it would have neutralized the effect of the incompetent evidence.

ALLEN, J., concurs in this dissent.

LANCE v. RUSSELL.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 20, 1911.)

1. TRUSTS (§ 305*)—RIGHT OF ACTION—FIDUCIARY RELATIONS.

The complaint alleging that plaintiff, owing defendant $800, conveyed land to him on a separate contemporaneous unrecorded agreement executed by them, that defendant should sell the land, subject to plaintiff's approval, and out of the proceeds pay the debt to himself, and the surplus to plaintiff; that defendant violated his agreement, and, without plaintiff's approval, sold and conveyed the land to B. for much less than its value; that B. has instituted action against plaintiff's tenant for possession; and that defendant has refused to account to plaintiff for the value of the land or the proceeds of the sale—states a cause of action, B., under such circumstances, having acquired title to the land, and plaintiff's only remedy being in such an action against defendant for an accounting for the value of the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Dec. Dig. § 305.*]

2. REFERENCE (§ 31*)—CONSENT REFERENCE—SETTING ASIDE ORDER.

While neither party to a consent reference can, without the consent of the other, withdraw therefrom, the order of reference, as well as the report, may be set aside by the court for good cause shown, as that plaintiff was misled, and consented to the reference because it was represented that a third person was a party to the agreement and would be bound by it, when, in fact, no one had authority to represent him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reference, Dec. Dig. § 31.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; Lane, Judge.

Action by F. A. Lance against J. N. Russell. From an order setting aside an order of reference, defendant appeals, and moves to dismiss the action. Motion denied, and order affirmed.

This action was commenced on the 16th day of November, 1903, and the complaint is as follows:

"(1) That on the 1st day of April, 1902, the plaintiff executed to the defendant a certain deed conveying to the said J. N. Russell a certain tract of land containing about 325 acres, situate in Limestone township, Buncombe county, N. C., bounded on one side by the French Broad river, the same being fully described in the deed aforesaid, which is duly registered on page 507 of Book No. 123 in the office of register of deeds of Buncombe county.

"(2) That the said deed was intended by the plaintiff and by the defendant to operate only as a deed in trust, and was accepted by the said defendant as such, and the plaintiff alleges that such was the only effect thereof.

"(3) That the trusts upon which the said defendant accepted said conveyance were set out in an instrument of writing executed by the said J. N. Russell simultaneously with the execution of said deed in trust.

That the original of said paper writing was left with J. McD. Whitson, now deceased, who was plaintiff's attorney in that transaction, and plaintiff has diligently searched for said instrument among the papers of the said J. McD. Whitson in the hands of his administrator and elsewhere, and has been unable to find said paper, and therefore plaintiff is unable to attach a copy thereof to his complaint; but, as plaintiff is informed and believes, the defendant has a copy of the same.

"(4) That at the time of execution of said deed in trust plaintiff was indebted to defendant in the sum of about $800 or $900, the exact amount being undetermined at that time, and the plaintiff, being desirous of securing to the defendant the payment of said indebtedness, executed the said deed in trust with the agreement that the said defendant should sell said land at a fair valuation, and from the proceeds of such sale pay off plaintiff's indebtedness to the defendant, and pay any overplus to the plaintiff, it being expressly understood and agreed between plaintiff and defendant that defendant should not sell said land for less than its real value, nor without the consent and approval of the plaintiff as to the price.

"(5) That afterwards, to wit, on the 17th day of June, 1903, the defendant undertook to convey, and did execute what purported to be a deed conveying to one H. T. Brown at the price of $3,500, the said land.

"(6) That according to plaintiff's best knowledge and belief, and he so avers the fact to be, the said land is worth the sum of $16,250, and the sum of $3,500 was a grossly inadequate price for said land, as the defendant then and there well knew.

"(7) That said alleged sale by the said defendant to the said H. T. Brown was made against the protest of the plaintiff.

"(8) That the defendant by said alleged sale of said land grossly abused his trust, and thereby damaged the plaintiff to the extent of $12,750.

"(9) That the said H. T. Brown has instituted suit in the superior court of Buncombe county against J. W. Ducker, plaintiff's tenant, for the possession of said land, claiming to own the same in fee simple by virtue of said alleged deed executed by the defendant as aforesaid.

"(10) That the defendant, J. N. Russell, has not accounted to the plaintiff for the proceeds of said alleged sale of said land or paid plaintiff anything on the account of such alleged sale.

"Wherefore, plaintiff prays the court that the defendant be required to account to the plaintiff for the full value of said land, and pay to the plaintiff the sum of $16,250 damage, caused by the abuse of his trust as hereinbefore alleged, for the costs of the action, and for such other and further relief as the nature and circumstances of the case will allow, or to the court may seem meet."

An answer was filed by the defendant, and at September term, 1907, the following entry appears on the minute docket: "By mutual agreement this case is referred to Gallatin Roberts, to take and state an account between the various parties."

The referee filed his report at May term, 1909, to which the plaintiff excepted, and at July term, 1911, the judge presiding made the following order, setting aside the report and the order of reference: "This cause coming on to be heard upon the motion of F. A. Lance, plaintiff, to set aside the order of reference, heretofore made in said cause, and upon the motion of John N. Russell, the defendant therein, to confirm the report of Gallatin Roberts, referee, heretofore appointed in said cause, the court finds the following facts:

"(1) That the said report was made in pursuance of the following agreement: 'The defendant, J. N. Russell, comes into court at this stage of the trial, and agrees that the suit of H. T. Brown against J. H. Ducker, and the suit of F. A. Lance against J. N. Russell, may be consolidated for the purpose of this consent decree, which proposition is as follows: That a decree may be entered in the case so consolidated, directing H. T. Brown to convey in fee simple to the plaintiff, F. A. Lance, the land in controversy in the action between H. T. Brown and J. W. Ducker, according to the metes and bounds described in the deed made from F. A. Lance to J. N. Russell, as set forth in the complaint, and that F. A. Lance shall pay off and discharge all of the indebtedness included in the trust agreement marked 'Exhibit A,' as provided for in that instrument, according to the terms and tenor thereof, together with interest lawfully incident to the said indebtedness, and that a referee be appointed by this court, under a consent decree, to state an account between the plaintiff, F. A. Lance, and the defendant, J. N. Russell, and H. T. Brown, and to ascertain what, if anything, is due and owing to the plaintiff, F. A. Lance, by reason of the rents and profits for which the defendant, J. N. Russell, or H. T. Brown, or either of them, by reason of any possession or occupation had and exercised by either J. N. Russell or H. T. Brown, or their tenants, over the land, or any part of the same, in controversy, and for the purpose of such accounting the defendant, J. N. Russell, and H. T. Brown, or both of them, shall be held accountable for the fair and reasonable rental value of the land in controversy, which the referee may determine the said J. N. Russell and H. T. Brown, or their tenants, to have been in the actual possession of. That it shall be decreed that this conveyance shall be made by H. T. Brown to F. A. Lance of any and all amounts of money payable by him under the terms of this agreement. That each side shall pay their own costs, and the court costs shall be divided equally between J. N. Russell and F. A. Lance, and that Gallatin Roberts, Esq., be appointed referee to state the account between F. A. Lance and J. N. Russell, and that the said referee shall report within — days from date. That the plaintiff, F. A. Lance, shall have 90 days from the time of the filing of his report by the referee in which to pay off the indebtedness upon the land in controversy.'

"(2) That the said Hugh T. Brown mentioned in said order did not consent to said order, and did not in any way become a party to said reference, and is not bound by any of the findings of said referee. That the plaintiff, F. A. Lance, entered into said agreement to refer with the full understanding that the said Hugh T. Brown was a party to such reference, and would not have entered into such agreement but for such understanding. That the said Lance believed, and had reason to believe, that said Brown was a party to such reference. That the said reference without such Brown being a party thereto was prejudicial to the rights of the plaintiff, F. A. Lance, and that the plaintiff should not be, and is not, bound by such reference or by the findings of the referee.

"(3) The court further finds as a fact, it being admitted by the parties, that after the filing of the report of Gallatin Roberts, the said referee, that the said Hugh T. Brown tendered a fee-simple deed to the said land to F. A. Lance, which offer has been continued.

"It is therefore, upon motion of counsel for the plaintiff, considered, ordered, and adjudged that the said report be not confirmed; that the said order of reference be set aside; and that the said cause stand for trial in its order on the civil issue docket of the superior court of Buncombe county."

The defendant excepted to this order, and appealed. H. T. Brown has not been made a party to this action. The defendant also moves in this court to dismiss the action, for that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

W. W. Jones and Chas. E. Jones, for appellant. Locke Craig and H. B. Carter, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. [1] The motion to dismiss the action upon the ground that the complaint is insufficient is based upon the allegations contained in the ninth paragraph of the complaint, the defendant contending that it is there, in substance, alleged that the plaintiff is resisting a recovery of possession of the land conveyed by the defendant to H. T. Brown, and, if so, that he is not entitled to an account of the purchase money. The allegations of the complaint do not, however, go as far as the defendant insists. It is not alleged that the plaintiff is a party to the action instituted against Ducker, or that there has been any refusal to surrender possession, or that any defense has been entered in the action. But, if these allegations were present, we think a fair construction of the complaint is that the plaintiff, being indebted to the defendant in the sum of $800 or $900, conveyed to him the land in controversy, and that there was a contemporaneous agreement, which was not registered, that the defendant should sell the land, subject to the approval of the plaintiff, and out of the proceeds of sale pay off the debt to the defendant, and pay any surplus to the plaintiff; that the defendant violated his agreement, and sold the land to H. T. Brown, without the approval of the plaintiff, for much less than its real value; that the said Brown has instituted an action against the tenant of the plaintiff to recover possession of the land, and that the defendant has refused to account to the plaintiff for the value of the land or for the proceeds of the sale to Brown. Under these allegations, Brown acquired title to the land, and the only redress for the plaintiff is against the defendant in this action. The case rests largely on the principles declared in Sprinkle v. Wellborn, 140 N. C. 178, 52 S. E. 666, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 174, 111 Am. St. Rep. 827, and in our opinion a cause of action is stated in the complaint.

[2] The remaining question is as to the power of the judge to set aside the order of reference and the report of the referee. If it was within his discretion, we have no right to interfere with its lawful exercise. The authorities seem to be uniform that neither party can withdraw from a consent reference, and that it cannot be set aside except by mutual consent, but that the court retains jurisdiction, and may, for good cause shown, set aside the order of reference as well as the report. Buskee v. Surles, 79 N. C. 53; Patrick v. Railroad, 101 N. C. 604, 8 S. E. 172; Smith v. Hicks, 108 N. C. 251, 12 S. E. 1035; Cummings v. Swepson, 124 N. C. 584, 32 S. E. 966; Brackett v. Gilliam, 125 N. C. 382, 34 S. E. 444. The judge, in effect, finds as a fact that the plaintiff was misled, and that he consented to the reference because it was represented that H. T. Brown was a party to the agreement, and would be bound by it, when, in fact, no one had authority to represent him, which is, we think, "good cause shown." In Kerr v. Hicks, 131 N. C. 90, 42 S. E. 532, a consent order of reference was modified and made compulsory upon a finding by the court that one of the parties excepted at the time the order was made, and, if this can be done, there is no reason for denying the power to set aside the order altogether, if one party is misled by the other, and thereby induced to agree to the reference.

We find no error.

Affirmed.

WILLIAMS et al., School Committee, v. BRADFORD.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 23, 1911.)

1. CIVIL RIGHTS (§ 9*)—SCHOOL TAX—DISCRIMINATION—WHITE AND COLORED RACES.

Priv. Laws 1911, c. 345, provides that, in order to increase the annual tax for the erecting of a school building for the whites in a certain school district, the patrons might apply to the county commissioners for an additional tax to raise funds to erect such building when the board should order the question submitted to the qualified voters of the district. Const. art. 9, § 2, provides that the General Assembly shall provide for a uniform system of public schools, and that the children of the white and colored races shall be taught in separate public schools; "but there shall be no discrimination of or prejudice of either race." Held, that the statute violated the Constitution, in that it discriminated against the colored race by requiring that the tax be issued to erect a building for the whites without leaving any discrimination in the local board as to the apportionment of the fund.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Civil Rights, Cent. Dig. § 6; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

2. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 48*)—STATUTES—CONSTITUTIONALITY—PRESUMPTIONS.

The courts must assume that the Legislature acted in good faith with the purpose of observing the constitutional limitations in enacting a statute, and every presumption must be indulged in favor of its constitutionality.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 46; Dec. Dig. § 48.*] Brown, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Camden County; Cline, Judge.

Proceedings by D. E. Williams and others, School Committee, against D. B. Bradford. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

This case was heard in the court below upon the following case agreed: Chapter 345, Private Laws of 1911, provides for the submitting to a vote of the people of the district the question of additional school tax, and the borrowing a sufficient amount to erect a building not to exceed $5,000, "for the whites in the school district, number nineteen." The patrons of school district No. 19, as set out in said chapter, applied to the board of county commissioners of Camden county asking for an additional tax, as provided in said chapter, for the purpose of erecting a school building for the whites in said district. There was an election held, and all requirements provided for in chapter 345 were carried out and complied with in every respect, and the majority of the qualified voters of said district voted for the additional school tax. The school committee contracted to erect a building to cost about $10,000, $5,000 of which was given by public subscription, and the committee issued bonds to the amount of $5,000 and advertised them for sale. The defendant, D. B. Bradford, was the highest bidder, at $1.01, and refused to take the bonds at that price and pay the money for them, upon the ground that the committee had no right to issue them, for the reason that the act is unconstitutional and the bonds are not valid. Chapter 345 is made a part of this statement of the case. The above facts are submitted to the court for its opinion and judgment. The court held the bonds to be invalid and that the defendant, therefore, is not required to accept them. Judgment was accordingly entered, and the plaintiffs excepted and appealed.

E. F. Aydlott, for appellants. J. C. B. Ehringhaus, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] This case presents but a single question and one which we think, in view of recent decisions of this court, is not difficult of solution. Our Constitution (article 9, § 2) provides as follows: "The General Assembly, at its first session under this Constitution, shall provide by taxation and otherwise for a general and uniform system of public schools, wherein tuition shall be free of charge to all the children of the state between the ages of six and twenty-one years. And the children of the white race and the children of the colored race shall be taught in separate public schools; but there shall be no discrimination in favor of, or to the prejudice of, either race." There is nothing in the act to indicate that any discretion whatever is left with the local board of administration as to the apportionment of the fund which will be raised by a sale of the bonds among the two races without discrimination, as was the case in Lowery v. School Trustees, 140 N. C. 39, 52 S. E. 267, and Bonitz v. School Trustees, 154 N. C. 379, 70 S. E. 735. The provision of the act in regard to the application of the fund to be raised by taxation requires that it shall be applied to the erection of a school building for the white people, and is as mandatory in this respect as it could have been expressed.

[2] Every presumption is to be indulged in favor of the validity of a statute, and all doubts should be resolved in support of it. We must always assume, when passing upon the constitutionality of a statute, that the Legislature acted with integrity and with an honest purpose to observe the restrictions and limitations imposed by law, 2 Lewis' Suth. Stat. Constr. (2d Ed.) § 82. It is also true that, where a duty is imposed or a power conferred upon a public agency, the necessary implication is that the duty should be performed and the power exercised in the manner prescribed in the Constitution. With every disposition to uphold this act, and inclining most favorably to every reasonable construction of it which would execute the legislative will and at the same time conform to the mandate of the Constitution, we are unable to sustain it; but must declare it to be void, as being in direct conflict with the plain requirements of the fundamental law. The act provides for only one thing, the levying of a tax for the purpose of erecting a school building "for the whites," and only for that purpose. The other provisions of the act relate to the machinery for levying and collecting the tax; but the proceeds of such tax, when collected, are to be applied entirely to the purpose thus clearly indicated and to no other. There is no room whatever for the exercise of any judgment or discretion by the local authorities themselves in the application or appropriation of the tax fund, according to the mandate of the Constitution; that is, without racial discrimination. In this respect, our case differs essentially from Lowery v. School Trustees and Bonitz v. School Trustees, already cited. In each of these cases, there were expressions in the statute which this court construed to mean that it was not the purpose to tax the people of the school district for the exclusive benefit of the one race or the other, and that while language was used which, if considered by itself, might lead to the conclusion that only one of the races was intended to receive the full and exclusive benefit of the tax, it was explained and its meaning so enlarged by other parts of the act as to avoid any discrimination between the races, and that, by a fair and reasonable construction of the whole act, reading and interpreting each provision with proper reference to the context, the true intent of the Legislature to apportion the fund between the two races fairly and reasonably and in accordance with the constitutional requirement was made apparent. When we bring this act to the test of our decision in Bonitz v. School Trustees, 154 N. C. 375, 70 S. E. 735, we can have no reasonable doubt as to its invalidity. Justice Hoke thus speaks for the entire court in that case: "The Constitution of this state (article 9, § 2), in providing for a 'uniform system of public schools wherein tuition shall be free of charge to all the children of the state between the ages of 6 and 21 years,' contains the requirement 'that the children of the white race and the children of the colored race shall be taught in separate schools,' and, further, 'but there shall be no discrimination in favor of or to the prejudice of either race.' In numerous and well-considered decisions this court has held that these provisions of our Constitution, in regard to the two races, are mandatory, and may be disregarded neither by the Legislature nor by officials charged with the duty of administering a given law. Smith v. School Trustees, 141 N. C. 143-159, 53 S. E. 524; Lowery v. School Trustees, 140 N. C. 33, 52 S. E. 267; Puitt v. Com'rs, 94 N. C. 709, 55 Am. Rep. 638; Riggsbee v. Durham, 94 N. C. 800. If, therefore, the act in question here, in designating a certain bound-dary as a 'school district for the white race,' can only be construed as requiring that the funds to be raised under its provisions should be applied exclusively to the white schools within such boundary and the additional facilities afforded only enjoyed by the white children attending such schools, it would be clearly unconstitutional."

The statute we now have under consideration manifestly falls under the condemnation of the law, as stated in that case, and therefore we are of the opinion that it is void, and so are the bonds which have been issued and sold under the supposed authority therein conferred.

This decision has nothing to do with the requirements of the Constitution that the two races shall be taught in separate schools. We will maintain that provision inviolate and in its full integrity. It is not a question in this case whether there shall be such a separation, but whether the Constitution shall be obeyed when it commands that there shall be no discrimination.

There was no error in the ruling of the court below, and we must affirm its judgment.

Affirmed.

BROWN, J. (dissenting). The question presented by this appeal is the validity of the bonds issued under chapter 345, Private Laws of 1911. This act of the General Assembly provides for the levying of an annual tax for the purpose of building a school building for the whites, and authorizes borrowing the money necessary to construct such building, and directs that the special annual tax be applied to the payment of such debt. It is very important to bear in mind that there is no tax levied or debt authorized to be contracted for the maintenance of any schools, white or colored. Nor does the act provide for the building of a colored schoolhouse, for none is needed. So far as the record shows, the colored race is already provided with a suitable and sufficient school building, but the whites are not.

This point has never before been decided in this state, and I think the court has misapplied the former decisions of this court. If the act provided for the levying of a special tax for the sole maintenance and support of the white schools to the exclusion of the colored, then I should say it discriminated against the colored race and would be in violation of article 9, § 2, of our state Constitution. This section reads as follows: "The General Assembly, at its first session under this Constitution, shall provide by taxation and otherwise for a general and uniform system of public schools, wherein tuition shall be free of charge to all the children of the state between the ages of six and twenty-one years. And the children of the white race and the children of the colored race shall be taught in separate public schools; but there shall be no discrimination in favor of or to the prejudice of either race." We find in this section the peremptory mandate of the Constitution that the children of the white race and the children of the colored race shall be taught in separate public schools. How is this to be accomplished unless separate school buildings can be provided necessary for the accommodation of each race? When the General Assembly is commanded to see to it that the two races are taught in separate public schools, it is certainly invested by necessary implication with the power to give effect to that command by providing for the erection of suitable buildings for each race. It is not obliged to provide for buildings for each race at the same time and in the same enactment. It may provide for a building at one session for the white race and at its next session for the colored race, or the latter may be already provided for. Certainly there is no discrimination apparent in the act, because a white school building is a constitutional necessity in which the colored race can have no share or interest. It surely cannot be contended that every time a white schoolhouse is built a colored schoolhouse must also be erected, regardless of the needs of the two races. We have repeatedly affirmed the doctrine that "courts will not adjudge an act of the Legislature invalid unless its violation of the Constitution is clear, complete, and unmistakable." This is the language of Mr. Black quoted with approval in Bonitz v. School Trustees, 154 N. C. 379, 70 S. E. 735, 736.

As the colored race in South Mills township, Camden county, to which this act applies, is doubtless already provided with a school building suitable to their needs (no complaint is made that they are not), and as the white race evidently is not so provided, I think it was the duty of the General Assembly to provide for the erection of a suitable building. That is all that this legislation undertakes to do, and there is nothing discriminatory on its face. The fact that the Legislature did not provide the means in the same enactment for the erection at the same time of a colored school building should be conclusive that none is needed for that race.

BROWN, School Treasurer, et al. v. SPRAY, Town Treasurer, et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 23, 1911.)

1. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 19*)—PUBLIC SCHOOLS—SCHOOL TREASURER.

Priv. Laws 1907, c. 237, authorized the town of Canton to issue bonds for various purposes, including a graded school building; the town being constituted a school district. A school board was created and a special tax levied for the maintenance of schools, to be collected by the tax collector and paid to the town treasurer, to be disbursed by him under order of the school board. A special finance committee was provided for with large powers of supervision and control as to contracts made by the governing agencies of the town, and with control over the proceeds of special tax bonds. Priv. Laws 1909, c. 27, amending the former act, provided that the finance committee should have no control over money issued for the building of schools, or over the schools or the taxes collected therefor to be expended in their behalf, and that the school trustees might elect a treasurer, who should have charge of the school money and the proceeds of the sale of the school bonds. Held that, as the original act and amendment should be considered as one act, the town tax collector should pay over school taxes directly to the school treasurer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

2. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 91*)—PUBLIC SCHOOLS—SCHOOL TREASURER.

The validity of the provision of Priv. Laws 1909, c. 27, requiring the town tax collector to pay over school funds in the first instance to the school treasurer, and amending Priv. Laws 1907, c. 237, which authorized the town of Canton to issue bonds for school purposes and other purposes, is not affected because other portions of the act authorized the issuance of bonds, other than those for school purposes, at a higher rate of interest than was specified when the proposition was submitted to the people.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Dec. Dig. § 91.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Haywood County; Webb, Judge.

Mandamus by A. E. Brown, treasurer of the school board of the town of Canton, and others, against H. W. Spray, treasurer of the town of Canton and tax collector, and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Modified and affirmed.

J. Bat. Smathers and Smathers & Morgan, for appellants. W. T. Crawford, for appellees.

HOKE, J. [1] By statute (Priv. Laws 1907, c. 237) the General Assembly authorized the town of Canton, Haywood county, on approval of voters of the town, to issue bonds in the sum of $65,000 for water supply, sewerage, electric lights, a graded school building, and street improvements and to lay a special tax to pay accruing interest, etc. By section 11 of the act, the town is constituted the "Canton graded school district for white and colored children," and in subsequent sections a school board is created, having general management and control of the schools therein, a special tax is levied for the maintenance of the school to be collected by the tax collector and paid to the town treasurer, to be kept separate and apart, etc., and paid out under order of the school board, etc. Provision is also made for purchase of sites and erecting suitable buildings, etc., for school purposes. By section 7 of the act in question, a finance committee is established and designated by name, and this committee is given large powers of supervision and control in reference to the contracts entered into by the governing agencies of the town, the disposition of the proceeds of the special tax bonds, etc., the establishment of the graded schools, and purchase of sites and erections of buildings therefor, etc. By a subsequent act (Priv. Laws 1909, c. 27) this former statute was amended, and in reference to the question presented the last statute provides as follows:

"Sec. 4. That section seven of said chapter two hundred and thirty-seven be and the same is hereby amended by striking out all after the word 'act,' in line four, down to and including the word 'school,' in line six, it being the purpose of this section to provide that said finance committee shall have no control or authority over the money to be issued for erecting said graded school buildings, nor shall said finance committee have any control or authority whatever over said graded schools or any taxes levied or collected for said graded schools to be expended in their behalf.

"Sec. 5. That section 19 of said chapter be amended by striking out, in line fourteen, the words 'subject to the approval of the finance committee, as aforesaid.'" This section 19 is the section of the former act referring to the portions of the proceeds from sale of said bonds available for school purposes.

"Sec. 6. That section twenty is hereby amended by striking out, in line two, the words 'subject to the approval of the finance committee.'" Section 20 requires approval of finance committee as to purchase of school sites.

"Sec. 7. That the said board of graded-school trustees shall have the power and they are hereby authorized to select a treasurer of said board who shall have charge of the proceeds to be derived from the sale of said school bonds and who shall also have charge of all school money collected under the provisions of this act. Said treasurer shall be elected by said board of school trustees and shall hold his office for a term of two years, until his successor is elected and qualifies. He shall receive as compensation for his services the same commission as is paid to the treasurer of the town of Canton for his services. He shall give such bond for the faithful performance of his services as said board may determine, and shall only pay out moneys which may come into his hands upon the order of the board of trustees."

It is familiar doctrine "that an original act and an amendment to it shall be considered as one act and so far as regards an action after the amendment is adopted, shall be construed as if it had read from the beginning, as it does with the amendment added to it or incorporated in it." Black on Interpretation of Laws, pp. 356, 357. And on perusal of the original act and the amendment it is clear that the Legislature intended to place the entire management, guidance, and control of these graded school matters, financial and otherwise, with the board of school trustees and its officers and agent, that the taxes levied for school purposes shall be paid direct from the town tax collector to the treasurer selected by the school board, and that the contracts of this board and the disposition of the school funds arising from the sale of bonds or otherwise are to be no longer subject to the finance committee. The application of $1,178.57, the portion of the school tax paid by the Champion Fiber Company for 1911 to the general bonded indebtedness of the town, was without warrant of law, and the judgment very properly directs that this same shall be paid to the treasurer of the school board, together with any and all other sums devoted to school purposes. By the terms of the statute, the tax was levied for school purposes, and is to be kept separate and applied to the purpose designated. 8 Abbott, Municipal Corporations, §§ 1069-1071.

[2] Our conclusion is not affected because the amendatory act in the first section authorizes the commissioners to issue a portion of the bonds at a higher rate of interest than was specified, when the proposition was submitted to the people. We do not see that the validity of these bonds is in any way presented, and, if it were otherwise, this provision for the enhancement of interest does not extend to the portion of the bonds applicable to school purposes.

The judgment of the court will be so modified that the town tax collector shall pay the taxes levied and collected for school purposes directly to the treasurer of the school board, and, with this modification, the judgment of his honor is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Halifax County; Ferguson, Judge.

Action by the Commercial & Farmers' Bank against the Scotland Neck Bank and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant F. P. Shields appeals. Affirmed.

This case was heard below upon facts agreed, as follows:

"(1) Both plaintiff and defendant Scotland Neck Bank are, and were at the time of the acts hereinafter set out, corporations of this state, doing a general business.

"(2) On November 1, 1904, S. W. Morrisett and J. G. Morrisett, partners as Morrisett Bros., gave their note to defendant Scotland Neck Bank for $15,000 for borrowed money, and, to secure the same, S. W. Morrisett and wife executed to the said Scotland Neck Bank a mortgage on real estate in the town of Scotland Neck, N. C., which was duly recorded.

"(3) Some time after the maturity of the note and demand for payment, Morrisett Bros., through S. W. Morrisett, requested the plaintiff bank to take up said note and mortgage and carry the same for them, which plaintiff agreed to do, upon the distinct understanding and agreement between it and Morrisett Bros. that they should have the Scotland Neck Bank transfer and assign to plaintiff the note and mortgage as security for the amount so furnished by it.

"(4) In pursuance of said agreement, the plaintiff on October 2, 1905, furnished Morrisett Bros. with an amount of money sufficient to take up said note and mortgage (for which funds Morrisett Bros. executed to it their note), and Morrisett Bros., acting by and through said S. W. Morrisett, on the 4th day of October, 1905, with the funds so furnished by plaintiff, under the understanding and agreement aforesaid, paid the Scotland Neck Bank the amount of the note and mortgage, and at the time of payment the Scotland Neck Bank, at the request of S. W. Morrisett, transferred directly to S. W. Morrisett the note and mortgage, indorsing on each the following: 'Transferred to S. W. Morrisett without recourse. Scotland Neck Bank, W. R. Bond, Asst. Cashier. Oct. 4, 1905.'

"(5) At the time of the payment for and transfer of the note and mortgage aforesaid the Scotland Neck Bank had no notice of the understanding and agreement between plaintiff and Morrisett Bros. or S. W. Morrisett, and did not know from whom or how Morrisett Bros. obtained the funds with which the payment was made.

"(6) In making the payment and having the note and mortgage transferred to S. W. Morrisett, as aforesaid, it was the purpose and intention of Morrisett Bros. and S. W. Morrisett that plaintiff was to be the holder and owner of said note and mortgage, but, not desiring the Scotland Neck Bank to know from whom they obtained the money or of their dealings with the plaintiff bank, and being ignorant of any legal effect such transfer might have, had the transfer made directly to S. W. Morrisett, as aforesaid.

"(7) In furtherance of said intention and purpose, and in order to comply with the understanding between Morrisett Bros. and plaintiff, S. W. Morrisett on the following day, October 5, 1905, transferred and delivered to the plaintiff the note and mortgage as collateral security for the note of Morrisett Bros., which they executed for the funds furnished by plaintiff, said note being given on that date for $2,500 ($1,500 of which was for the money furnished by plaintiff to take up the note and mortgage held by the Scotland Neck Bank), the note since then having been renewed from time to time, the last renewal being dated May 1, 1908.

"(8) There is now due on the $2,500 note the sum of $1,500, and interest, $1,000 having been paid on same; and said note, as well as the note and mortgage purchased from the Scotland Neck Bank, is long past due.

"(9) Some time after the execution of said notes and the payment and transfer of the note and mortgage, as hereinbefore set out, to wit, on December 19, 1908, Morrisett Bros. duly executed to defendant F. P. Shields a deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors (without preference), which was duly recorded, and in which was conveyed, with other property, the real estate in Scotland Neck, N. C., which was conveyed in the mortgage by S. W. Morrisett to the Scotland Neck Bank.

"(10) That prior to the date of the deed of assignment, as well as afterwards, plaintiff has demanded of Morrisett Bros. payment of their note, which has been refused.

"(11) Plaintiff has demanded of the Scotland Neck Bank that it foreclose the mortgage executed to it by S. W. Morrisett and wife by selling the real estate therein conveyed under the terms and provisions of the same to satisfy the note of Morrisett Bros. secured by it, but said bank has refused and still refuses to do so. The said mortgage has not been canceled on the record.

"(12) Defendants contend that the transaction in regard to the note and mortgage, and the transfer of the same to S. W. Morrisett by Scotland Neck Bank, as set forth in the foregoing statement of facts, was in law a payment of the note and a cancellation of the mortgage as to F. P. Shields, assignee under said deed of assignment, and as to him and the creditors of Morrisett Bros. the mortgage is not in force, while plaintiff contends that such payment and transfer of the note and mortgage did not have that effect, and that the mortgage is still in force as against Shields, assignee, and all others, at least in equity, and is a subsisting security for the debt of Morrisett Bros. to it.

"(13) It is agreed that, if the court shall be of the opinion that the payment of the said note and mortgage and transfer of the same by the Scotland Neck Bank to said S. W. Morrisett, as set out in the foregoing statement of facts, was not, as to defendant F. P. Shields, assignee or grantee under the deed of assignment, a payment of the note and cancellation of this mortgage, and that said mortgage is in force as against Shields as assignee, judgment shall be entered requiring the defendant Scotland Neck Bank to foreclose the mortgage according to the provisions and terms thereof for the benefit of the plaintiff bank.

"(14) It is further agreed that the costs of the action be divided equally between plaintiff and defendant F. P. Shields, assignee. The note for $2,500 given by Morrisett Bros. to the plaintiff refers to the other note and mortgage for $1,500 purchased from the Scotland Neck Bank as collateral security for its payment, and it is described therein as having been indorsed by S. W. Morrisett to the plaintiff for that purpose, and the note for $1,500 to the Scotland Neck Bank, secured by the mortgage, is indorsed as follows: 'Transferred to Commercial & Farmers' Bank (the plaintiff) as collateral. [Signed] S. W. Morrisett.'"

The court rendered the following judgment: "This cause coming on to be heard, and being heard, and fully considered upon the facts agreed, the court is of the opinion that S. W. Morrisett at the time he paid the money to the Scotland Neck Bank and took the assignment of said note and mortgage was not the holder of the same in his own right or in the right of Morrisett Bros., but in the right of the Commercial & Farmers' Bank, as trustee for said bank, and therefore it is ordered and adjudged that said note and mortgage was not discharged, but is in full force and effect, and it is thereupon ordered and adjudged that the Scotland Neck Bank foreclose said mortgage according to the provision and terms thereof. It is further ordered that the plaintiff and the defendant F. P. Shields, assignee, each pay one-half of the cost. G. S. Ferguson, Judge."

Defendant F. P. Shields, assignee, excepted and appealed.

Kitchin & Smith, for appellant. R. C. Dunn and Murray Allen, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). The plaintiff's claim appeals very strongly to the conscience of the court, and we think it is sustained by well-settled principles.

[1] The doctrine of subrogation rests upon principles of natural justice and equity, and there are numerous authorities which support the rule that one who at the request of another advances money to pay off a security or incumbrance, in which the latter is interested or to the discharge of which he is bound, under the agreement that he shall have the benefit of the creditor's security, is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the creditor in the security, and some cases hold that, in the absence of an express agreement, one will be implied that the security shall subsist for the use and benefit of the lender of the money, and it will be so enforced. Gans v. Thleme, 93 N. Y. 225; Levy v. Martin, 48 Wis. 198, 4 N. W. 35; Wilkins v. Gibson, 113 Ga. 31, 38 S. E. 374, 84 Am. St. Rep. 204. One who pays a debt at the instance of the debtor, under such circumstances that it appears to have been contemplated by the parties that he should become entitled to the benefit of the security for the debt held by the creditor from the debtor, may as against the debtor and the debtor's estate be subrogated to the benefit of such security and of the debt which he has discharged. And a party who has paid a debt at the request of the debtor, under circumstances which would operate a fraud upon him if the debtor were afterwards allowed to insist that the security for the debt was discharged by this payment, may also be subrogated to the security as against the debtor. But this subrogation will not be allowed against one interested in the property held as security, who was a stranger to the transaction by which the payment was made, and who was under no obligation for the payment of the debt, unless it appears that the payment was made, not as an extinguishment of the debt, but in reliance upon, and as a purchase of, the security. This is a species of conventional subrogation, being a subrogation by an implied convention or agreement. Accordingly, it will not be allowed if it appears not to have been intended by the parties, though this intention, if not expressed, may ordinarily be determined from the circumstances attending the transaction. Sheldon on Subrogation, § 274. The authorities are entirely agreed, though, that where a person advances money to pay off a mortgage debt under an agreement with the owner of the equity of redemption or his representative that he shall hold the mortgage as security for his advance, but the mortgage, instead of being assigned to him, is discharged in whole or in part, he is yet entitled as against subsequent parties in interest to be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee, and to enforce the mortgage. Sheldon on Subrogation, § 19; 37 Cyc. 467, 471; Crippen v. Chappell, 35 Kan. 495, 11 Pac. 453, 57 Am. Rep. 187; Fievel v. Zuber, 67 Tex. 275, 8 S. W. 273. In the case last mentioned it is said that no different rule has been found except in Louisiana, where the law of the subject is governed by statute. Numerous authorities are cited in support of the rule, and the following passage from Domat, in which the principle is clearly and strongly stated, is quoted with approval: "One may acquire the privilege of a creditor without substitution in the same manner as a mortgage by agreement with the debtor that he who shall pay for him shall have the privilege; and it makes no difference whether the payment be made to the creditor by him who lends the money or by the debtor with whom the money has been intrusted." 2 Strahan's Domat's Civil Law (Cushing's Ed.) p. 698, § 1783.

The subject is fully discussed in 1 Jones on Mortgages (8th Ed.) § 874 et seq. and all the authorities collected. It is there said that the principle is well settled that when the money is advanced at the request of the debtor or creditor, with the agreement that an assignment should be made or that subrogation should take place, or, what is the same thing in law, that the lender should have the benefit of the security, in either of the cases, it will be kept on foot for the repayment of the amount advanced by the lender, and there seems to be no ruling to the contrary. Downer v. Miller, 15 Wis. 612, seems to be exactly like this case in all respects. It decides every point raised in favor of the plaintiff, viz., that there clearly exists the right of conventional subrogation; that the express assent of the creditor, who received the money from the party claiming the right, is not necessary; and that the assignee takes subject to plaintiff's equity. Lyness was the creditor, Steever the debtor, and Miller the one who advanced the money and claimed the right of subrogation. The court said: "Miller's rights, therefore, must depend entirely on the effect of the agreement between him and Steever, and that we deem sufficient to justify the judgment of the circuit court. That agreement was that Miller was to indorse for Steever so as to enable the latter to raise the money at the bank, but that the money was to be used not to pay and extinguish the Lyness judgment, but to procure an assignment of it to Miller, to indemnify him as the indorser. To use the money thus obtained to pay the judgment and have it discharged would operate as a fraud upon Miller, and it is upon this ground that he was entitled to the relief given by the court below. It may be conceded that such relief could not have been given against any party, who, relying upon the discharge of the Lyness judgment, has acquired an interest in the property for a valuable consideration, without notice of Miller's equitable rights. But the appellant here does not stand in such a position. His rights were subsequent and subject to the Lyness mortgage. * * * Nor is the fact that Lyness was not party to the agreement that his decree should be assigned for Miller's security any reason why that agreement should not be enforced. It was a matter of indifference to him whether the decree was assigned or discharged; and, where justice between others requires it to be assigned, he should not be allowed to prevent it upon the supposed technical right to control his own decree. The enforcement of this agreement between Miller and Steever without reference to the question whether Lyness assented to it is entirely analogous to the principle of subrogation, where the assent or agreement of the creditor who gets the money is not essential to the right. If a surety pays a debt, he has a right to be subrogated to the securities of the creditor, and the latter would not be allowed to object, for it is a matter of indifference to him. It is equally true here, though Miller's right is not (strictly) that of subrogation, but grows out of the agreement between him and Steever. That agreement is one which should have been enforced, even though Lyness had adhered to his refusal to assign the decree. But here he voluntarily consented in the end to make the assignment." Shreve v. Hankinson, 34 N. J. Eq. 76; 1 Pingrey on Mortgages, § 1175. "Where the amount due on mortgages is paid by a third person at the request of the mortgagor, and there is no understanding that they shall be considered satisfied, a court of equity will, for purposes of justice, keep the mortgages alive, and much more so if the party takes an assignment of the mortgages." Tolman v. Smith, 85 Cal. 280, 24 Pac. 743; Gans v. Thleme, 93 N. Y. 232; Yaple v. Stephens, 36 Kan. 680, 14 Pac. 222; Bacon v. Goodnow, 59 N. H. 415.

The case of Gans v. Thleme is a very strong authority for the position that, under the facts of this case, the plaintiff, who, at the request of the Morrisett Bros., advanced the money to pay the debt owing to the defendant bank, is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the latter in the debt and mortgage, as will appear from the following extract: "It is no doubt true, however, as the learned counsel for the respondents argues, that a volunteer cannot acquire either an equitable lien or the right to subrogation (Sandford v. McLean, 3 Paige [N. Y.] 122 [23 Am. Dec. 773]; Wilkes v. Harper, 1 N. Y. 586; Id., 2 Barb. Ch. [N. Y.] 338), but one who, at the request of another, advances his money to redeem or even pay off a security in which that other has an interest, or to the discharge of which he is bound, is not of that character, and, in the absence of an express agreement, one would be implied, if necessary, that it shall subsist for his use, and it will be so enforced. But the doctrine of substitution may be applied, although there is no contract, express or implied. It is said to rest 'on the basis of mere equity and benevolence' (Cheeseborough v. Millard, 1 Johns. Ch. [N. Y.] 409 [7 Am. Dec. 494]; 1 Story's Equity Jurisprudence, § 943), and is resorted to for the purpose of doing justice between the parties." Why should this not be the true doctrine, when the money is paid at the request of the debtor, with the agreement that the security should continue for the benefit of him who advanced the money? The creditor is not prejudiced in any way or to any extent. The debtor has made the promise and has derived a clear benefit by the payment to his creditor, and in a court of equity he will not be heard to say that the arrangement has failed by reason of the fact that he violated his instructions or agreement if he did, and took an assignment to himself, instead of the plaintiff. The mortgage has not been canceled, and, even if it had been, a court of equity would not regard the cancellation as in the way of enforcing the undoubted right of the plaintiff to relief, provided there has intervened no new right acquired for value and without notice, which will be prejudiced if the lien is enforced. The law will not allow the debtor to avail himself of the breach of trust and thereby defeat the right created by his agreement, upon the faith of which the money was advanced, but will regard the assignment as made for the benefit of him to whom it justly belonged, as we have already shown. Dudley v. Bergen, 23 N. J. Eq. 397; Russell v. Mixer, 42 Cal. 475; Cobb v. Dyer, 69 Me. 494; Seiberling v. Tipton, 118 Mo. 373, 21 S. W. 4; Bruce v. Bonney, 12 Gray (Mass.) 107, 71 Am. Dec. 739.

In Russell v. Mixer, supra, it is said: "The only question presented is whether or not, upon the facts stated in the amended complaint, the plaintiff is entitled to the relief he obtained. We think that there can be no doubt that he is. The agreement between Miller and himself was for an assignment and transfer of the mortgage. The mistake occurred wholly in the selection of the means by which this agreement was to be effectuated. There is no appreciable distinction between this case and that where a scrivener through ignorance or inattention, fails to select or prepare such an instrument as effectuates the previous agreement of parties, and relief is always decreed in that case. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 115. Had the recorder here, upon being informed by the parties that the agreement between them was that the mortgage in question should be more effectually transferred to Russell, prepared a release, instead of an assignment, whether he did so through mere inattention to what he was doing, or through a misapprehension of its legal effect in the premises, there would be no doubt that equity would relieve against the mistake. The rule must be the same in a case where the parties have made the mistake for themselves, and without the aid of either scrivener or recorder." But in Moring v. Privott, 146 N. C. 558, 60 S. E. 509, we find an authority which clearly sustains the plaintiff's right of subrogation. It is there said that subrogation is of equitable origin, not dependent upon contract, and is always invoked to prevent injustice. It is defined to be the substitution of another person in the place of a creditor, so that the person in whose favor it is exercised succeeds to the rights of the creditor in relation to the debt, * * * or that change by which another person is put into the place of a creditor, so that the rights and securities of the creditor pass to the person who, by being subrogated to him, enters into his right. It is a legal fiction, by force of which an obligation extinguished by a payment by a third person is treated as still subsisting for the benefit of this third person, who is thus substituted to the rights, remedies, and securities of another. The party who is subrogated is regarded as entitled to the same rights, and, indeed, as constituting one and the same person with the creditor whom he succeeds. Sheldon, Sub. 2; 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. 206; Davison v. Gregory, 132 N. C. 389, 43 S. E. 916; Carter v. Jones, 40 N. C. 196, 49 Am. Dec. 425; Springs v. Harven, 56 N. C. 96. But the court, quoting from and approving Robinson v. Leavitt, 7 N. H. 73, further said: "There are cases in which a party who has paid money due upon a mortgage is entitled, for the purpose of effecting the substantial justice of the case, to be substituted in the place of the incumbrancer and treated as assignee of the mortgage, and is enabled to hold the land as assignee, notwithstanding the mortgage itself has been canceled and the debt discharged. The true principle is that, when money due upon a mortgage is paid, it shall operate as a discharge of the mortgage or in the nature of an assignment of it as may best serve the purpose of justice and the just intent of the parties. Many cases state the rule in equity to be that the incumbrance shall be kept on foot or considered extinguished or merged, according to the intent or interest of the party paying the money. * * * And it makes no difference whether the party on payment of the money took an assignment of the mortgage or a release, or whether a discharge was made and the evidence of the debt canceled. The debt itself may still be held to subsist in him who paid the money as assignee, so far as it ought to subsist, in the nature of a lien upon the land, and the mortgage be considered in force for his benefit, so far as he ought in justice to hold the land under it, as if it had been actually assigned to him."

There are numerous authorities of like tenor. Our recent decision in Tripp v. Harris, 154 N. C. 296, 70 S. E. 470, is directly in point. We there held that, where the note secured by a mortgage is paid by a surety thereon, the note is satisfied, but an implied promise of the principal to reimburse the surety at once arises, and that he is subrogated to the rights of the creditor in all securities held by him, and he may, with or without any formal assignment, avail himself thereof for the purpose of indemnifying himself, and, if the security be a mortgage, he may foreclose the same for his own benefit, a creditor of the principal. Our case presents a much stronger equity in favor of the plaintiff, as there the mortgage was not canceled on the record or otherwise. There was an express agreement for subrogation. Morrisett received the note as agent for the plaintiff, and had no authority in law or in fact to take an assignment to himself, and the next day he actually delivered note and mortgage, which he had received from the creditor in execution of the agreement, to the plaintiff. The conduct of Morrisett shows conclusively that he did not take the assignment to himself for his own benefit and with the purpose of satisfying the debt and canceling the note, but for the use and benefit of the plaintiff bank, in accordance with the agreement between them, because he almost immediately transferred and delivered the note and mortgage to it. In the case of Liles v. Rogers, 113 N. C. 197, 18 S. E. 104, 37 Am. St. Rep. 627, this court recognized the doctrine of conventional subrogation, and it is there said that where the money is paid to the creditor by another, at the request of the debtor, to discharge his obligation, the person who advanced the money is in equity subrogated to the rights of the creditor in the securities held by him.

[2, 3] We do not understand that the Morrisetts or the defendant bank are contesting the right of the plaintiff, the appeal having been taken by the assignee of the Morrisetts, and he stands in no better position than his assignors would have held if the general assignment had not been made by them. "It may be said generally that an assignee succeeds only to the rights of his assignor and is affected by all equities against him, and takes the property subject to all such equities." Justice Shepherd thus states the rule in Wallace v. Cohen, 111 N. C. 106, 15 S. E. 893: "It is true, as laid down in Southerland v. Fremont, 107 N. C. 565 [12 S. E. 237], that such a trustee or mortgagee is a purchaser for value within St. 13, 27 Eliz., but it is in that case conclusively determined, after some confusion in our decisions, that such a purchaser takes the property subject to any equity or other right that attached to the same in the hands of the debtor. This view is abundantly sustained, not only by our own previous decisions, but by the great weight of judicial authority. Bassett v. Norsworthy, White & Tudor's L. C. Eq., and notes. As applicable to the present case, the doctrine has been recognized and applied in a large number of decisions. 'In order to entitle one to protection as a bona fide purchaser in such a case, he must have advanced some new consideration, or incurred some new liability, on the faith of the fraudulent vendee's apparent ownership.' Johnson v. Peck, 1 Woodb. & M. 334; McLeod v. Bank, 42 Miss. 99; Hyde v. Ellery, 18 Md. 496; Sargent v. Sturm, 23 Cal. 359, 83 Am. Dec. 118; Ratcliffe v. Sangston, 18 Md. 883; Pope v. Pope, 40 Miss. 516. Hence 'an assignee of the fraudulent vendee for the benefit of creditors, incurring no new liability on the faith of his title, is not protected.' Farley v. Lincoln, 51 N. H. 577, 12 Am. Rep. 182; Harris v. Horner, 21 N. C. 455, 30 Am. Dec. 182; Stevens v. Brennan, 79 N. Y. 254; Montgomery v. Bucyrus, 92 U. S. 257, 23 L. Ed. 656; Donaldson v. Farwell, 98 U. S. 631, 23 L. Ed. 993. These authorities, with very many others we could cite, are directly in point, and sustain the right of the plaintiffs to recover without fixing the assignee with notice." This has always been the settled law in this state and certainly since Potts v. Blackwell, 56 N. C. 449, was decided. This doctrine is so well established that it requires no further discussion.

[4] Besides, the record of an uncanceled mortgage upon real estate charges subsequent purchasers with notice of the incumbrance. Smith v. Stark, 3 Colo. App. 453, 34 Pac. 258.

The court was right in giving judgment for the plaintiff upon the case agreed.

No error.

STATE v. GOFFNEY.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 20, 1911.)

1. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 91*)— DESIGNATION OF OFFENSE.

An indictment for housebreaking, charging that the defendant did break and enter (otherwise than by burglarious breaking) with intent to commit a felony, to wit, with intent "feloniously to steal," defines the offense as accurately as if it alleged that the breaking and entering was feloniously done, and was sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 261-265; Dec. Dig. § 91.* Burglary, Cent. Dig. § 36.]

2. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 110*) — SUFFICIENCY OF ACCUSATION.

An indictment charging that a defendant did break and enter (otherwise than by burglarious breaking) a storeroom and house with "intent to commit a felony," charges the offense in the words of the statute (Revisal 1905, § 3333), and is sufficient.

3. BURGLARY (§ 15*)—DEFENSE—CONSENT OF OWNER.

Though a store was broken into with burglarious intent, where the entry was induced by the servant of the owner at the instance of such owner, though with an intent to apprehend the accused, there is such a consent to the entry as to destroy its criminal effect, and a conviction therefor as for a felonious breaking and entering was improper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Burglary, Cent. Dig. §§ 20-23; Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Wilson County; Cooke, Judge.

Sylvester Goffney was convicted of house-breaking, and appeals. Reversed, and proceeding dismissed.

Daniels & Swindell, for appellant. T. W. Bickett, Atty. Gen., and G. L. Jones, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BROWN, J. 1. The defendant moved in arrest of judgment because the word "felonious" is not charged in the bill. The charge is that defendant did break and enter (otherwise than by burglarious breaking) the storeroom and house of Geo. Barnes and Joe Barnes, partners, etc., with intent to commit a felony, to wit, with intent the goods, etc., of said Barnes Bros., etc., feloniously to steal, etc.

[1, 2] The defendant attacks the bill of indictment for the reason that it does not allege that the breaking and entering into the storeroom was feloniously done. We think this exception is without merit. The indictment alleges that the defendant did break and enter with intent to commit a felony. We are unable to draw any distinction between the words, "unlawfully breaking and entering with the intent to commit a felony," and the words, "unlawfully and feloniously breaking and entering with the intent to commit a felony." Using the word "felonious" as it is used in the indictment defines the offense as accurately as if it were repeated. In other words, if one breaks into a house with intent to commit a felony, he feloniously breaks into the house. The indictment follows the wording of the statute. An indictment like the one at bar in this respect was held good in the case of State v. Tytus, 98 N. C. 705, 4 S. E. 29. See, also, State v. Staton, 133 N. C. 643, 45 S. E. 362.

[3] 2. It is contended by the learned counsel for defendant in a well-prepared brief that, upon the state's evidence, no crime has been committed, and with this position we fully agree.

There were only two witnesses examined. Barnes, the prosecutor and owner of the storehouse, testified: "I know the defendant, have known him for four years. He has been in my employ for several years, during which time I found him honest. He assisted me in my store and business a portion of the time. In consequence of statements made to me by Richard Farmer, a negro boy in my employ, I instructed Richard to induce defendant to break in my store. On the night of July 7th Policeman Wynne, myself, and others watched the store, and about 12 o'clock we saw the defendant, Sylvester Goffney, and Richard Farmer go to the store, and saw defendant, Goffney, remove tacks holding a window pane, and remove the window, and enter the store. Richard Farmer immediately afterwards also entered the store through the same window. Policeman Wynne, myself, and others, who were watching the store, after firing pistols, entered the store, and arrested the defendant, Goffney, and required said Farmer to accompany us." The only other witness corroborated Barnes.

It is held in this state and elsewhere that larceny cannot be committed when the owner through his agent consents to the taking and asportation, though such consent is given for the purpose of apprehending the felon. State v. Adams, 115 N. C. 775, 20 S. E. 722. In that case it is said: "Although the intent to steal certain property is formed and carried out, the perpetrator is not guilty of larceny if he has been persuaded by a servant of the owner at the latter's instance to commit the theft." In the opinion Mr. Justice Clark well says: "The object of the law is to prevent larceny by punishing it, not to procure the commission of a larceny that the defendant may be punished." In the case at bar it appears that Barnes, the owner of the building entered, directed his servant, Richard Farmer, to induce the defendant to break in his (Barnes') store, that the servant obeyed his orders, and that he and defendant entered the store together, and that Barnes was present, watching them, and arrested defendant after he entered. If it were possible to hold the defendant guilty of a felony, under such circumstances, then Barnes could be likewise convicted of feloniously breaking and entering his own store, for he was present, aiding and abetting the entry of the defendant, and induced him to enter. That would, of course, be a legal absurdity.

Mr. Desty says: "Where the owner was apprised of the proposed burglary, and his servant, procuring the keys from his master, accompanied the burglar, and entered the premises, there could be no conviction." Desty's Am. Crim. Law, p. 486. See, also, Wharton's Crim. Law (9th Ed.) §§ 915, 766-770; Reg. v. Johnson, Car. & M. 218; Allen v. State, 40 Ala. 334, 91 Am. Dec. 477; People v. Collins, 53 Cal. 185; Mace v. State, 9 Tex. App. 110; Spelden v. State, 3 Tex. App. 156, 30 Am. Rep. 126; Williams v. State, 55 Ga. 391; 2 Russel (9th Ed.) 10; 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 662; 1 Bishop, Crim. Law (4th Ed.) 570. In Love v. People, reported in 160 Ill. 501, 43 N. E. 710, 32 L. R. A. 139, the building of one Hoag was entered by Robinson, Love, and others. Robinson was a hired detective, but posed among the others as one of them, and entered the building with the others. Robinson entered the building with the consent of Hoag. The court held that Robinson, having entered with the consent of the owner, committed no burglary, and that no burglary was committed because of the absence of felonious intent. The defendants Love and others could not have been accomplices or privy to a burglary because none was committed. Love v. People, 160 Ill. 501, 43 N. E. 710, 32 L. R. A. 139; many cases cited. In Reg. v. Johnson, Car. & M. 218, where a servant, after having been approached to aid in robbing his master's house, pretended to consent, and then informed the police, who told him to proceed, and he then went out and found the defendants, and took them to the house of his master, letting them in through the door, it was held that they could not be convicted of burglary. In the case of Spelden v. State, 3 Tex. App. 156, 30 Am. Rep. 126, the defendant was indicted for burglary by breaking into a bank with intent to commit larceny. The court says: "In the case at bar the detectives cannot be considered in any other light than as the servants and agents of the bankers, Adams & Leonard. They (the detectives) had the legal occupancy and control of the bank. Two of them made arrangements with the defendants to enter it, and defendant, when arrested, had entered the bank at the solicitation of these detectives, who were rightfully in possession, with the consent of the owners. This cannot be burglary in contemplation of law, however much the defendant was guilty in purpose and intent." It is said in Cyc. p. 181: "There is no burglary where the occupant of a house or his servant or agent by his direction or a public officer or detective with his consent * * * takes active steps to aid the suspect or to induce him to enter, although this may be done for the purpose of apprehending and prosecuting him, and although he may intend to commit a felony in the house." 6 Cyc. 181. We recognize the principle laid down in State v. Smith, 152 N. C. 798, 67 S. E. 508, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 946, but there is an obvious distinction between that case and this. In that case it is properly held that the fact that a party was deceived into a violation of the liquor laws of the state by a detective will not be a justification. In the case at bar the owner himself gave permission for the defendant to enter which destroyed the criminal feature and made the entry a lawful one.

Upon the facts in evidence, no crime was committed because the entry was with the consent and at the instance of the owner of the property.

His honor should have directed a verdict of not guilty.

Reversed, and proceeding dismissed.

TABLE ROCK LUMBER CO. v. BRANCH.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 23, 1911.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1212*)—REVERSAL—NEW TRIAL—SCOPE.

When the Supreme Court grants a new trial generally without further disposition, the new trial is upon all of the issues, though it has power to grant either a general or partial new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4713; Dec. Dig. § 1212.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1178*)—REVERSAL—NEW TRIAL—SCOPE.

Where the error is confined to one issue which is separable from the others, and it clearly appears that no prejudice will result from such a course, the Supreme Court will usually grant a new trial only upon such issue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4604-4620; Dec. Dig. § 1178.*]

3. DEEDS (§ 86*)—ORDER OF REGISTRATION—NECESSITY.

Revisal 1905, § 1004, provides that, where a conveyance is acknowledged by both husband and wife or by other grantor before the same officer, the form of acknowledgment shall be substantially as therein provided, and section 999 provides that, whenever the proof or acknowledgment of the execution of any instrument required or permitted to be registered is had before any other official than the clerk of the superior court, such clerk shall, before it is registered, examine the certificate of proof or acknowledgment, and, if it is duly proven or acknowledged and the certificates are in due form, he shall order the instrument registered. Held that, where a deed executed by a husband and wife is proven before the clerk of the superior court, an order of registration is not required; a certificate of proof being sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. § 226; Dec. Dig. § 86.*]

4. WILLS (§ 353*)—PROBATE—RECORD—EFFECT.

An entry of record in probate proceedings that, after an issue of devisavit vel non, "the executor, H., offered for probate the will of" testator, "which was duly proven by the oath of P. and C., the subscribing witnesses thereto, according to law, and the said H. took the sundry oaths as executor, and letters testamentary issued," authorized an inference that the subscribing witnesses named actually subscribed as witnesses in testator's presence, especially since, under Revisal 1905, § 3113, it was necessary that they subscribe in his presence in order to be subscribing witnesses.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 809; Dec. Dig. § 353.*]

5. WILLS (§ 118*) — SUBSCRIPTION — ESSENTIALS.

Revisal 1905, § 3113, provides that no will shall be sufficient, unless written in testator's lifetime and signed by him, or by some other person in his presence and by his direction, and subscribed in his presence by two witnesses at least except as provided. Held, that the subscribing witnesses must have subscribed the will in testator's presence after he had signed it or acknowledged the signature in their presence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Burke County; Long, Judge.

Action by the Table Rock Lumber Company against A. J. Branch. From a judgment in part for plaintiff, both parties appeal. Reversed and remanded for new trial on defendant's appeal, and plaintiff's dismissed.

Avery & Ervin, for plaintiff. S. J. Ervin and Spainhour & Mull, for defendant.

WALKER, J. This case has been before us several times, and is reported in 63 S. E. 171, 948. At the fall term, 1910, of this court, we granted a new trial for newly discovered evidence. The appeal had been taken by the plaintiff, who had recovered in all respects at that trial, except as to the land within the boundary of what is known in the case as the "Brite grant," containing 300 acres. When the case was heard the last time, the court held that the new trial was limited by the order of this court, though general in its terms, to the Brite grant, and that the defendant could not reopen issues upon which he had lost at the former trial, and to this ruling defendant excepted. We think the court erred in thus restricting the new trial. Our order, as we have said, was general in its terms, and extended to all the matters involved in the case. We were not asked to limit the new trial to any particular question and did not do so.

[1] This court, upon application, can grant a general or a partial new trial, as it may see fit under all the circumstances, but when a new trial is granted, nothing more being said, it means a new trial of the whole case of all the issues, and not merely of one of them, or, as in this case, of a part of one. The new trial refers to the issue, and is not restricted by the answer to the issue, unless the court in the order confines its scope to a particular issue or a particular question. It is settled beyond controversy that it is entirely discretionary with the court, superior or Supreme, whether it will grant a partial new trial.

[2] It will generally do so, when the error, or reason for the new trial, is confined to one issue, which is entirely separable from the others, and it is perfectly clear that there is no danger of complication. Benton v. Collins, 125 N. C. 83, 34 S. E. 242, 47 L. R. A. 33; Rowe v. Lumber Co., 133 N. C. 433, 45 S. E. 830. In the last-cited case we said: "The issue submitted at the first trial was: Are the plaintiffs the owners of the land in controversy or any part thereof, and, if of any part, what part? The answer to that issue was, 'No.' There were three tracts of land in dispute, and, if an error was committed as to any of them, this court must of necessity give a new trial as to all, though there may have been no error committed as to one of them. This results from the form of the issue. If a separate and distinct issue had been submitted as to each tract, and an error had been committed as to one only, the court even in that case could have given a general new trial; but in its discretion could have restricted the new trial to the issue or issues as to which the error was committed. When the issue is general, embracing within its scope several distinct pieces of property or tracts of land, the new trial must be general, because the issue and consequently the verdict are in their very nature indivisible. This seems to have been expressly decided. Beam v. Jennings, 96 N. C. 82 [2 S. E. 245]; Holmes v. Godwin, 71 N. C. 306." Of course, in the latter part of the passage taken from that case, we referred to a verdict which merely gives a general answer, affirmative or negative, to the issue. In that case the issue was general in its terms, and embraced several tracts of land, and the answer thereto was, "No." Besides, in this case, there may be danger of doing injustice to the defendant by granting a partial new trial. But the fact remains, after all has been said, that we ordered a general, and not a partial, new trial, and the court should have tried the case below in accordance therewith. It was error not to do so, for which there must be another trial.

[3] There is one question we must decide before remanding the case. The plaintiff offered as evidence a deed from A. C. Avery and wife to John Cheever, dated August 27, 1878, and defendant objected to it, upon the ground that while the probate, as appears by the annexed certificate, is full and correct in form, there was no flat or order of the clerk of the court, D. C. Pearson, for the registration thereof. The objection was overruled, and the deed admitted. Defendant excepted. We think the ruling was correct. The statute does not seem to require an order to registration when the deed is proven before the clerk, but merely a certificate of the proof. Revisal 1905, § 1004. When he passes upon a probate taken by some other officer, he must certify to the correctness of the probate and the certificate, and order the instrument to be registered (Revisal, § 999) according to the form prescribed by Revisal, § 1001, or one substantially the same.

[4] The court excluded a copy of the will of Geo. Hice, Sr., certified by W. S. Sudderth, clerk of the county court, to be a true and correct copy of his will on November 12, 1855. The handwriting of Sudderth was duly proven by the examination of L. A. Bristol. The defendant then offered the minute book of the county court, from which it appeared that the will of Geo. Hice, Sr., had been offered for probate by his executor, G. W. B. Hice, who appeared by his attorney, W. W. Avery, and that a caveat filed thereto by Elizabeth Hice and an issue of devisavit vel non ordered to be made up, which was done, and the case docketed for trial. The caveat was afterwards withdrawn and the executor qualified. Then appears this entry: "By consent of parties, the defendant, Elizabeth Hice, is permitted to withdraw the issue heretofore made in this case, and confess judgment for the costs heretofore incurred. Whereupon the executor, George W. B. Hice, offered for probate the last will and testament of George Hice, which was duly proven by the oath of John Parks and Thomas Carleton, the two subscribing witnesses thereto, according to law. And the said G. W. B. Hice took the sundry oaths as executor, and letters testamentary issued. The said Elizabeth Hice, widow of George Hice, came into court in proper person and entered her dissent to the provisions of the said will, and refused to accept the legacy therein given her, and filed her petition for her year's allowance, which is granted. (See trial docket.)" We are inclined to the opinion that the certified copy, as authenticated by the entries on the records of the court, was competent evidence of the due execution of the will, and that it should have been admitted. The plaintiff objected to it upon the ground that it did not appear by the records or the copy of the will that the two subscribing witnesses named in the entry we have set forth actually subscribed as witnesses in the presence of the testator, though it is admitted that it sufficiently appears that Geo. Hice, Sr., signed the will in their presence. It is not stated expressly in the entry that he so signed the will, but only inferentially from the words, "which was duly proven by the oath of John Parks and Thomas Carleton, the two subscribing witnesses, according to law," and we do not see why the other fact may not as well be inferred from those words.

[5] They could not well be subscribing witnesses unless he signed or acknowledged his signature in their presence, and they, as witnesses, subscribed it in his presence. Revisal, § 3113; In re Snow's Will, 128 N. C. 100, 38 S. E. 295; Burney v. Allen, 125 N. C. 314, 34 S. E. 500, 74 Am. St. Rep. 637; Graham v. Graham, 32 N. C. 219. The statement that the will was duly proven by the oath of the two subscribing witnesses, according to law, would seem to clearly imply by irresistible inference that there was legal proof of his signing in their presence, and they in his, for otherwise the will would not have been duly proven. Cochran v. Linville Improvement Co., 127 N. C. 386, 37 S. E. 496. No doubt a full certificate of probate was filed, and recorded with the will, showing all the facts which should appear. It was admitted that the records of the court had been burned many years ago. We need not decide this question, though, as the defendant succeeded at the trial without the necessity of resorting to the will as evidence, so it is stated. We merely advert to it for the purpose of suggesting that, if the defendant wishes again to rely upon the will as evidence, he may perhaps restore the lost record under the provisions of Revisal, c. 11, entitled, "Burnt and Lost Records," and thereby avail himself of it as proof. It is too important and far-reaching a question to decide finally without a more extended argument and consideration of it.

We must regretfully order another trial of this much litigated case, because of the error in restricting the last trial to the consideration only of rights arising under the Brito grant.

New trial.

Plaintiff's Appeal.

WALKER, J. As we have ordered a new trial of this case in the consideration of the defendant's appeal, it is useless to pass upon the alleged errors which are assigned in the plaintiff's appeal. The rulings may be different on the next trial, and the case presented in an entirely different aspect. Besides, the plaintiff will derive from the new trial granted in the other appeal all the advantage he now seeks. The whole matter is reopened for a new investigation, and we can do no more than this for him, should we review the rulings of the court to which he has excepted. If we sustained any one or all of his assignments, the result would be the same as it is now; that is, a new trial. We must therefore take the usual course in such cases, and dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

PATTON v. W. M. RITTER LUMBER CO.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 20, 1911.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 137*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE—METHOD OF WORK.

Defendant's mill sawed cross-ties, which were run out on rollers, from which they fell to a dock a few feet lower, and then dropped 12 or 18 feet to the ground below, where they were loaded on cars. Plaintiff, a foreman in charge of a loading gang, went to the dock to prevent the ties being thrown on his men while a train was being loaded, and asked one of the laborers if any more ties were coming out, and was informed that there would be no more for about 30 minutes. Plaintiff then motioned to his hands to load the ties onto the car, when another tie was rolled out of the mill, fell on the dock, struck plaintiff, and seriously injured him. Held, that defendant was guilty of actionable negligence in failing to stop the ties while the car was being loaded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 273; Dec. Dig. § 137.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 201*)—FELLOW SERVANTS—NEGLIGENCE.

The negligence of plaintiff's fellow servant in informing him that no ties would come out of the mill for 30 minutes was not the cause of the injury, and was not material on the question of defendant's liability.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 515-534; Dec. Dig. § 201.*]

3. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 2*)—EFFECT OF LIMITATION—WHAT LAW GOVERNS.

Since statutes of limitation affect the remedy and not the cause of an action, the statute of the place of the trial or lex fori governs.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 4-8; Dec. Dig. § 2.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 253*)—VARIANCE—EXCEPTIONS.

A variance between the pleadings and the proof will be disregarded, where no exception was taken thereto at the trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 1491; Dec. Dig. § 253.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 76*)—EXPERTS—COMPETENCY—OBJECTIONS.

Where a physician has been admitted, and has testified as an expert, without objection, a question as to his competency as an expert may not thereafter be raised by a general objection to a proper question.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 183-190; Dec. Dig. § 76.*]

6. EVIDENCE (§ 478*)—MENTAL CONDITION—NONEXPERTS.

A person's mental condition may be shown by a nonexpert.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2242-2244; Dec. Dig. § 478.*]

7. EVIDENCE (§ 408*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—RECEIPT.

Where a receipt is given by an injured employé to his employer, it is only prima facie evidence of a settlement, and may be shown to have been intended to apply only to compensation for lost time, and not to constitute an acquittance for the injuries.

Appeal from Superior Court, Burke County; Lane, Judge.

Action by Charles F. Patton against W. M. Ritter Lumber Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

L. C. Bell and Avery & Avery, for appellant. Spainhour & Mull and Avery & Ervin, for appellee.

CLARK, O. J. The plaintiff was injured in August, 1907, while acting as foreman of a squad of hands who were loading cross-ties on a car on defendant's railway. The cross-ties were sawed by the defendant's mill, whence they were run out on rollers, from which they fell upon a dock a few feet lower; thence they were dropped 12 to 18 feet to the ground below, from which place they were loaded on the defendant's train. When the train came in, the plaintiff went upon the dock to prevent the ties being thrown down on his men while the train was being loaded. He asked one of the laborers if any more ties were coming out, who replied that there would be no more for about 30 minutes. The plaintiff then motioned his hands to get up the ties and load them on the car. About that time another tie was rolled out from the mill, which fell over on the dock, striking the plaintiff and seriously injuring him.

[1] The motion for a nonsuit was properly refused. The evidence tended to show that the defendant was guilty of negligence in not furnishing the plaintiff a safe place to work, and it was properly submitted to the jury. It was negligence in the defendant to permit its mill to run out the cross-ties to fall upon the dock, and, thence 12 to 18 feet to the ground, while the plaintiff and his men were engaged in picking up the ties to place them on the car. It was incumbent upon the company to stop the ties from coming out while the plaintiff and his men were engaged in loading them. The plaintiff was sent there with his men to load the car, and he had no control over the operations of the mill.

[2] The negligence of the fellow servant in informing the plaintiff that no ties would come out of the mill for one-half hour has no bearing upon the negligence of the defendant. At most, it could only have thrown light upon the question of contributory negligence, and in that aspect it tended to show that the plaintiff acted, not negligently, but prudently. It was therefore immaterial as to whether, under the law of West Virginia, the doctrine of liability for the negligence of a fellow servant obtained or not.

[3] The statute of limitations of West Virginia need not be considered, for such statutes affect the remedy, and not the cause of action. It follows that the statute of limitations of the place of trial—the lex fori— governs. 25 Cyc. 1018, 1020 (3). This action was begun within less than two years after injury was sustained.

[4] It is true the cause of action set out in the complaint differs in many of the circumstances from the proof, but variance between the pleadings and the proof will be disregarded when there is no exception made at the trial. In Handon v. Clark, 127 N. C. 114, 37 S. E. 156, this court said: "If the cause had in fact been tried upon a substantially different aspect from that alleged in the complaint, the defendant, after acquiescing in such variance and making no objection to the issue submitted, cannot now be heard to make this objection to vitiate the trial. If necessary, the pleadings would be reformed even, after judgment, as authorized by Code, § 273, to conform to the facts proven."

[5] As to the exception to the question asked Dr. Riddle, it was really not answered by him. But, if it had been, and he had been admitted, and had testified as an expert without objection, a question of his competency as an expert could not be raised by a general objection to a particular question thereafter. Summerlin v. Railroad, 133 N. C. 551, 45 S. E. 898; Lumber Co. v. Railroad, 151 N. C. 220, 65 S. E. 920.

[6] The testimony of Patton as to plaintiff's mental condition was competent. It was not necessary to show that he was an expert. Clary v. Clary, 24 N. C. 78, and cases cited thereto in the Annotated Edition.

[7] The jury found upon the evidence that the alleged receipt was intended to apply only to compensation for the lost time, and that the plaintiff did not give defendant an acquittance for the injuries received by him. The receipt is only prima facie. Shaw v. Williams, 100 N. C. 272, 6 S. E. 196; Barbee v. Barbee, 108 N. C. 584, 13 S. E. 215. This was a matter of fact for the jury and has been determined by them. It is not necessary to consider the other exceptions.

No error.

REID v. KING.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 23, 1911.)

1. PARTY WALLS (§ 10*)—RIGHTS OF PARTIES—CONTRIBUTION.

While there can be no recovery at law for the use of a party wall built by one of the adjoining proprietors, the party building the wall may compel contribution in equity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Party Walls, Cent. Dig. §§ 54-64; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

2. ACTION (§ 25*)—FORM—LEGAL OR EQUITABLE.

Since the distinction between legal and equitable actions is abolished, if plaintiff alleges facts entitling him to equitable relief, it will be awarded without regard to the form of his allegations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Action, Cent. Dig. §§ 147, 157; Dec. Dig. § 25.*]

3. PARTY WALLS (§ 1*)—EFFECT OF AN AGREEMENT.

The effect of a party wall agreement is to create cross-easements as to each owner, binding all persons succeeding to the estates to which the easements are appurtenant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Party Walls, Cent. Dig. § 1; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

4. EASEMENTS (§ 21*)—EQUITABLE EASEMENTS—PERSONS BOUND—PURCHASERS—NOTICE.

One who purchases lands on which the owner has imposed an easement or created an equitable charge takes the title subject to such easements and equities, if he has notice thereof.

5. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 60*)—PARTY WALL AGREEMENTS.

The statute of frauds would not apply to prevent a suit for contribution for half the cost of a party wall, though erected under an oral agreement between the owners that one should pay the other half of the cost of completing it; the right to contribution being implied in law, regardless of any promise.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. § 83; Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Rutherford County; Justice, Judge.

Action by George P. Reid against R. V. King. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This action was brought by the plaintiff to recover one-half the cost of erecting a party wall on the line dividing the lots of the parties.

The following are the facts, as gathered from the pleadings and proofs: In 1904 the plaintiff and one Edward Thompson were the owners of adjoining lots in the town of Forest City, N. C. The plaintiff in 1905 erected a two-story brick building on his lot in such manner that the eastern wall thereof rested one half on his lot and the other half on the lot of Thompson. At the time plaintiff erected his building he entered into a verbal agreement with Thompson, providing that he might construct the east wall of the building on the dividing line of the two lots, so that one-half thereof would rest on each lot, and that the said Thompson, should he ever build on his lot, might join his building to the east wall of plaintiff's building upon his paying plaintiff one-half the value of the wall at the time he should make use of the same, and if Thompson should decide not to build on his lot, but should sell the same, then and in that case he should give plaintiff the first offer to purchase his lot, and, if he sold to another, he would make known to him the terms of the contract between him and the plaintiff in reference to the use of the wall. After plaintiff had erected his building, Thompson sold his lot to defendant, but, before selling it to him, he informed him of the terms of his agreement with the plaintiff. Thereafter the defendant erected a two-story brick building on his lot, and in doing so used the east wall of plaintiff's building as the west wall of his (defendant's building). The defendant at the time he purchased the lot from Thompson and at and prior to the time he used plaintiff's wall had actual notice and full knowledge of the agreement between plaintiff and Thompson. Defendant testified, in part, as follows: "After Dr. Reid had built, I went to Mr. Thompson, and told him I wanted to buy the lot, and he said he was thinking of building himself. He further told me that, when Dr. Reid built the wall, he came to him and said his lot was narrow, and he wanted to build the wall half on his, Thompson's, lot. He said he told Reid to go ahead, and, if he, Thompson, built, he would pay for one-half the wall, and, if he did not build, he would give Reid the refusal of the lot so he could get the advantage of the wall. That was all he ever said to me about the wall until after he made me a deed."

The jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) Is defendant indebted to plaintiff?

Ans.: Yes.

"(2) What was the actual cost of erecting the wall as of the date that defendant joined to the wall? Ans.: $825.00."

The court instructed the jury that, upon the admissions in the pleadings and evidence, they should answer the first issue "Yes," and that they would find, upon the testimony, the actual cost of erecting the wall as of the date the defendant joined his building to it, and answer the issue accordingly.

Judgment was entered upon the verdict, and defendant appealed.

Ryburn & Hoey and M. L. Edwards, for appellant. McBrayer, McBrayer & McRorie, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] It has generally been held in cases of this kind that there can be no recovery at law for the use of a party wall built by one of the adjoining proprietors, against the other, but the remedy must be sought in a court of equity. The governing principle is nowhere better expressed than by Chancellor Kent in the leading case of Campbell v. Mesier, 4 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 334, 8 Am. Dec. 570. It will be well to state the facts before referring directly to the opinion of the court: Two parties living in the city of New York on adjacent lots, and having on the common line of their buildings a ruinous party wall unfit to stand, and one of the persons thus situated, being desirous of rebuilding, proposed to the other coterminous proprietor to unite with him in rebuilding the party wall, but this request was refused. Whereupon Campbell, the proposer, proceeded to tear down his own house, as well as the party wall, and rebuild both. Thereafter Mesier, who had refused to assist in rebuilding the party wall, devised his property to his son, who thereafter sold the lot to Dunstan, and in the deed expressly conveyed to the latter the use of the party wall for building, and covenanted to indemnify him for so using it. Dunstan then pulled his house down and erected a new one, and in so doing made use of the party wall, but refused to pay his proportionate share of that wall. Campbell then sued him in an ordinary action, but was nonsuited on the ground that he had no remedy at law. On this Campbell filed his bill against both Mesier and Dunstan, praying that the defendants be decreed to come to a settlement with him touching the building of the party wall, and to contribute and pay one-half of the value thereof, etc. Upon this state of facts, the prayer of the bill was granted, and a decree entered accordingly; Chancellor Kent remarking: "I have not found any adjudged case in point, but it appears to me that this case falls within the reason and equity of the doctrine of contribution which exists in the common law, and is bottomed and fixed on the general principles of justice. In Sir William Harbert's Case, 3 Co. 11, and in Bro. Abr. tit. 'Suite and Contribution,' many cases of contribution are put, and the doctrine rests on the principle that, where the parties stand in equal jure, the law requires equality, which is equity, and one of them shall not be obliged to bear the burden in ease of the rest. It is stated in F. N. B. 162b that the writ of contribution lies where there are tenants in common, or who jointly hold a mill pro indivisa, and take the profits equally, and the mill falls into decay, and one of them will not repair the mill. The form of a writ is given to compel the other to be contributory to the reparations. In Sir William Harbert's Case, it was resolved that, 'when land was charged by any tie, the charge ought to be equal, and one should not bear all the burden; and the law on this point was grounded in great equity.' * * * The doctrine of contribution is founded, not on contract, but on the principle that that equality of burden as to a common right is equity, and the solidity and necessity of this doctrine were forcibly and learnedly illustrated by Lord Chancellor Baron Eyre in the case of Dering v. Earl of Winchelsea, 1 Cox's Cases, 318. * * * The obligation arises not from agreement, but from the nature of the relation, or quasi ex contractu; and, as far as courts of law have in modern times assumed jurisdiction upon this subject, it is, as Lord Eldon said (14 Ves. 164), upon the ground of an implied assumpsit. The decision at law stated in the pleadings may therefore have arisen from the difficulty of deducing a valid contract from the case. That difficulty does not exist in this court, because we do not look to a contract, but to the equity of the case, as felt and recognized according to Lord Coke in every age by the judges and sages of the law." And the cause was referred to a master to ascertain the cost of the wall. Afterward, the cause coming on again before the chancellor, he ruled that the expense of rebuilding the wall was an equitable charge on the wall, and the owner for the time being, exercising his right in the new wall, was equitably bound to contribute ratably to the expense of the necessary reparation. And Dunstan, having purchased with actual notice of the charge or claim, was ordered to pay the moiety of the expense of rebuilding the wall. That decision, which has been approved and followed in many jurisdictions, would seem to be sufficient authority against the contention of the defendant in this case, and we deem it to be the only just and reasonable view to take of the question.

[2] It is not important for us to inquire or to decide whether an action at law will lie for one-half the cost of erecting the wall, as we have abolished all forms of actions and the distinction between legal and equitable remedies, and a party now recovers according to the allegations of his pleadings (Voorhees v. Porter, 134 N. C. 591, 47 S. E. 81, 65 L. R. A. 736; Cheese Co. v. Pipkin, 155 N. C. 394, 71 S. E. 442), so that, if the plaintiff has made a sufficient allegation of facts in his complaint to entitle him to equitable relief, the court will award it without regard to the form or manner in which they are alleged. We think he has done so, and there was proof to establish them, as will appear from the foregoing statement of the facts. It has been said, though, that indebitatus assumpsit, being of an equitable nature, will lie for an adjoining owner's share of the cost of building a party wall, and a recovery has been allowed in that form of action. Huck v. Flentye, 80 Ill. 258. A case much like ours in its facts is Rindge v. Baker, 57 N. Y. 209, 15 Am. Rep. 475, in which it appeared that two adjoining proprietors entered into a parol agreement to jointly build a party wall, one-half on the premises of each, and accordingly built a portion of the wall, but one of them refused to proceed with its construction. The other, having planned his building in reliance on the contract being performed, was held not confined to his remedy for specific performance, but was permitted to complete the wall and to recover of the other proprietor, in an equitable action, one-half of the expense. To the same effect is Sanders v. Martin, 2 Lea (Tenn.) 213, 31 Am. Rep. 598. Numerous authorities sustain the proposition that such a recovery may be had under the equitable principle of contribution against the defaulting proprietor, or his assignee with notice of the contract; one of the strongest of them being Sharp v. Cheatham, 88 Mo. 498, 57 Am. Rep. 483, where the subject is treated exhaustively and with great learning and a copious citation of cases by Justice Sherwood.

[3] The effect of such an agreement is to create cross-easements as to each owner, which binds all persons succeeding to the estates to which the easements are appurtenant, and a purchaser of the estate of the owner so contracting would take it burdened with the liability to pay one-half the cost of the wall, whenever he availed himself of its benefits. 88 Mo., 57 Am. Rep., supra.

[4] The language of courts and of judges has been very uniform and very decided upon this subject, and all agree that whoever purchases lands upon which the owner has imposed an easement of any kind, or created a charge which could be enforced in equity against him, takes the title subject to all easements, equities, and charges, however created, of which he has notice. 88 Mo., 57 Am. Rep., supra. Lord Cottenham said in Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. (Eng. Ch. 774): "If an equity is attached to property by the owner, no one purchasing with notice of that equity can stand in a different situation from the party from whom he purchased." But although the covenant, when regarded as a contract, is binding only between the original parties, yet, in order to give effect to their intention, it may be construed by equity as creating an incorporeal hereditament (in the form of an easement) out of the unconveyed estate, and rendering it appurtenant to the estate conveyed; and, when this is the case, subsequent assignees will have the rights and be subject to the obligations which the title or liability to such easement creates. A purchaser of land with notice of a right or interest in it existing only by agreement with his vendor is bound to do that which his grantor had agreed to perform, because it would be unconscientious and inequitable for him to violate or disregard the valid agreements of the vendor in regard to the estate of which he had notice when he became the purchaser. 88 Mo., 57 Am. Rep., supra; Spencer's Case, 1 Smith L. C. (6th Ed.) p. 167. See, also, Spaulding v. Grundy, 126 Ky. 510, 104 S. W. 293, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 149, 128 Am. St. Rep. 328, and cases cited; Richardson v. Tobey, 121 Mass. 457, 23 Am. Rep. 283; 30 Cyc. 788, 795. It would be useless to multiply authorities, as the most of them will be found in the cases already cited. There can be no question but that the defendant had full notice of the transaction when he bought from Thompson, and is as much affected by the equity as Thompson would have been, if he had not sold the lot.

[5] The statute of frauds does not apply. The equity arises regardless of any promise, except, perhaps, that which is fairly implied by law. 20 Cyc. 282; Pitt v. Moore, 99 N. O. 85, 5 S. E. 389; 6 Am. St. Rep. 489; Ray v. Honeycutt, 119 N. C. 510, 26 S. C. 127; Tucker v. Markland, 101 N. C. 422, 8 S. E. 169. No point was made as to the amount of the liability, and it seems that the plaintiff recovers less than one-half of the amount it cost him to build the wall.

We find no error in the case.
No error.

DAVIS v. WHITLOCK.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 16, 1911.)

1. MARRIAGE (§ 60*)—STATE COURTS—SOUTH CAROLINA COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Under Const. art. 1, § 15, providing that every person shall have a speedy remedy in the courts for wrongs sustained, and article 5, § 15, providing that the court of common pleas shall have jurisdiction of all civil cases, that court has jurisdiction to declare void marriages prohibited by Civ. Code 1902, §§ 2658, 2661, 2664, respectively providing that marriages between relatives of certain degrees and those between parties, either of whom have a former spouse living, and those between white persons and negroes, shall be utterly void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Marriage, Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

2. MARRIAGE (§ 57*)—ANNULMENT.

Rev. St. 1893, § 2158, authorizing a suit to have a marriage doubted or denied by one of the parties declared valid, does not affect the jurisdiction of the court of common pleas to declare void marriages prohibited by Civ. Code 1902, §§ 2658, 2661, 2664.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Marriage, Dec. Dig. § 57.*]

3. MARRIAGE (§ 58*)—ANNULMENT.

Civ. Code 1902, § 2660, providing that the court of common pleas shall have power to declare marriages void for the want of consent of either of the contracting parties or for any other cause, showing that at the time the supposed contract of marriage was made it was not a contract, provided that it has not been consummated by the cohabitation of the parties, does not affect the jurisdiction of the court of common pleas to declare void those marriages prohibited by sections 2658, 2661, and 2664, for the word "consummated" shows that section 2660 was intended to apply only to those marriages in which the parties may at a later time be able to contract the relation, and not to those who are forbidden to marry.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Marriage, Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

4. MARRIAGE (§ 11*)—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

Under Civ. Code 1902, § 2661, declaring that all marriages contracted while either of the parties has a former spouse living shall be void, but that the section shall not extend to a person whose husband or wife shall have been absent for seven years, the one not knowing the other to be living at that time, a second marriage, by a woman whose first husband was living, though he had been absent for more than seven years, was not valid, for, under the constitutional provision that no divorce shall be allowed, marriages are indissoluble, though the second marriage was entitled to a presumption of validity until the existence of the former spouse was established.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Marriage, Cent. Dig. § 30; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

5. MARRIAGE (§ 54*)—VALIDITY—STATUTE.

Where a woman whose first husband had been absent for more than seven years married a second time, without knowing that the first husband was still alive, and she and her second husband lived together after the first husband's death, the marriage was valid under Civ. Code 1902, § 2661, even though it was invalid until the death of the first husband.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Marriage, Cent. Dig. §§ 93-109; Dec. Dig. § 54.*]

6. MARRIAGE (§ 58*)—FRAUD.

A woman's first husband deserted her, and, after seven years of absence without knowing he was alive, she re-married, and the second husband died. Some time after his death, she again married, but did not tell the last husband of her first matrimonial experience. Held that, as he made no inquiry into her past life, she was not guilty of such fraud as would entitle him to be relieved from the marriage.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Cherokee County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

Action by Wylie S. Davis against Araminta Whitlock, alias Araminta Davis. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, and complaint dismissed.

Otts & Dobson, for appellant. J. E. Boggs, for respondent.

WOODS, J. This action by the plaintiff to have his marriage with the defendant declared null rests on the allegation that the defendant's former husband, William Whitlock, was living at the time of her attempted marriage with the plaintiff, that the defendant concealed the fact of her first marriage from the plaintiff, and that he was ignorant of its existence until just before the commencement of this action.

The facts, which are in the main undisputed, we find to be as follows: The defendant, whose maiden name was Araminta Lockhart, married William Whitlock and lived with him for about two years, when he abandoned her and went away. The first year of their residence was spent at Whitlock's home near Jonesville, the second about 20 miles away, near Gaffney. In 1873, having heard nothing of Whitlock since his departure, defendant married one Joe Terry. Six months later Terry, in turn, deserted her, and has never been heard of since. In the early part of 1879 defendant married A. H. Wood, with whom she lived until his death in 1881. Finally, she married the plaintiff on May 8, 1887, having first met him at Central, S. C., where she was conducting a boarding house in 1886. They lived at Central for 12 or 14 years, then went to Atlanta for two years, and finally returned to Cherokee county, where they resided until the separation in 1907, a few days before this action was brought. The evidence as to Whitlock's movements after he abandoned his wife is very indefinite. His cousin, Munro Whitlock, testified that he came back to Jonesville in 1874 or 1875 for a short while. About 1886 he came home once more, but soon wandered off. A year or two later he returned again, and remained until his death in October, 1896, though during this time he went away for short intervals. Defendant testified that she had not seen or heard of Whitlock during all these years from 1868, and that she received about 1901 her first intimation that he had come back to South Carolina, and, after living here for some time, had died in 1895. It appears that plaintiff and defendant lived agreeably together from the time of their marriage, until a few years before their separation, when plaintiff took to drink, and when under its influence he was abusive of defendant, for which cause she left him. He admits that up to a few years before the separation she was a faithful and dutiful wife. She admits that, when she married him, she did not know whether Whitlock was dead or alive, and that she made no inquiry about him, and that she did not tell plaintiff of her marriage either to Whitlock or to Terry, saying: "He never told me of his past life, and I never told him of mine. He never asked me." The couple are now between 65 and 70 years of age. During their life together by their joint efforts and industry they accumulated about $2,500 worth of property, real and personal, the title to which is in plaintiff.

The special referee to whom the issues of law and fact were referred found that as Whitlock was alive at the date of the marriage, and as no effort was made by defendant to ascertain whether he was dead or alive, the presumption of his death, which would arise from seven years absence unheard of by her after reasonable diligence and inquiry to ascertain if he were alive, could not avail to sustain her marriage with plaintiff, though she entered into the contract in good faith, and he held the original marriage void. But he held further that, the parties having lived together as man and wife and recognized each other as such for more than 10 years after the death of Whitlock, which removed the only impediment to a valid marriage between them, that was sufficient to establish a common-law marriage, notwithstanding the invalidity of the original contract.

The circuit court concurred in the former, but overruled the latter, conclusion, and held that the original marriage, being void, could not be validated by ratification, and that the relation of the parties to it was therefore adulterous, and that the relation would be presumed to continue until changed by the mutual consent of the parties. Therefore the cohabitation of the plaintiff and defendant subsequent to the death of Whitlock, without any new agreement, would be referred to the original unlawful relation, and could not afford ground for inferring a subsequent valid marriage. Therefore the marriage was adjudged to be null and void.

[1] The jurisdiction of the court of common pleas to declare a marriage void was not called in question in the court below, nor in this court; but, since the court of equity in Mattison v. Mattison, 1 Strob. Eq. 387, 47 Am. Dec. 541, decided in 1847, and Bowers v. Bowers, 10 Rich. Eq. 551, 73 Am. Dec.

99, decided in 1857, held that such jurisdiction was denied to the courts of this state, we shall first endeavor to show that changes in the constitutional and statute law of the state have destroyed the force of these cases, and that jurisdiction to declare marriages void ab initio has been conferred on the courts of common pleas.

The Civil Code of 1902 contains the following provision as section 2661: "All marriages contracted while either of the parties has a former husband or wife living, shall be void: Provided, that this section shall not extend to a person whose husband or wife shall be absent for the space of seven years, the one not knowing the other to be living during that time; nor to any person who shall be divorced, or whose first marriage shall be declared void by the sentence of a competent court." This law first appears in the Revised Statutes of 1873, and is found in the Codes of 1882 and 1893. A similar provision as to the absence for seven years is found in the act of 1712 (2 Stat. 508), but that related only to exemptions from criminal prosecution, and conferred no civil rights. Section 2658 of the Civil Code expressly forbids marriage between persons sustaining to each other any of the close relationships therein set out, and so makes all attempts to contract such marriages of no effect. Section 2664, taken from the statute passed in 1879 (17 Stat. 3), enacts that any "marriage or attempted marriage" between a white person and a person of the Indian or negro race shall be "utterly void and of none effect."

Here are three statutes of the state declaring that no ceremony and no attempted contract of marriage can have the effect of establishing the relation of husband and wife between persons of the status and the classes mentioned in the statutes. There are no limitations except those contained in the proviso to section 2661. It makes no difference if the persons undertaking to contract marriage were not aware of the disability, and so were innocent of any intention to violate the law, or that they have cohabited together as man and wife. Their status is that of unmarried persons and their cohabitation unlawful. Do not such statutes necessarily carry with them the right to persons affected by them to have their status under them adjudicated by the courts? Or are we forced to the conclusion that, in cases of doubt, innocent persons must remain all their lives in uncertainty whether they are married or single, whether it be a duty or a crime to discharge the obligations incident to the marriage relation? The evils to society as well as the hardships to individuals which would result from a denial of the power of the courts to determine these questions are manifest. No less manifest would be the incongruity and reproach to the law of holding that, if in the course of the life of the individuals concerned or after their death it should happen that in any contest over property the validity of the marriage should incidentally arise, the court could declare the marriage void under the statute law of the state, but could never adjudicate the question in a direct proceeding which would determine not only all property rights, but the many other marital rights recognized by the law, and so important not only to the individual, but to society. We think it can be made manifest on both principle and authority that such incongruity in the law does not exist, and that the court of common pleas has jurisdiction to decide in a direct proceeding that what purported to be a marriage was and remains in fact a nullity, and that neither party acquired any marital rights thereunder. There ought to be no doubt of the proposition that, when the legislative department of the government enacts a law, it is not necessary to provide that the courts shall have jurisdiction to determine any substantial controversy between individuals that may arise under that law. Such jurisdiction is necessarily implied. Indeed, it seems clear that it would be beyond the power of the lawmaking body to deny to the citizen the right to have adjudicated substantial claims or obligations arising under the statute law of the state. As soon as a statute is enacted, the judicial power attaches to it, and every citizen who has a controversy with respect to a substantial legal claim arising thereunder has a right to invoke the judicial power in the assertion of rights. Not only does this conclusion result from the essential qualities and relations of legislative and judicial powers, and the right of the citizen to invoke the judicial power, but it is directly and clearly expressed in the provision of the Constitution that "all courts shall be public, and every person shall have speedy remedy therein for wrongs sustained." Article 1, § 15. The word "wrongs" is here used in its broadest legal sense, embracing every injury to or impairment of legal rights of person or property. It is too obvious for discussion that a suit to have a marriage declared void ab initio involves the assertion and determination of substantial legal rights; for marriage imposes in all cases the legal obligation to refrain from marrying again while the status continues, and the legal obligations of service and support, and in most cases confers the legal right to the custody of children, as well as the right of dower and other property interests. It seems equally obvious that one sustains a legal wrong, that his rights of person and property are impaired, when he is restrained from marrying and lives in doubt as to the most solemn and important legal obligations and duties affecting both his person and his property. It is well established that the owner of land or other property states a legal wrong when he alleges that his title is impaired by that which purports to be title in another, but which is in fact a nullity. This being so, on what possible legal distinction can it be held that one whose rights of both person and property are impaired by a ceremony which purported to impose the obligations of marriage states no wrong sustained within the meaning of the Constitution when he alleges such impairment of his rights?

These general principles would seem to be conclusive of the matter without further discussion but for the cases above cited, denying the jurisdiction under the law as it then stood. In Mattison v. Mattison, 1 Strob. Eq. 387, 47 Am. Dec. 541, the court of equity was asked to declare a marriage void on the ground that the complainant was suffering from delirium tremens at the time of the marriage. The court held that such causes were cognizable in England by the ecclesiastical courts alone, that the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts was not conferred on the courts of equity in this state, and that, therefore, the court of equity had no jurisdiction of the cause. Bowers v. Bowers, 10 Rich. Eq. 551, 73 Am. Dec. 99, was a suit for partition involving the validity of a marriage between uncle and niece. The court reaffirmed the rule stated in Mattison v. Mattison, holding that proximity of relationship was altogether a canonical disability, and was therefore not cognizable by the courts of this state. But, when these cases were decided, there was in this state no statute law declaring marriages between certain persons void. In the case last cited the court distinctly holds in the language quoted below that, if there had been such statutes, they would have conferred on the courts of this state jurisdiction to hear suits brought to declare void marriages falling under such statutes. "But the incapacity in respect of proximity of relationship is a canonical, and not a civil, disability. Neither the courts of chancery in England nor any of the law courts had cognizance of canonical disabilities. When Parliament thought proper to interfere and by St. 5, 6 William IV, c. 54, declared that all marriages thereafter celebrated between persons within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity or affinity should be absolutely void, then the objection came within the cognizance of the courts of common law. 2 Steph. Com. 254. So, when the Legislature of South Carolina shall have prescribed within what degrees of relationship marriages shall be invalid, the law will be understood by the citizen, and enforced by the courts." In addition to this, even if we lay out of view the changes in the statutes, notwithstanding the decisions in Mattison v. Mattison and Bowers v. Bowers, the jurisdiction of the court of common pleas may be asserted with confidence on the difference between the jurisdiction conferred by the Constitution of 1790 in force when those cases were decided, and the Constitution of 1895. The reasoning of the court, as we have seen, was that the jurisdiction to declare a marriage void did not belong under the common law to the courts of common law or to the courts of equity, but to the ecclesiastical courts, and the jurisdiction of those courts was not conferred by the Constitution of 1790 or by the statutes passed under the power conferred upon the General Assembly by article 3 of that Constitution upon any court in South Carolina. But this argument does not apply to the Constitution of 1895, which declares that the courts of common pleas "shall have jurisdiction of all civil cases." Article 5, § 15. The Constitution of 1868 contained a similar provision. Article 4, § 15.

In discussing the right under the Constitution of 1868 to apply to the court of common pleas for the assertion of the homestead right, the court thus states and applies the principle under discussion: "The court of common pleas is the general fountain of justice; and where the rights of a citizen, either derived from the common law or the statutes, are invaded and the power to protect is conferred upon no special jurisdiction, he may seek redress in that court." Ex parte Lewie, 17 S. C. 153; Howze v. Howze, 2 S. C. 229. The great weight of authority elsewhere is to the effect that courts of equity have jurisdiction to declare marriages void even where there is no statute regulating the subject. Wightman v. Wightman, 4 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 343; Freda v. Bergman, 77 N. J. Eq. 46, 76 Atl. 460; Bickford v. Bickford, 74 N. H. 478, 69 Atl. 579; 2 Bish. Mar. & Div. §§ 291, 292.

[2] The jurisdiction conferred on the courts by the provisions of the Constitution and the statutes above quoted to entertain a suit to have a marriage declared void is clearly not affected by section 2158 of the Civil Code (Rev. St. 1893), authorizing the institution of a suit to have a marriage doubted or denied by one of the parties declared valid.

[3] It remains to consider the effect of the following statute enacted in 1832 (17 Stat. 681), and appearing now as section 2660 of the Civil Code: "The court of common pleas shall have power to hear and determine any issue affecting the validity of contracts of marriage, and to declare such contracts void for want of consent of either of the contracting parties, or for any other cause going to show that, at the time the said supposed contract was made, it was not a contract: Provided, that such contract has not been consummated by the cohabitation of the parties thereto." This statute, it may be contended, should be construed to mean that in all cases the court is denied jurisdiction to declare any attempted marriage contract void where there has been cohabitation thereunder between the parties. This construction leaves out of view the significance of the word "consummated" used in the statute. To consummate means to complete, or make perfect. To illustrate, a ceremony having the form of a marriage when one of the parties is a lunatic or under compulsion would not be binding, but the lunatic, when reason is restored and the person under compulsion when force is removed, may consummate—that is, complete—the marriage by cohabitation under the attempted contract. In such cases, under the proviso of the statute, that which was not binding before becomes binding and complete by cohabitation, and cannot be declared null by the courts. But clearly the proviso can have no application to that which is in form a marriage contract, but which can never be consummated—that is, made effective—as a marriage. Marriage of a white person and a negro, or of a person having a living spouse, or of a brother and sister, is declared void, and is forbidden by the public policy of the state, as expressed in its statutes. It is impossible, therefore, that such attempts at marriage can be consummated by cohabitation into complete and lawful marriages; and so the proviso cannot be intended to refer to such marriages. The proviso having no application, there is no escape from the conclusion that the statute expressly authorizes the courts to declare such attempted marriages void. There may have been analogy on the question of jurisdiction between a suit for divorce and a suit to have a marriage declared void ab initio when both depended on the common or the canonical law alone; but there is certainly no such analogy now when the Constitution has expressly forbidden divorce, and, on the other hand, the statutes enacted in accordance with the Constitution have expressly declared certain marriages void. There is no doubt, therefore, that the court of common pleas had jurisdiction of this action.

[4] On the merits of the case, however, the judgment of the circuit court must be reversed, and the complaint dismissed. The defendant testified that her husband Whitlock left her about the year 1868, that she had not since heard of him when she married the plaintiff in 1887, and that she did not know him to be living at that time. Upon this point there was no substantial dispute as to the facts. On this branch of the case questions of difficulty arise in the construction of section 2661. That section enacts: "All marriages contracted while either of the parties has a former husband or wife living, shall be void: Provided, that this section shall not extend to a person whose husband or wife shall be absent for the space of seven years, the one not knowing the other to be living during that time. * * * It is manifest that the statute must be limited in its force and effect by the constitutional provision that no divorce shall ever be allowed in this state; for evidently the General Assembly could not by indirection provide for divorce to take place by reason of seven years absence.

It is important to observe, in the first place, that the act of 1712 (2 Stat. 508; 1 James I, c. 11) was a criminal statute, and provided only that the seven years absence should exempt from criminal prosecution. It had no effect on the matrimonial bond or civil status of the parties. 4 Black. Com. 164; McCarty v. McCarty, 2 Strob. 6, 47 Am. Dec. 585; Duke v. Fulmer, 5 Rich. Eq. 121. But by legislative authority section 2661 has been introduced into the Civil Code of the state in the chapter relating to marriage, and it must be given effect according to its terms in fixing the civil status of the persons whose matrimonial relations fall under it. If this last section stood alone, there can be little doubt that the statute would have this meaning and effect: When a husband had departed and had not been heard of for seven years, and was not known by his forsaken wife to be alive, a second marriage contracted by the wife would not be void. If the first husband should afterwards be discovered alive, the second marriage would not become void even then, but would be voidable at the instance of any of the parties concerned. The children of the second marriage before the decree of annulment would be legitimate, and property rights acquired on the faith of the second marriage would not be lost. Such was the construction put upon a similar statute by Chancellor Walworth in Valleau v. Valleau, 6 Paige (N. Y.) 207. But this broad construction is not admissible in this state, for under it the statute would be unconstitutional as an attempt to provide in effect for a dissolution of the marriage tie. Marriage being indissoluble in this state, the General Assembly cannot enact a statute providing that absence or any other fact shall produce dissolution while both parties are alive, so that a second marriage would be valid in any sense whatever. The second marriage during the life of the first husband must under the Constitution be absolutely void. But the statute, notwithstanding, does have a very important effect on the status of the spouse who has been abandoned for seven years as indicated by the statute. He or she may marry again, and, while the wife or husband remains absent, the parties under the second marriage are entitled to full legal recognition as man and wife with regard to the enforcement of rights and the assumption of obligations as such; but all this must be at the risk that, if it turns out that the first spouse was alive at the time the second marriage was undertaken, then the second marriage will be void, and all supposed rights acquired under it will fall to the ground. The second marriage in such a case is like administration on the estate of one supposed to be dead. When such person is shown to be alive, the administration is held void. It follows that in this case, as Whitlock, the first husband, was in fact alive and the husband of the defendant at the date the ceremony of marriage was performed between the plaintiff and the defendant, that ceremony was without effect, and the attempted marriage void.

[5] But this is not decisive of the case, for the important fact remains that the plaintiff and defendant lived together and held themselves out as husband and wife after the death of Whitlock, and when neither knew that he had been alive at any time during their coverture. In the case of Campbell v. Campbell, 1 H. L. Sc. 182, known as the "Breadalbane Case," a married woman eloped and lived in adultery with her paramour under the public pretense by both that they were married. After the death of the woman's husband, they continued to live as before, still holding themselves out to the world as husband and wife. The House of Lords adjudged that though the beginning of the connection was adulterous, yet the relation of marriage commenced as soon as the parties were made capable of contracting marriage by the death of the woman's husband. The tendency of the courts of this country is to condemn this case as going too far, and to hold that, where the relation began as meretricious, it cannot be converted into a marriage by the mere removal of the obstacle to marriage without some subsequent agreement to be husband and wife. But the authorities are unanimous in holding that if a man and woman enter into a contract of marriage believing in good faith that they are capable of entering into the relation notwithstanding a former marriage, when, in fact, the marriage is still of force, and after the removal of the obstacle of the former marriage the parties continue the relation and hold themselves out as man and wife, such action constitutes them man and wife from the date of the removal of the obstacle. Eaton v. Eaton, 66 Neb. 676, 92 N. W. 995, 60 L. R. A. 605, 1 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 199, and note; Adger v. Ackerman, 115 Fed. 124, 52 C. C. A. 568; Chamberlain v. Chamberlain, 68 N. J. Eq. 736, 62 Atl. 680, 6 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 483, and note, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 244, and note, 111 Am. St. Rep. 658, and note; Land v. Land, 206 Ill. 288, 68 N. E. 1109, 99 Am. St. Rep. 171, and note. In Collins v. Voorhees, 47 N. J. Eq. 555, 22 Atl. 1054, Chief Justice Beasley thus criticises the "Breadalbane Case," and states the true rule: "The doctrine of that case is supported by nothing that preceded or that has followed it, and is altogether anomalous, and it seems to me it was properly rejected by this court. In the case the court acted upon the principle that, if a man and woman agreed to live together adulterously with a simulation of marriage, there should be an inference of a subsequent valid marriage from the fact that such simulation had been continued after the death of the husband of the adulteress. Why such an inference is to be thus deduced is not apparent, unless it be for the promotion of adultery. By its prevalence, the adulterous purpose is controverted into a matrimonial purpose without a particle of reasonable evidence in support of the alleged change of intention. * * * Lord Westbury strangely compares the case before him with those instances where the parties intended originally to marry, and not to commit adultery; their intent being frustrated by the existence of some unknown obstacle. And yet it is presumed that no one who will look with any care into the subject will have the slightest doubt that these two classes of cases, with respect to the methods of their proof, respectively rest upon entirely different foundations, for when the parties have intended marriage, being ignorant of an existing impediment, all that is to be established by cohabitation apparently matrimonial subsequent to the removal of such impediment is the carrying into effect by the parties of their original purpose; but, when the original purpose was to live in adultery, the evidence, under similar circumstances, must be sufficient to show an abandonment of such purpose and the execution of a new one. These lines of cases can be confounded only by want of careful observation of the principles upon which they rest."

It may be of interest to note that, before the decision of the cases just cited, it was said in Bish. Mar. & Div. § 508: "The rule ought to be—the writer regrets that he cannot refer to any case establishing the rule to be so in actual adjudication—that where the desire for actual, lawful marriage, as distinguished from a living together in the way of concubinage, is shown to exist in the minds of both the parties, and, such desire continuing, they are shown to dwell together as husband and wife but for a single day after the impediment is removed, this shall be held, not merely as raising a prima facie presumption of marriage solemnized after the impediment is removed, but as constituting marriage itself. Indeed, there are in such circumstances both the matrimonial consent and the actual dwelling together in marriage, and there is the legal capacity to intermarry. If these do not constitute matrimony itself, in distinction from the mere evidence of it, where no formal solemnization is required, it is difficult to say what does."

It is not easy to say what was the extent of the holding in State v. Whaley, 10 S. C. 500, cited by the circuit court as conclusive of this case. The decision turned on the following instruction to the jury: "But assuming Pleasants to have been his legal wife, if after her death defendant acknowledged the second marriage to Betsy and recognized her as his legal wife, that this at common law would constitute such marriage as would constitute the third marriage to Charity bigamous." The ground as we understand, upon which this instruction was held erroneous, is thus stated in the opinion: "This part of the charge may readily have been construed as meaning that if after the death of Pleasants the defendant acknowledged the fact of having been married to Betsy Moore during the lifetime of Pleasants that such an acknowledgment was entitled to be received as evidence of marriage. Such an inference would clearly be erroneous, as that marriage, assuming the original illegality could not become the source of the legal relation of marriage through any acknowledgment of the fact of its existence." This we think all that the case decides on this subject. It is perfectly obvious, as held by the court, that no mere acknowledgment or admission by the defendant in that case or by the plaintiff in this that he had contracted a second marriage while the first was in existence could make the second marriage valid. To produce that effect, there must be, as there was in this case, not only profession that the marriage relation was assumed, but the actual continuation in it after the removal of the obstacle which made it invalid at the beginning. We are not inclined to accept any dictum of Chief Justice Willard going beyond this, because we think it contrary to the reason of the matter, and to the entire current of judicial thought and expression on the subject.

[8] The position that the defendant was not innocent, and that she perpetrated a legal fraud on the plaintiff, in that she did not disclose to him her former marriage with Whitlock, is, we think, unsound. The plaintiff made no inquiry as to defendant's past life, and the defendant made no false representation to him with respect to it. Whitlock, her former husband, having been absent seven years unheard of, and not known to be alive, neither the criminal nor the civil law forbade her to enter again into the relation of marriage, and no wrong or fraud can be imputed to her for doing so. The attempt to be relieved from the marriage tie comes with ill grace from the plaintiff, and his charge of fraud does not commend itself to the court; for the evidence produces the conviction that his cruelty drove from her home a woman who had been faithful to him in all the duties of a wife for many years, and that this suit was commenced because of the separation thus brought about by the misconduct of the plaintiff, and not because of the former marriage of the defendant.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the complaint dismissed.

HYDRICK, J., concurs in the result.

STATE v. JONES.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 6, 1912.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 763, 764*)—INSTRUCTIONS—COMMENT ON TESTIMONY.

A charge: "You are prepared to hear the charge * * * and to retire after hearing that charge and go over the testimony and extricate from the testimony the truth of the case"—is not a charge on the facts, as stating that there was both truth and falsity in the testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1781-1748; Dec. Dig. §§ 763, 764.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 823*)—MANSLAUGHTER—SELF-DEFENSE—INSTRUCTIONS.

A statement, in charging on the distinction between murder and manslaughter, that when a man strikes another a blow, and that man, acting under the influence provoked thereby, shoots and kills, he is guilty of manslaughter, is not objectionable as excluding self-defense, where that defense is presented by a charge immediately following.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1902-1996; Dec. Dig. § 823.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 822*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUISITES.

Where the instructions as a whole declare the law applicable to the case, the instructions are sufficient, and all the law of the case need not be stated in a single proposition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1990-1996; Dec. Dig. § 822.*]

4. HOMICIDE (§ 118*)—SELF-DEFENSE—RETREAT.

Where one can with reasonable safety to himself retreat and thereby avoid the necessity to kill in self-defense, the necessity for killing does not exist, but one need not retreat where by so doing he will probably endanger his safety, and the necessity to kill must be either real or apparent to be determined by the jury, in view of the circumstances, and by applying the rule that accused must believe and act as a man of ordinary reason and firmness under such circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 168-171; Dec. Dig. § 118.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1144*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS—COMPLIANCE.

Where accused presented written requests to charge, and the court read them to the jury without objection or modification or refusal to charge any of the requests, the court on appeal must assume that the court intended to give the requests as read.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2736-2781; Dec. Dig. § 1144.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 789*)—SELF-DEFENSE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the court expressly charged that accused need only establish self-defense by a preponderance of the evidence, and that the guilt of accused must be shown beyond a reasonable doubt, a charge that every element of the case must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt was not objectionable as leading the jury to believe that self-defense must be established beyond a reasonable doubt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1846-1849, 1904-1922; Dec. Dig. § 789.*]

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 923*)—NEW TRIAL—DISQUALIFICATION OF JURORS.

Accused, seeking a new trial on the ground of the disqualification of a juror, must show the disqualification, that it was unknown before the verdict, and that he was not negligent in failing to discover the disqualification before verdict.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2219-2237; Dec. Dig. § 923.*]

8. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 923*)—NEW TRIAL—DISQUALIFICATION OF JURORS.

Where the trial court, on motion for new trial on the ground of the disqualification of a juror because over 65 years old, found that the jurors had been drawn for 14 days, that their names had been published in the county papers a week or ten days before the court convened, that the juror was well known in the community, and that the slightest inquiry would have made known the fact that he was over age, a finding of failure to exercise diligence in discovering the disqualification before trial was justified.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Orangeburg County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

John J. Jones was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Wolfe & Berry, Glaze & Herbert, and C. P. Brunson, for appellant. P. T. Hildebrand, Sol., for the State.

JONES, C. J. The appellant, John J. Jones, tried under an indictment charging him with the murder of Abe Pearlstine, was convicted of manslaughter and sentenced to ten years and one month in the penitentiary.

[1] The court instructed the jury: "You are prepared to hear the charge of the court and to retire after hearing that charge and go over the testimony and extricate from the testimony the truth of the case." By his first exception appellant contends that this was a charge on the facts, in that it in effect declared that there was both truth and falsity in the testimony.

The charge was general and did nothing more than require the jury to ascertain the truth of the case from the testimony. No testimony was singled out as true or false, and there was nothing to indicate the court's opinion of the testimony one way or the other.

The second and third exceptions were withdrawn.

[2] The fourth exception complains of the following language in the charge: "So when a man strikes another a blow, and that man, acting under the influence provoked by the blow, shoots and kills, that is a clear case of manslaughter." The contention being that the charge excluded self-defense and was a statement of facts in the case. The context shows that the court was instructing the jury as to the distinction between murder and manslaughter, and that the facts were stated hypothetically, as appears by the following extract embracing the portion to which exception is taken: "Now the killing of a human being in sudden heat and passion is not always manslaughter. A man may kill another that way and it may be murder. The test is: Was the sudden heat and passion engendered by such provocation as the law recognizes? The law recognizes a blow as a provocation. If a man strikes another a blow, and he becomes provoked by the blow and acts under the influence of that provocation and shoots and kills, then the law reduces the killing from murder to manslaughter, unless sufficient time elapsed between the striking of the blow and the killing in which a man of ordinary reason, prudence, and caution should have cooled, and would have cooled, from the provocation. That is a matter for the jury. The law says that a man must cool in such time as a man of reasonable firmness and prudence and caution would have cooled in and should have cooled in; so when a man strikes another a blow, and that man, acting under the influence provoked by the blow, shoots and kills, that is a clear case of manslaughter, but, if any time intervenes between the striking of the blow and the firing of the fatal shot, then it is for the jury to say whether that time that has elapsed was sufficient to constitute cooling time; that is, if a man of ordinary reason and firmness and prudence would have cooled. If such time has elapsed, then the provocation cannot be invoked as an excuse."

[3] After this charge the court immediately proceeded to instruct as to the law of self-defense. It was not error, in stating the distinction between murder and manslaughter, to omit immediate reference to the law of self-defense. All the law of a case need not be stated in a single proposition. It is sufficient if the charge as a whole declares the law applicable to the case. State v. McKellar, 85 S. C. 240, 67 S. E. 314.

[4] The fifth exception complains that the court erroneously charged the law regarding the rule or doctrine of retreat, in respect to the plea of self-defense, limiting the right to stand one's ground to cases where a firearm or some dangerous weapon was actually drawn for use or being used, thus depriving the defendant of the right to act on appearances and stand his ground if he reasonably apprehends that his assailant is armed and seeks favorable opportunity to draw and use his weapon.

The charge is not subject to the criticism stated, as a reference thereto will show that the court charged that one assailed is not required to retreat, "if by so doing he would probably endanger his safety." The whole instruction on this point gave the defendant the benefit of the law that the necessity to kill must be either real or apparent, to be determined by the jury, in view of the circumstances surrounding the defendant, and by applying the rule that the defendant must believe and act as a man of ordinary reason and firmness would in such circumstances. The law was correctly declared in conformity with the rule thus stated by Mr. Justice Hydrick in State v. McKellar, supra: "If one can with reasonable safety to himself retreat and thereby avoid the necessity to strike in self-defense, then the necessity for which the law will excuse him for striking cannot be said to exist."

The sixth exception was abandoned, and the seventh, eighth, and ninth exceptions will be considered last.

[5] The tenth exception complains that the presiding judge refused to charge defendant's first, third, fifth, eighth, ninth, and tenth requests to charge. The record shows that defendant presented 11 requests to charge in writing, and that the court read them all to the jury, and that he did not object to, modify, or refuse to charge any of the requests mentioned in the exception. Under these circumstances, we are bound to assume that instruction was intended to be given in accordance with the requests read to the jury. Moreover, the general charge as a whole substantially covered the law applicable to the case.

[6] The eleventh exception assigns error in the charge to the jury: "The law is that every material element of the case must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt." The ground of objection being that defendant had interposed a plea of self-defense, and that such material element in the case was only to be proved by the preponderance of the evidence. We fail to see any merit in this exception. The court was instructing the jury with respect to the case which the state was required to prove, and in another portion of the charge the jury were instructed to acquit the defendant if his plea of self-defense was made out by the preponderance of the evidence, and further to acquit defendant unless they were satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that his plea of self-defense was not made out. The defendant has no ground to complain of the charge, as it gave him full benefit of the rule established in this state that, where self-defense is pleaded to an indictment, the defendant must establish it by the preponderance of the evidence; but at the same time the guilt of the accused must be made to appear beyond a reasonable doubt. State v. Welsh, 29 S. C. 4, 6 S. E. 894; State v. Bodie, 33 S. C. 132, 11 S. E. 624; State v. McDaniel, 68 S. C. 304, 47 S. E. 384, 102 Am. St. Rep. 661.

[7] The seventh, eighth, and ninth exceptions allege error in the refusal to grant a new trial because one of the jurors, A. E. Rutland, was disqualified by age to serve as a juror. The Constitution (article 5, § 22) provides: "Each juror must be a qualified elector under the provisions of this Constitution between the ages of twenty-one and sixty-five years and of good moral character." It is contended that the juror was over 65 years at the time of the trial in January, 1911. At the time of the motion, Juror Rutland was absent, and no affidavit from him as to his age was presented. There were affidavits in which the affiants swore that Rutland told them that he was 65 years old in September before the trial. It also was made to appear that Rutland was not registered as an elector in Liberty township where he was residing, but was registered in Willow township, Orangeburg county, in 1908, where his age was stated to be 62, which if true would make him less than 65 at the time of the trial. It appeared also by affidavit that neither defendant nor any one of his counsel knew at the time of the trial that Rutland was over age.

It was incumbent on movant to show (1) the fact of disqualification, (2) that it was unknown before verdict, and (3) that he was not negligent in making discovery of the disqualification before verdict.

[8] The circuit court ruled as follows: "My finding is that, considering the facts set out in the affidavits, there was no sufficient diligence shown. The jurors had been drawn for 14 days before court, and I believe that it is conceded that the names were published in the county papers a week or ten days before court convened, this gentleman was well known in the community, and the lawyers had the list of the jurors in their hands, and there were important cases to be tried, and as every one knows the list was gone over by the lawyers and every one interested in the case. The slightest inquiry would have made known the fact that the juror was over age. If he had been asked, I have no idea but that he would have told the truth. The juror was brought up and presented, and it was quite possible that he might have been near the age of disqualification. You went ahead and swore him on the jury and did not exercise that diligence which is required. I would certainly overrule the motion for a new trial on that ground, considering the facts that are before me. I think it is a fair question for debate as to whether the gentleman was over 65 years or not. Very often a gentleman of that age is uncertain as to his age, very possibly he might have been under 65. It is very unfortunate that he was not asked the question as to his age before he was sworn, instead of waiting until afterwards."

It thus appears that movant failed to satisfy the court as to the fact of disqualification and as to the exercise of due diligence in making discovery of the disqualification, if such existed. We cannot upon the record say that the conclusion of the circuit court was contrary to all the evidence, or that the ruling was an abuse of discretion.

The failure to exercise due diligence in the use of easily available means of discovering whether a juror is disqualified by age or by not being a qualified elector precludes raising the objection as a ground for new trial. Blassingame v. Laurens, 80 S. C. 48, 61 S. E. 96.

The exceptions are overruled, and the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

STATE ex rel. LYON, Atty. Gen., v. BRADY et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 5, 1912.)

NUISANCE (§ 84*)—INJUNCTION—ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE—RETURN—ABATEMENT BY PARTIES.

A party who has been ordered to show cause why he should not be enjoined from maintaining a public nuisance cannot arrest the proceeding by a return merely alleging that he no longer maintains the nuisance at the particular place mentioned in the petition; but to authorize the court to dismiss the proceedings, on the ground of a bona fide abatement, there must be a satisfactory showing that the acts alleged to constitute the nuisance are no longer done by the parties anywhere within the jurisdiction of the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Nuisance, Dec. Dig. § 84.*]

Action by the State, on the relation of J. Fraser Lyon, as Attorney General, against P. A. Brady, State Agricultural & Mechanical Society, and others. On preliminary returns on an order to show cause why they should not be enjoined from maintaining a public nuisance, proceedings dismissed as to State Agricultural & Mechanical Society, and other defendants ordered to file final and complete returns.

Asst. Atty. Gen. M. P. DeBruhl for petitioner. Nelson, Nelson & Gettys, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. In response to the order heretofore made by the Chief Justice, requiring the defendants to show cause why they should not be enjoined from maintaining a public betting place, alleged in the petition to be a public nuisance, the defendants have submitted preliminary returns, averring that the horse racing upon which it was alleged the bets were made, and all that pertained to it, had been discontinued, and that none of the acts complained of are now done at the fair grounds, near the city of Columbia—the place where it was alleged the nuisance was maintained.

A party to a proceeding to enjoin the maintenance of a public nuisance cannot arrest the proceedings by alleging merely that he no longer maintains the nuisance at the particular place mentioned in the petition. For the court to exercise its discretion to dismiss the proceedings, on the ground that there has been a bona fide abatement by the party charged, there must be a satisfactory showing that the abatement is complete. The averments of discontinuance, except that of State Agricultural & Mechanical Society, are therefore insufficient, in that they do not show that the acts alleged to constitute a nuisance are no longer done by the parties anywhere within the jurisdiction of the court. The return of State Agricultural & Mechanical Society comes up to this requirement.

The court can take no cognizance of any alleged verbal agreement between the Attorney General and counsel for defendants.

It is therefore ordered that the proceedings be dismissed as against the State Agricultural & Mechanical Society, upon its payment of the costs incurred in the proceedings against it. It is further ordered that the other defendants do present their final and complete returns to this court at 10 o'clock on Monday, January 8, 1912.

STATE v. HYDE.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 6, 1912.)

1. JURY (§ 108*)—COMPETENCY—VIEWS AS TO CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

In a capital case, though the punishment is in the province of the court, a juror who states on his voir dire that he is opposed to capital punishment is properly excluded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. § 491; Dec. Dig. § 108.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1166½*)—HARMLESS ERROR—JURY—CHALLENGES AND OBJECTIONS.

Where a defendant completes his jury without exhausting his right of peremptory challenge, any error of the court in excluding or presenting jurors is cured.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 3117; Dec. Dig. § 1166½.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 478*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—EXAMINATION OF EXPERT—FACTS FORMING BASIS OF OPINION.

A witness is competent to give his opinion as an expert when the facts upon which it is based are within his own knowledge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1065; Dec. Dig. § 478.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 470*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—EXPERT—HYPOTHETICAL QUESTION.

Where the partial insanity of defendant was in issue in a murder case, the testimony of medical experts, who had no knowledge of his condition at the time of the murder, as to his mental condition at that time, was inadmissible, except upon a hypothetical state of facts, since the province of the expert is to draw inferences from, but not to decide, the facts of the case.

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 656*)—EXAMINATION OF EXPERT—QUESTION BY JUDGE.

In a trial for murder, where the defense was partial insanity, defendant's medical witness was asked by the court as to his opinion whether every man who commits a deliberate, premeditated murder was crazy. Held that, as the question was asked merely for the purpose of understanding the testimony, it was not prejudicial error.

6. HOMICIDE (§ 237*)—MURDER—"INSANITY."

In order for defendant in a murder case to establish the defense of insanity, he must prove by a preponderance of the evidence that at the time the act was done he did not realize either that it was morally or criminally wrong.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Anderson County; G. E. Prince, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Samuel N. Hyde was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed and remanded.

The court charged in part as follows:

"Excusable homicide, Mr. Foreman, is where a man is insane, whether it be monomania, or whether general insanity to such an extent that at the time the act is done he doesn't realize either that it is morally wrong or that it is criminally wrong.

"Every man is presumed, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, to be sane. And when it has once been shown to the satisfaction of the jury beyond a reasonable doubt that a defendant has taken the life of his fellow man unlawfully, and he seeks to be excused on the ground that he was insane, whether generally or merely on one subject, then the burden of proof as to insanity is cast by the law on him, and he must establish that by the greater weight of the evidence."

Leon L. Rice, for appellant. Solicitor Bonham, for the State.

GARY, A. J. The defendant was convicted of murder, and sentenced to be hanged, and this is an appeal from that sentence.

The facts are thus stated in the record: "This case came on to be heard before his honor, Judge Prince, and a jury in the 1911 fall term of sessions court for Anderson county, and resulted in a verdict of guilty of murder. The defendant was sentenced to hang on October 20th, and execution was stayed by defendant's appeal. The defendant was duly arraigned and pleaded guilty. The court refused to accept the plea, and appointed Leon L. Rice, a lawyer of the bar, to defend the prisoner. The details of the homicide are not disputed, and for the purposes of this appeal a brief statement only will be made as to the homicide. In the dead hours of the night, the defendant stole into the room of his sleeping wife, wherein slept his little sister-in-law, his father-in-law, and his mother-in-law. Turning up the lighted lamp in the room, he began firing a pistol into the body of his wife, three bullets taking effect, and two striking but not mortally wounding his sister-in-law. His father-in-law, in an effort to restrain defendant, was shot in the scuffle and killed. Defendant's pistol was found in the hall empty, and shells, some loaded and some empty, were found scattered around the floor. The state's witnesses testified that defendant said: "Turn me loose! I am going to kill myself." And others testified that after he had left the room he asked some one to get a gun and shoot him. The defendant, after committing the awful deed, surrendered himself to the sheriff, and stated that he was satisfied with his little deed; that he had not slept for two weeks; but that he slept well the night of the homicide. He stated that he was sorry he killed the old man, but that his wife was the only woman he ever loved, and her people would not let her live with him, so he decided to end it all. The defendant, by counsel, set up the plea of monomania, or partial insanity."

[1] The first exception is as follows: "Because his honor erred in refusing to present the juror W. W. White, after examination on his voir dire. The error being that the jurors' view as to capital punishment could not affect his right to sit as a juror, when the punishment is in the province of the court."

The case of State v. James, 34 S. C. 49, 12 S. E. 657, shows that this exception cannot be sustained.

[2] Furthermore, it was held, in the case of State v. Anderson, 26 S. C. 599, 2 S. E. 699, that where the prisoner completes his jury, without exhausting his right of challenge, this cures any error on the part of the presiding judge, in excluding or presenting a previous juror.

[3] The second exception is as follows: "Because his honor erred in refusing to allow the physicians, who testified that they were graduates of a medical school, and had been for a long time engaged in the practice of medicine, to answer the question of defendant's counsel as to the mentality of defendant. The error being that to require hypothetical questions was to deprive the defendant of the opinion of an expert witness, on the very point of his defense, that of partial insanity, or monomania." The questions excluded were intended to elicit the opinion of the doctors as to the defendant's mental condition, not at the time they examined him, but at the time of the homicide, and they knew nothing of his mental condition at that time.

[4] The ruling of his honor, the presiding judge, is sustained by the case of Easler v. Railway, 59 S. C. 311, 37 S. E. 938, in which the court says: "Without undertaking to review in detail the different cases in this state upon this subject, we will state the rules that have been followed: First. A witness is competent to give his opinion as an expert, when the facts upon which it is based are within his own knowledge. Second. If the facts upon which his opinion is formed are in issue, his testimony is not admissible, except upon a hypothetical state of facts. Third. If the mode in which an injury was inflicted, or the extent thereof, is itself one of the disputed facts in the case, the witness will not be allowed to testify that in his opinion the injury was inflicted in a certain manner, or to a certain extent. In such case he must testify as to a hypothetical state of facts. The province of the expert is to draw inferences from, but not to decide, the facts of the case; and, in order to draw proper inferences from the facts in the case, they must either be within his own knowledge or undisputed, otherwise he would usurp the powers of the jury."

[5] The third exception is as follows: "Because his honor erred in asking the question of defendant's witness Dr. Ashmore relative to his opinion of any man who committed a horrible murder and his sanity. The error being that said question, coming as it did from the court, was prejudicial to defendant's defense in the eyes of the jury."

The court propounded this question to the witness: "Do I understand it to be your opinion that every man who commits a deliberate, premeditated murder is crazy?" To this question the witness answered: "No, sir; not necessarily so." The question was propounded, for the purpose, merely, of understanding the testimony, and the appellant has failed to show that it was prejudicial error.

[6] The fourth exception is as follows: "Because his honor erred in charging the jury that, in order to establish the defense of insanity, it is incumbent on the defendant to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that he did not know right from wrong. It being submitted that the very nature of defendant's defense presupposed that he was sane on all subjects save one, that of his love for his wife, and being therefore a plea of partial insanity, it was error to charge the broad principle of knowledge of right and wrong, and thereby convey the idea to the jury that, if defendant knew right from wrong, his insanity on the one subject could not avail him as a defense. This charge absolutely precluded the jury from inquiring further than defendant's general knowledge of right and wrong, and made the defendant guilty upon the admitted facts of his defense."

The charge of his honor, the presiding judge, conformed to the doctrine announced in the case of State v. Bundy, 24 S. C. 439, 58 Am. Rep. 263.

Appellant's attorney was granted permission to review said case, but he has failed to satisfy this court that it should be overruled.

The fifth exception is as follows: "Because his honor erred in failing to charge defendant's fifth request to charge which was submitted in writing within the rule of court, and which it is submitted was a proper statement of the law. Since it was directed at the state's own proof of reason, as a necessary element of murder, the failure to charge was thereby prejudicial."

The fifth request to charge was as follows: "I charge you that an indictment for murder substantially alleges, not only the facts of homicide, but also a criminal intent, which presupposes reason."

When his honor, the presiding judge, overruled the motion for a new trial, he also made the statement that the fifth request was overlooked, and that counsel should have called attention to the oversight.

In the light of the entire charge, the appellant has failed to show that the overlooking of this self-evident proposition was prejudicial error.

The sixth exception is as follows: "Because the jury erred in finding the defendant guilty of murder, when the greater weight of the evidence clearly showed that he was incapable of forming the malice necessary to constitute murder. The error being that the charge of knowledge of right and wrong was erroneous and necessarily prejudicial."

What has already been said disposes of this exception.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed, and that the case be remanded to that court, for the purpose of having another day assigned, for the execution of the sentence.

ATLANTIC COAST LUMBER CORPORATION v. LITCHFIELD et al.†

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 6, 1912.)

LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*)—TIMBER DEED—CONSTRUCTION.

A deed of the timber on land described which grants all the timber of a specified diameter and upwards to have and to hold the timber and exclusive rights of way specified unto the grantee, successors and assigns, and which gives to the grantee 10 years, beginning from the time the cutting and removal of the timber is begun, in which to cut and remove the timber, requires the grantee to commence the cutting and removal of the timber within a reasonable time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Logs and Logging, Cent. Dig. §§ 6-12; Dec. Dig. § 3*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Berkeley County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by the Atlantic Coast Lumber Corporation against John Litchfield and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

The following is the deed referred to in the opinion:

"This deed and contract, made by and between A. J. Litchfield of the county of Berkeley, in the state of South Carolina, party of the first part, hereinafter called the first party, and the Atlantic Coast Lumber Company, a corporation chartered under the laws of the state of Virginia, the principal office of which is in the city of Norfolk, in said state, party of the second part, hereinafter called the second part, witnesseth: That the said first party, for and in consideration of the sum of one hundred and eighty and no-100 dollars, cash in hand paid, by the said second party, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, have granted, bargained, sold and released, and by these presents does grant, bargain, sell and release, unto the said second party, its successors and assigns, all the timber of every kind and description, both standing and fallen, of twelve (12) inches stump diameter and upwards, twelve inches from the ground, at the time of cutting, on all of that certain piece, parcel or tract of land known as 'Hickory Grove' situate in St. Stephen's township, in the county of Berkeley and state of South Carolina, containing five hundred and ninety-five (595) acres, more or less, and bounded and described as follows, to wit: On the north by the lands of J. W. Thornley; on the east by the lands of W. M. Williams; on the south by the lands of — Iramer; and on the west by the lands of George Wright, or the lands formerly of the estate of I. R. Brinson, deceased.

"And the said first party further reserves the right to use any timber from the aforesaid tract or tracts of land for ordinary plantation purposes connected with said land, this reservation, however, not to include the right to clear the said land or any of it.

"This deed further witnesseth, that the party of the first part does also grant, bargain, sell and convey to the party of the second part, its successors or assigns, a permanent and exclusive right of way (80) feet wide upon and across the tract or tracts of land, described as aforesaid and on all contiguous lands, to be selected and located by the said second party, its successors or assigns, whenever or wherever so desired, to be used for a permanent railroad or tramway, or for any permanent branch railroad or tramway.

"Together with the following rights and privileges, to be exercised at any and all times during the continuance of this contract at the pleasure of the said second party, its successors or assigns, namely: To enter freely upon the above-described tract or tracts of land, to have and enjoy all necessary or convenient rights of way, to be located by said second party, its successors or assigns, over said land and contiguous lands, for ingress and egress, at any and all times, for men, teams and vehicles; to cut and make roads over said lands; to build, construct, maintain and operate railroads, tramways, cart and wagon ways across said lands on such routes as may be selected by said second party, its successors or assigns; to establish and maintain stables and other fixtures or buildings on said land; and to do any and all other things that may be necessary or convenient for the cutting, handling, hauling and removing of the timber as aforesaid from the above described tract or tracts of land, and for the transportation of any other timber, and articles of every kind and description that the second party may desire to transport over the said roads, or any of them; with the right to cut and use all such small timber and bush, as may in the judgment of the second party, its successors or assigns, be required to build, construct and maintain the aforesaid railroads, tramways, cart and wagon ways, roadways and buildings; fixtures and structures during the continuance of this contract, for the removal of the timber herein before conveyed; and together also with the right of the second party, its successors or assigns, to remove, at its or their pleasure, at any time during this contract, or at any time after its termination, all rails, buildings, structures, fixtures and other property it or they may have placed on said land.

"To have and to hold all and singular the aforesaid timber situate on the aforesaid tract or tracts of land, except that above reserved, unto the said second party, its successors or assigns, and to have and to hold the aforesaid permanent and exclusive rights of way unto the said second party, its successors or assigns forever.

"And the said first party for himself or themselves and for his or their heirs, executors and administrators, do covenant with the said second party, its successors or assigns, as follows:

"First. That the said first party will warrant and forever defend all and singular the title to the timber upon the aforesaid premises, and also the title to the said permanent and other rights of way and other privileges hereby granted unto the said second party, its successors or assigns, against his heirs and all others lawfully or otherwise claiming or to claim the same or any part thereof.

"Second. That the said second party, its successors or assigns, shall have, and the same is hereby granted to it or them, the period of ten (10) years, beginning from the time that the said second party, its successors or assigns, begins the cutting and removing of the aforesaid timber from the tract or tracts of land above described, in which to cut and remove the said timber from the said land, and that in case the said timber is not cut and removed before the expiration of said period, then the said second party, its successors or assigns, shall have such additional time therefor as it, or they may desire, but, in the last mentioned event, the said second party, its successors or assigns, shall, during the extended period, pay interest on the original purchase price above mentioned year by year, in advance, at the rate of six (6) per cent. per annum.

"Third. The said first party further agrees that the timber cut by the said second party, its successors or assigns, for the purpose of opening, clearing, building and construction of the railroads, tramways, etc., as hereinbefore provided for, shall in no way whatsoever affect the time granted for cutting and removing the timber conveyed under this deed from the tract or tracts of land aforesaid.

"Fourth. That the first party shall and will promptly pay all taxes that are now due, or that hereafter may become due, on the said land and timber.

"The said second party, for itself, its successors or assigns covenants with the said first party, his heirs, administrators and assigns, that the said second party, its successors or assigns, shall and will pay any damage done to growing crops in the selection and location of the rights of way above provided for; also any damage that may accrue to the first party, by reason of any negligence on the part of the agents or employees of the second party, its successors or assigns, during the continuance of this contract, said damages to be assessed and ascertained by two disinterested persons, one to be chosen by each of the parties to this contract, and, in case they disagree, the two so chosen to select a third, and the decision of any two of the persons so selected shall be made in writing and shall be final and binding upon all the parties hereto.

"All the covenants, stipulations and agreements herein assumed or undertaken by either party to this contract, shall be binding upon their respective heirs, executors, administrators, successors or assigns, and all benefits and advantages herein provided for either of the said parties, shall accrue to their respective heirs, executors, administrators, successors or assigns, as the case may be."

E. J. Dennis and W. A. Holman, for appellants. Octavus Cohen and Willcox & Willcox, for respondent.

JONES, C. J. The plaintiff brought this action against defendants to perpetually enjoin them from cutting timber from certain lands described, situated in Berkeley county, in violation of plaintiff's rights alleged to have been acquired under a timber deed and contract executed by A. J. Litchfield and the Atlantic Coast Lumber Company on August 21, 1899. The plaintiff claims as successor of the Atlantic Coast Lumber Company, and the defendants claim as grantees of A. J. Litchfield.

The question submitted to the circuit court was whether upon a proper construction of the deed the plaintiff was required to begin to cut the timber within a reasonable time. Judge Memminger, presiding, granted permanent injunction, holding that the deed did not require the plaintiff to commence removal of the timber within a reasonable time after its execution. The timber deed and contract in question is substantially in the terms of the deed and contract construed in Flagler v. Atlantic Coast Lumber Corporation, 89 S. C. 328, 71 S. E. 849, and McClary v. Atlantic Coast Lumber Corporation, 72 S. E. 145, and it is conceded by respondent that these cases warrant reversal if the court adheres to the construction therein made. The court is not disposed to disturb the authority of those cases. Judge Memminger's ruling was previous to the filing of the decision in the above-named cases.

The judgment of the circuit court is reversed.

BUTLER v. SOUTHERN RY., CAROLINA DIVISION.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 29, 1911.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 243*)—MUNICIPAL REGULATIONS—CONSTRUCTION.

A city ordinance requiring every railroad company to maintain at every crossing a man with a white flag during the daytime and with a red light during the nighttime to display the flag or light when a train may be approaching is intended to subserve all useful purposes to prevent injuries at crossings, and a failure to comply with the ordinance renders crossings more dangerous to the public.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 754, 757; Dec. Dig. § 243.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 308*)—OPERATION OF TRAINS—NEGLIGENCE PER SE.

The failure of a railroad company to comply with a city ordinance regulating the speed of trains within the city limits, and requiring every railroad company to maintain at every crossing a man with a flag during the daytime and with a red light at night to display the flag or light when a train is approaching, is negligence per se.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 978-980; Dec. Dig. § 308.*]

3. RAILROADS (§ 350*)—ACCIDENTS AT CROSSINGS—NEGLIGENCE—PROXIMATE CAUSE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where, in an action against a railroad company for the death of a person struck by a train at a crossing, there was evidence of the negligence of the company in failing to comply with a city ordinance regulating the operation of trains, and of decedent's negligence, the question whether the negligence of the company or the negligence of decedent was the proximate cause was for the jury.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Charleston County; Ernest Gary, Judge.

Action by George F. Butler, administrator of Jeremiah F. Butler, deceased, against the Southern Railway, Carolina Division. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and new trial granted.

Logan & Grace, for appellant. J. W. Barnwell, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for damages alleged to have been sustained through the negligence and recklessness of the defendant in causing the death of plaintiff's intestate.

The allegations of the complaint material to the consideration of the questions involved are as follows:

"That on or about the 12th day of December, 1909, plaintiff's intestate, Jeremiah F. Butler, was on the public crossing and traveled place, and place where the public and people generally have been accustomed to pass and re-pass for more than 20 years last past, at the intersection of Russell street and Grove street, two of the public streets of the city of Charleston, and was endeavoring to drive off from the track of said defendant railway corporation which crosses said public crossing and traveled place and place where the public and people generally have been accustomed to pass and re-pass for more than 20 years last past, at the intersection of said Russell and Grove streets, a horse which was the property of said Jeremiah F. Butler; and, while so engaged, his attention being occupied in his efforts to control the horse and prevent him from being run down and killed by any train of said defendant corporation, being in open and plain view of an approaching locomotive and tender from the north for a quarter of a mile or more, a locomotive with a tender attached run, managed, and operated by said defendant corporation, its servant and servants, without any signal or warning whatsoever, running at a rapid and reckless rate of speed through the public streets of the city of Charleston, and without having a man with a white flag in advance of said engine to display said flag as such train approached Grove street, one of the public streets of the city of Charleston, in violation of section No. 726 of the city ordinances of the city of Charleston, came upon the said plaintiff, who was not aware of its approach, on account of his being so engaged in endeavoring to get the horse off of said track, and so terribly injured him that he immediately died." The defendant denied the allegations of negligence and recklessness, admitted that it did not have a man with a flag in advance of the engine as it approached the place where plaintiff's intestate was killed, and interposed the defense of contributory negligence.

At the close of the plaintiff's testimony, the defendant's attorney made a motion for a nonsuit on the following grounds: "That even conceding that Russell street was a public street, and therefore required the ringing of the bell or blowing of the whistle, there is no evidence on the part of the plaintiff to go to the jury on account of the fact that his death was caused by his own negligence, by his want of slight care, and under those circumstances he was guilty of contributory negligence, even supposing that the statutory signals were not given. Supposing that to be true, even conceding that then he himself was guilty of gross negligence—that is to say, the absence of slight care—and therefore the proximate cause of his death was not the failure to ring the bell or blow the whistle, and, even if the train was or was not going at a high rate of speed, the proximate cause of his death was his own negligence in entering on the track, and that applies to all the causes of action stated in the complaint." The motion was granted, and the plaintiff appealed upon the ground that the testimony was susceptible of more than one inference, and that his honor, the presiding judge, therefore erred in ruling that the negligence of the plaintiff was the proximate cause of the injury.

For the purpose of this appeal, it must be regarded as conceded that the place where the injury occurred was a public street or crossing, which required the defendant to ring its bell or blow its whistle in the manner provided by statute, and that there was a failure to comply with this statutory requirement; also, that the train was running at a high rate of speed.

[1] Section 726 of the Revised Ordinances of the city of Charleston mentioned in the complaint is as follows: "It shall be unlawful for any railroad train to run at a speed exceeding four (4) miles an hour within the limits of the city of Charleston south of a line drawn from the Cooper river through Shepard street to the Ashley river, except in territory not intersected by streets, and it shall be the duty of every railroad company whose tracks run within the city limits (street railways not included) to have at the crossings of every lane, street or alley, except those not used by the public, across which its tracks may run, a man with a white flag during the daytime and a man with a red light during the nighttime in advance of the engine or train, whose duty shall be to display said flag or light whenever a train may be approaching such streets, lanes or alleys." There was testimony tending to show that the engine was running about 10 miles an hour. There was no positive testimony to the effect that the plaintiff's intestate knew that the engine was approaching. There was testimony tending to show that in attempting to drive his horse from the track plaintiff's intestate stumbled and fell. It cannot be successfully contended that the ordinance requiring that a man should display a flag in advance of the engine was merely intended to give notice of the approaching train. It was intended to subserve all useful purposes rendered necessary for the prevention of injuries at the place therein mentioned. It may reasonably be supposed that one of the objects was to clear the track of all obstacles; and the failure to comply with this requirement of the ordinance rendered said place more dangerous.

[2] A failure to comply with the requirements of the ordinance that a train should not exceed four miles an hour or the requirement that a man should display a flag in advance of the train was negligence per se. In the case of Dyson v. Railway, 83 S. C. 354, 65 S. E. 344, it was held that the violation of an ordinance regulating the rate of speed of trains within the municipal limits, resulting in injury to another, is negligence as matter of law. In the case of Lindler v. Railway, 84 S. C. 536, 66 S. E. 995, the court ruled that the violation of a municipal ordinance by leaving an engine standing on a street crossing is negligence per se. It was held in Craig v. Railway, 89 S. C. 161, 71 S. E. 983, that it is the duty of a railway company to keep a lookout for persons and pedestrians on its track at a highway crossing.

[3] It will thus be seen that there was testimony tending to show negligence on the part of the defendant; and, even considering that there was negligence, also, on the part of plaintiff's intestate, the question whether the negligence of the defendant or that of the plaintiff's intestate was the proximate cause of the injury should have been submitted to the jury.

Judgment reversed, and new trial granted.

WHALEY v. OSTENDORFF et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 29, 1911.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 705*)—REGULATION OF SPEED OF VEHICLES—NEGLIGENCE.

A violation of a city ordinance regulating the speed of automobiles on the public streets is negligence per se, but whether the negligence is actionable depends on whether it was the direct and proximate cause of the injury complained of.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1515-1517; Dec. Dig. § 705; * Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 460-469.]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Charleston County; R. C. Watts, Judge.

Action by George Thomas Whaley against Eugene F. Ostendorff and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and new trial granted.

Logan & Grace, for appellant. Mitchell & Smith, for respondents.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff through the negligence and reckless misconduct of the defendants in running an automobile, whereby the plaintiff was injured while he was upon the crossing of two of the public streets in the city of Charleston. The complaint alleges that at the time the plaintiff was struck by the said automobile it was being driven at a greater rate of speed than 10 miles an hour in violation of an ordinance of the city of Charleston prohibiting the running of automobiles at a greater rate of speed than 10 miles an hour, along the streets of Charleston, and four miles an hour where said streets cross each other. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiff appealed. The exceptions assign error on the part of his honor, the presiding judge, in charging the jury that, "to violate a city ordinance regulating the running of an automobile is in itself prima facie evidence of negligence. It is not conclusive. It is only prima facie." The charge was not in accord with the doctrine announced in Dyson v. Railway, 83 S. C. 354, 65 S. E. 344, Lindler v. Railway, 84 S. C. 536, 66 S. E. 995, and Butler v. Railway, 73 S. E. 185, in which the opinion has just been filed. When evidence of negligence is only prima facie, it is subject to rebuttal, but, when there is negligence per se, it is conclusive of that question. The fact that there is negligence per se does not, however, tend to show that such negligence is actionable. The question whether negligence is actionable depends upon the further question whether such negligence was the direct and proximate cause of the injury. The exceptions raising this question are sustained.

Under this view of the case, it will not be necessary to consider the other exceptions. Judgment reversed, and new trial granted.

HAND v. CATAWBA POWER CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 28, 1911.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 501*)—NONEXPERT OPINIONS—ADMISSIBILITY.

When the matter to which evidence relates cannot be reproduced or clearly described to the jury, a witness, though not an expert, may give his opinion, after stating the facts and circumstances upon which it is based.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2292-2305; Dec. Dig. § 501.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 474*)—NONEXPERT TESTIMONY—EFFECT OF DAM.

In an action for obstructing a stream to the injury of plaintiff's dam, his nonexpert witnesses were properly permitted to state their opinions that defendant's dam caused plaintiff's injury, where the witnesses had for many years known and observed plaintiff's water power, were familiar with the creek and the surrounding country, and had observed the results of freshets in the streams involved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2196-2219; Dec. Dig. § 474.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 131*)—ADMISSIBILITY—RELEVANCY.

In an action for maintaining a dam in a river in such manner as to obstruct the use of plaintiff's dam in a tributary creek above defendant's dam, defendant could not show similar conditions as to deposit of sand, etc., in another creek, emptying into the river below defendant's dam.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 131.*]

4. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 53*)—WATER POWER—RIGHTS OF UPPER PROPRIETORS.

While an upper riparian owner's rights are infringed by maintenance of a dam below in such manner as not to give him all the fall between his upper and his lower line as the water is accustomed to flow, the rights may be infringed without decreasing the fall, as where, by throwing backwater to the upper owner's line, sand collects in the stream above, so as to raise the bed uniformly from the upper owner's lower line to his upper line.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 45; Dec. Dig. § 53.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1066*)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for obstructing a stream by maintenance of a dam, error in instructing that if plaintiff was injured by water backed upon his water power and consequent deposit of sand in the stream, caused by defendant's dam, defendant was liable, there being no evidence that backwater reached plaintiff's lower line, was harmless, where it appeared that plaintiff's damage was caused by the dam, and there was no claim that backwater reached plaintiff's dam; plaintiff relying on a claim that defendant caused sand to be deposited in the bed of the creek.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4220; Dec. Dig. § 1066.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of York County; Ernest Moore, Special Judge.

Action by A. S. Hand against the Catawba Power Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Osborne, Lucas & Cocke, Witherspoon & Spencers and J. E. McDonald, for appellant. Thos. F. McDow and J. H. Manon, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. Plaintiff owns a mill and water power on Allison's creek, a tributary of Catawba river, which he purchased in September, 1906. In February, 1904, defendant completed a dam across the river about 3 miles below the north of the creek. Plaintiff's mill is about 4 miles up the creek from the river. Defendant's dam backs water up the river and up the creek to about 2½ miles below plaintiff's mill. Before defendant's dam was built, plaintiff's water power was good, and little or no trouble was experienced by the owner on account of the deposition of sand in the creek. Occasionally a freshet would deposit sand in the creek below the mill, but not enough to interfere seriously with its operation, and usually the next freshet would take it away. There was testimony that after the closing of defendant's dam, and before plaintiff acquired title to the property, the water power had been affected at times, though not seriously, by the deposition of sand in the creek, which was supposed to have been caused by the defendant's dam. After plaintiff bought the property, the deposition of sand in the creek increased to such an extent that, in December, 1907, he was compelled to abandon his mill and water power, same having been, for all practical purposes, totally destroyed. This action was brought to recover damages for its destruction; plaintiff alleging that defendant's dam obstructed the natural flow of sand and water in the creek, caused the sand to be deposited therein, and the bed of the creek to be raised thereby, till his water power was destroyed. Defendant denied that its dam was the cause of the injury complained of. According to the testimony of the defendant's engineers, the fall in the creek from plaintiff's mill to the backwater from defendant's dam is about 28½ feet, and they say that it is a physical impossibility for defendant's dam to have caused plaintiff's injury. Notwithstanding, there was testimony which reasonably warranted a contrary opinion, and the jury took the contrary view, and found a verdict for the plaintiff, upon which judgment was duly entered.

[1, 2] The court allowed plaintiff's witnesses, who were not experts, but who had for many years known and observed plaintiff's water power, and were familiar with the creek and the surrounding country, and had observed the results of freshets in the creek and river, to express their opinions that defendant's dam caused plaintiff's injury. Defendant contends that this ruling was erroneous. The rule is well settled that, when the matter or thing to which the evidence relates cannot be reproduced or clearly described to the jury, the witness, though not an expert, may give his opinion, after stating the facts and circumstances upon which it is based. Seibels v. Blackwell, 1 McMul. 56; Jones v. Fuller, 19 S. C. 70, 45 Am. Rep. 761; Chemical Co. v. Kirven, 57 S. C. 448, 35 S. E. 745. The principal difficulty lies in the proper application of the rule; that is, in deciding when the matter or thing to which the testimony refers can, and when it cannot, be adequately portrayed to the jury. Necessarily some discretion must be allowed the trial judge in determining the question, and his ruling thereupon should not be disturbed, unless it is clearly erroneous and prejudicial. In this case, the ruling was correct; for it would have been impossible for the witnesses to reproduce before the jury in detail the almost innumerable facts and circumstances which had occurred within their experience and observation, running through many years, and upon which their opinions were based. The case therefore falls within the rule above stated.

[3] The next assignment of error is in excluding evidence of similar conditions in another creek, which empties into the river below defendant's dam. This ruling is sustained by the case of Lynn v. Thomson, 17 S. C. 124.

[4] The jury were charged that "a riparian owner's water-power rights, as against an owner above, mediate or immediate, is to so construct his dam as to give the latter all the fall between his upper and his lower line as the water is accustomed to flow." Defendant contends that, inasmuch as it appeared by undisputed evidence that the fall between plaintiff's upper and lower lines had not been decreased, the verdict was contrary to the charge, and should therefore have been set aside. Defendant's primary error is in assuming that the evidence that plaintiff's fall had not been decreased was undisputed. On the contrary, there was evidence from which it could have been reasonably concluded that his fall had been decreased. Several witnesses testified that the water did not run as swiftly through his premises as it had formerly, and it was evident that it did not carry off the sand, as it had formerly done. Moreover, while the proposition charged is sound as far as it goes, it falls short of being a complete statement of the law; for it is conceivable that a lower riparian owner may cause damage to his neighbor above without decreasing his fall. For instance, suppose he builds his dam just high enough to throw his backwater to his neighbor's line. According to well-known natural laws, this backwater might cause the sand to be deposited in the stream above, so as to raise the bed of it uniformly from his neighbor's lower line to his upper line. In that event, there would be no decrease in his neighbor's fall, yet damage might be done by the raising of the bed of the stream.

[5] There was no evidence that the backwater from defendant's dam ever came nearer to plaintiff's lower line than two miles. Nevertheless, the court charged the jury that, if plaintiff was injured by water backed to and upon his water power, and the consequent deposition of sand in the creek, caused by defendant's dam, defendant would be liable. Error is assigned in this instruction, in that the court assumed and allowed the jury to assume, contrary to the fact, that water was backed upon plaintiff's property. The court did not assume the existence of the fact involved in the instruction, but stated the proposition hypothetically; and, while there was no evidence upon which any such finding could have been predicated, still it clearly appears from the record that the instruction was a mere inadvertence, from which defendant could not have suffered prejudice. There was no contention that backwater from defendant's dam ever reached plaintiff's lower line, but plaintiff's contention was that it did cause the sand to be deposited in the creek, and the bed thereof to be raised, so that his water power was destroyed; and if the backwater from defendant's dam was the proximate cause of that effect it is immaterial that it did not extend up to plaintiff's lower line.

These considerations dispose of all exceptions.

Judgment affirmed.

H. H. Harris and H. C. Miller, for appellant. Townes & Martin, for respondent, H. K. Townes.

WOODS, J. The plaintiff, G. A. Buist, obtained by default a judgment of foreclosure on certain mortgages executed by Newton Sullivan. The mortgaged land was sold under the judgment in November, 1910, and purchased by H. K. Townes, who afterwards conveyed to R. D. Dawkins. In February, 1910, the defendant Newton Sullivan, by E. Inman as guardian ad litem, filed his petition in the foreclosure case, alleging that in the year 1900 Newton Sullivan was adjudged insane by the probate court of Greenville county, and committed to the lunatic asylum, and has ever since continued insane, though he was released from the asylum on probation after two years' confinement; that he was mentally incapable of executing the mortgages referred to in the complaint for foreclosure; that the summons and complaint were served on him, but no guardian ad litem was appointed to represent him in the suit for foreclosure. Under these allegations, an injunction was asked restraining Townes and Dawkins from interfering with Newton Sullivan's possession of the land. Judge Gage made a temporary restraining order in which he required Townes and Dawkins to show why the injunction should not be granted. After hearing the return, Judge Gage refused to grant the injunction, revoked the restraining order, and ordered the sheriff to put Townes in possession as the purchaser at the foreclosure sale.

There can be no doubt of the correctness of the order. The only evidence of insanity was the commitment of the petitioner to the asylum, and the statement of his wife's opinion unsupported by a single fact, expressed in her petition for the appointment of a committee for him. On the other side, there were before Judge Gage the fact that Sullivan had been released from the asylum, and the affidavit of a number of apparently disinterested persons that he conducted his business as a sane man, and had numerous transactions covering the period in which the mortgages were executed by Sullivan and the summons and complaint served upon him. The overwhelming weight of the evidence being to the effect that there was no disability of insanity affecting either the execution of the mortgages or the service of the summons and complaint, the injunction was properly refused.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

JONES, C. J. This was an action for building material sold and delivered by plaintiffs to defendant. An order was made by consent referring issues of law and fact to the master, who found in favor of plaintiffs. Exceptions were taken to the master's report. Judge Gage confirmed the findings of the master, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs in the sum of $223.90.

[1] There being some testimony tending to establish the conclusions of fact by the circuit court, under the well-settled rule in actions at law, we accept such conclusions as final. From these findings it appears that defendant ratified the acts of J. A. Capell as agent in purchasing the materials from plaintiffs, and having them charged in defendant's name, and that defendant promised to pay for same.

[2] The only question of law presented to the circuit court was whether the master erred in allowing testimony to show a subsequent promise by defendant to pay the debts of Capell, as there was no allegation in the complaint that plaintiffs relied on such agreement. Under a complaint for goods sold and delivered by plaintiffs to defendant, it was competent to show that defendant bought the goods through his agent whose acts he ratified, and for whose purchases he promised to pay. The appellant's contention that the debt sued on was the debt of Capell as an independent contractor is opposed to the facts as found by the master and circuit court.

The judgment of the circuit is affirmed.

1. JUDGMENT (§ 106*)—DEFAULT—ANSWER—VERIFICATION—OMISSION.

Code Civ. Geo. F. Von Kolnitz and Wm. Henry Parker, for appellant. Nathan B. Barnwell, for respondent.

JONES, C. J. On September 13, 1910, plaintiff commenced this action against defendant on a verified complaint, alleging two causes of action: First, that on June 21, 1910, plaintiff, being the owner of 15 shares of the stock of the United Wireless Telegraph Company, intrusted and delivered the same to the defendant, as broker, for sale at a price to net plaintiff $37.50 per share, and that defendant sold and disposed of said stock, and fraudulently misapplied and appropriated to his own use the proceeds of sale, amounting to $562.50, and refuses on demand to account for and pay over said proceeds. The second cause of action alleges that plaintiff deposited said stock with defendant, under an agreement that plaintiff, as broker, would either sell said stock at a price to net plaintiff $37.50 per share, and immediately pay over the proceeds, or would return the stock on demand; that defendant failed to sell and account for the stock, and, although admitting that the stock was under his control, failed to return the same on demand, and wrongfully detained and has converted the same to his own use, to plaintiff's damage, $562.50. At the time of the service of the summons and complaint, bail and arrest proceedings were instituted, and thereunder defendant was arrested and released on bail bond in the sum of $650, with Thos. L. Molly, James G. Guardineer, and Wm. Minnie as sureties.

On October 3, 1910, the last day for answering, defendant's attorney, Wm. Henry Parker, Esq., delivered to plaintiff's attorney, N. B. Barnwell, Esq., an answer, which was immediately returned, because the same was not verified. There was no statement in or accompanying this answer, explaining the absence of verification. On same day, on the application of the sureties on the bail bond, Judge Watts issued a rule to show cause why the time for answering should not be extended. In the affidavit of Wm. Henry Parker, Esq., dated October 4, 1910, used on the hearing of return to the rule, he stated that the verification to the answer delivered to the plaintiff's attorney was omitted, because an admission of the truth of the allegations embraced in the complaint would subject defendant to a prosecution for felony, and for the further reason that the absence of the defendant made it impossible to secure his verification, and that defendant would be privileged from testifying as to the truth of certain matters embraced in the complaint. Mr. Parker in his affidavit claimed the right to await the action of the court on the application for extension of time to answer before electing to stand on the answer served on October 3d, or to treat such answer as a nullity; and therefore he did not join formally in the request for extension, but he joined in the statement of petitioners that the cause of justice would be subserved by granting the extension. Judge Watts, by order dated October 5, 1910, granted defendant an extension of 25 days from the date of the order "within which to answer, demur, or take such action as he may be advised is proper in reference to the summons and complaint filed, or could have been taken previous to the granting of this order."

On October 29th, before the expiration of the extended time, defendant's attorney served on plaintiff's attorney an answer in terms precisely like the answer of October 3d, except that in the answer of October 3d the allegation of paragraph 1 of the complaint as to each cause of action was admitted "on information and belief"; whereas, in the answer of October 29th, this allegation was admitted without qualification.

The effect of both answers was to deny the allegations charging fraudulent misapplication and appropriation of the proceeds of the stock, or wrongful detention and conversion of same, with a further defense that defendant has tendered to the plaintiff and transferred in his name 15 shares of the stock of the United Wireless Company," made in accordance with the agreement between plaintiff and defendant," which tender defendant is now ready to renew and perform.

This answer contained a verification by plaintiff, omitting formal parts, in these words: "That the foregoing answer is true of his own knowledge, except as to those things therein stated to be on information and belief, and as to those that he believes them to be true. There was nothing in the answer stated to be on information and belief.

Plaintiff's attorney returned this answer, on the ground that it was not properly verified; and it appears that defendant's attorney also regarded the verification defective, as he obtained from Judge Watts an order, dated October 31, 1910, reciting that the verification was defective through clerical error or omission, and that application was made for an extension of 10 days for procuring the verification in a different form, and providing "that time for answering be further extended 10 days from date."

Then, on November 10, 1910, within the time as last extended, defendant's attorney served an answer in the precise terms of the answer of October 29th, without any verification by defendant, but containing the affidavit of Wm. Henry Parker, as attorney for defendant, stating that the verification was omitted under section 178 of the Code, because an admission of the allegations of the complaint might subject defendant to prosecution for felony, and because defendant would be privileged from testifying as a witness to the truth of the matter denied in the answer. This was done after an effort to secure a verification by the defendant, who was out of the state and could not be reached in time. Plaintiff's attorney immediately returned this answer as not served within time, as not in compliance with the order of October 31st, and as not being verified as required.

Thereafter plaintiff's attorney made a motion to strike out the paper served as an answer on November 10, 1910, and to declare defendant in default. Judge Watts, by his order of November 17, 1910, struck out the answer, and held defendant in default, in so far as time was extended under the order of October 31st, but, after referring to the answer served on October 3d and returned to defendant's attorney as unverified, Judge Watts' last-named order provided as follows: "This order is made without prejudice to any right that the defendant may now have to rely on this paper as a sufficient answer under section 178 of the Code of Civil Procedure." Thereafter defendant's attorney moved, before Judge Ernest Gary presiding, to permit the answer of October 3d to be considered as a valid answer. Judge Gary, by his order of April 25, 1911, held as follows: "The defendant had an opportunity to hold to the position that an unverified answer was legal in this case, but, instead of so doing, his counsel accepted the benefit of Judge Watts' order for extending time for answering, and attempted to serve a verified answer. Moreover, opportunity was again afforded defendant to test the legality of his position when Judge Watts held him in default as to the answer served on November 10, 1910. He might have appealed from this decision. No attempt, however, has been made to stand on this position until now. It seems to me that the position of the defendant is simply this: By attempting to serve subsequent answers under the orders of Judge Watts, he abandoned his original answer. The subsequent answers have been held to be irregular, so the defendant is now in default. And it is so ordered."

After this judgment by default was rendered and entered against defendant for the sum claimed, and defendant has appealed from the judgment and from the said order of Judge Gary.

[1] Upon the foregoing facts and the exceptions of appellant, we think it was error to hold the defendant in default. Section 178 of the Code, in reference to the verification of pleadings, provides: "• • • The verification may be omitted when an admission of the truth of the allegation might subject the party to prosecution for felony.

* * * That the verification of any pleading in any court of record in this state may be omitted in all cases where a party called upon to verify would be privileged from testifying as a witness to the truth of any matter denied by such pleading." Under this section, defendant had the right to omit verification of his answer; hence the answer served on October 3d was in time, and the absence of verification was accounted for by the affidavit of his attorney. While the Code does not specifically require that the paper containing the answer should state why it was not verified, it is doubtless good practice so to do; but the failure to make such explanation at the time of the service of the answer ought not to annul the answer, especially if such explanation is made the next day, as in this case.

[2] Defendant should not be held to have waived his right to stand upon his answer of October 3d, because the order of Judge Watts, on November 17th, was without prejudice to any right of defendant to rely on that answer. Viewing the matter broadly, the defendant's counsel has not by his conduct manifested the slightest intention not to serve proper answer in time, but, on the contrary, answers have been served three times within the time allowed by law or the orders of the court, and each answer was either properly verified, or the absence of verification promptly explained.

[3] The verification of the answer of October 29th was not defective, as all the parties seemed to think. In the cases Hecht & Co. v. Friesleben, 28 S. C. 181, 5 S. E. 475, Burmester v. Mosely, 33 S. C. 254, 11 S. E. 786, and Addison v. Sujette, 50 S. C. 200, 27 S. E. 631, the principle enforced was that it must appear with certainty from the pleading and verification which allegations are upon information and belief, and which upon knowledge. Such certainty appears in the answer and verification of October 29th; for nothing in the answer was stated to be on information and belief, and the verification was upon the affiant's own knowledge, except as to matters stated to be on information and belief, of which there were none in the answer. We, however, do not rely on the fact that a properly verified answer was duly served in this case, as the appeal does not strictly bring that point in review. The circumstance, nevertheless, shows how hard defendant's attorney has striven to serve an answer in time and to conform to the view of plaintiff's attorney as to the law concerning verification of pleadings. Substantial justice requires that defendant should be allowed his day in court, with opportunity to make defense. Whether the defenses sought to be interposed are meritorious is not now involved, and need not be considered.

The judgment of the circuit court is reversed.

OVERMAN v. LANIER et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 23, 1911.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 496*)—COMMISSIONS—AMOUNT.

While 5 per cent. is the maximum allowed an administrator upon collections and disbursements, the compensation should be proportionate to the services, and rests in the discretion of the trial court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 2107-2116; Dec. Dig. § 496.*]

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 501*)—COMMISSIONS—ALLOWANCE BY CLERK.

The ex parte allowance by the clerk of commissions to an administrator is not conclusive.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 2072, 2142-2148; Dec. Dig. § 501.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1022*)—REVIEW—FINDINGS OF FACT.

Findings of fact by a referee, approved by the trial court, are conclusive on appeal, when supported by evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4015-4018; Dec. Dig. § 1022.*]

4. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 506*)—ACCOUNTING—BURDEN OF PROOF—STATUTE.

While Revisal 1905, § 1891, casts the burden of proof upon a creditor, seeking to recover upon a contract which the debtor has pleaded was a gambling transaction, distributees, seeking to charge an administrator for payments made by him upon notes given by his intestate in alleged gambling transactions, have the burden of proving the nature of the transaction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 2169-2177; Dec. Dig. § 506.*]

5. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 109*)—MANAGEMENT—DISBURSEMENTS—NEGLECT OF ADMINISTRATOR.

Where an administrator in good faith paid insurance premiums to keep up a policy held as collateral to a note due the estate from insured, who was old and infirm, it does not show a negligent expenditure, even though it resulted in loss.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 435-447; Dec. Dig. § 109.*]

6. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 109*)—ACCOUNTING AND SETTLEMENT—COMMISSIONS—CLERK HIRE.

Ordinarily administrators should not be allowed for clerk hire and the expenses of bookkeepers, for this is part of the ordinary services for which they receive commissions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 435-447; Dec. Dig. § 109.*]

7. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 511*)—ACCOUNTING—COUNSEL FEES.

Where the heirs and distributees contested the commissions and credits claimed by the administrator, the administrator was not entitled to counsel fees in that litigation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 2257-2286; Dec. Dig. § 511.*]

8. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 511*)—PERSONS ENTITLED TO COSTS—DIVISION OF COSTS.

Where the heirs and distributees of an estate contested an administrator's right to commissions and credits, and were successful only in part, costs should be apportioned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 2257-2286; Dec. Dig. § 511.*]

9. COSTS (§ 256*)—APPEAL—UNNECESSARY RECORDS.

In an action where both parties appealed, and the defendant at the time of making up the case objected to the inclusion of unnecessary parts of the record, the costs of the same, under rule of court 22 (88 S. E. vii), will be charged against the plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. §§ 968-971; Dec. Dig. § 256.*]

10. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 560*)—ABSTRACTS—EVIDENCE.

Testimony reported by the stenographer should be sent up on appeal in narrative form, instead of in questions and answers.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2490-2493; Dec. Dig. § 560.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Rowan County; Lyon, Judge.

Final accounting by L. S. Overman as administrator of J. B. Lanier, in which Mattie Lanier and others filed objections. From the judgment, both parties appeal. Affirmed on the administrator's appeal, and reversed and remanded upon that of the objectors.

See, also, 72 S. E. 575.

T. F. Klutz, E. C. Gregory, T. J. Jerome, E. J. Justice, L. H. Clement, and C. W. Tillett, for plaintiff. Walser & Walser, G. W. Garland, Burwell & Cansler, and Manly, Hendren & Womble, for defendants.

CLARK, C. J. J. B. Lanier of Salisbury died intestate in 1894, and the plaintiff was appointed administrator. In September, 1904, the plaintiff filed his petition for a final account and settlement, and the heirs at law and distributees filed an answer to the petition. The matter was referred to a referee, to whose report both parties filed exceptions. The judge overruled all exceptions, to which action both sides filed exceptions, and appealed.

Plaintiff's Appeal.

The plaintiff abandons all exceptions in his appeal except:

(1) The disallowance of $250 attorney's fees to Watson & Buxton. The referee found as a matter of fact that it was unnecessary for the plaintiff to consult them in behalf of the estate, and this finding of fact has been approved by the judge. The ruling of law thereon that this fee should not be allowed to the administrator must be approved.

[1, 2] 2. The referee reports that the clerk's allowance of commissions to the administrator of 5 per cent. amounted approximately to $10,000; that the expenditures for clerical services, attorney's fees, and expenses amount to over $8,000, making a total of about $18,000, or over 16 per cent. of the total receipts, the total collections being about $110,000; that the largest part of the estate was settled in two years, but the entire administration lasted about nine years. The referee going over the record of the administration in full found that 4 per cent. upon the receipts and 2½ per cent. upon the disbursements would be a fair compensation to the administrator for his services. Five per cent. is the limit allowed by law, but within that limit the compensation should be proportioned according to the services rendered and in consideration of all the facts and circumstances. The ex parte allowance of commissions by the clerk is not conclusive. Walton v. Avery, 22 N. C. 405. In Green v. Barbee, 84 N. C. 72, the court said: "The compensation allowed the personal representative for his services within the limit of 5 per cent. on both sides rests in the sound discretion of the tribunal called to pass upon the question." The judge below in reviewing the entire dealings and acts touching the administration of the estate concurred in the allowance made by the referee, and we see no reason to disturb it.

(3) The other exception is that the referee held that the administrator should not be allowed more than $1,000 for his attorney's fees in representing him in this present matter. The defendants except to the allowance of any attorney's fees at all to the administrator for defending himself in this action, and the whole matter will be considered on the defendants' appeal.

In the plaintiff's appeal the judgment should be affirmed.

Defendants' Appeal.

[3] Passing by the exceptions to the findings of fact, as to all which there was evidence and the rulings upon which by the judge are conclusive upon us, the first exception to be considered is to the allowance of $30,000 paid upon the Rountree notes which the defendants contended were given for losses on "futures" in the New York market, and which was therefore a gambling debt and invalid under Rev. 1905, § 1691. The referee found as a fact that "the record does not disclose sufficient evidence either to show affirmatively that this was a gambling contract or that it was a legitimate contract made with the intention that the cotton should be delivered, and the referee finds that the administrator had no such knowledge of the nature of the transaction which resulted in the Rountree debts, nor could have procured the same upon reasonable inquiry, as would have enabled him successfully to resist suits brought thereon on the ground that they were incurred under gambling contracts."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[4] We cannot agree with the defendants that, because in their answer in this proceeding they alleged that these were gambling debts, this cast the burden of proof upon the plaintiff under Revisal, § 1691. That provision applies where a party sues upon the contract, and the debtor denies it, and sets up the defense. But here the defendants are alleging that the payment by the plaintiff of his intestate's notes, valid on their face, is invalid because the contract was founded upon illegal consideration, and the burden was upon them to prove it. The matter has been very fully and ably argued by counsel on both sides. But, in view of the findings of fact by the referee that it is not shown that this debt was for a gambling contract and the approval of that finding by the court, we cannot sustain the exception.

[5] Nor can we sustain the exception that the referee paid out insurance premiums to keep up a policy which was held as collateral to a note due by Payne, who was a man in advanced years, and in somewhat feeble health. It is true that this turned out a loss to the estate. But it is found that the administrator acted in good faith, and it cannot be held that a reasonably prudent man would have acted differently under the circumstances. It has been forcibly said by some one that "our hindights are better than our foresights." Nor do the facts in evidence justify the contention of the defendants that the administrator should forfeit all commissions. The referee has not found evidence of negligence and unlawful mismanagement to justify it. The findings of fact in regard to the management and sale of the distillery interest and liquor belonging to the estate preclude our sustaining the exceptions of law in regard to the administrator's action in that respect.

[6] While ordinarily administrators should not be allowed for clerk hire and the expenses of a bookkeeper, this being usually a part of the ordinary services for which he receives a commission, in this case the evidence discloses that it was necessary to employ such clerical assistance, and the allowance thereof was doubtless considered by the court below in fixing the commissions below the limit allowed by law.

The defendants also except because at the time of the death of Lanier there was in the bank the sum of nearly $5,000, and the defendants insist that commissions should not be allowed on this item, or at least not as high as 4 per cent. But doubtless this item was considered with others in fixing the amount of the commissions allowed the administrator. The administrator was allowed attorney's fees in the course of the administration of the estate; i. e. (prior to the present suit), to the amount of $2,651.39, of which approximately $1,000 was paid to his resident counsel. The defendants except to this allowance, especially the latter, because the plaintiff was himself an excellent lawyer, which was doubtless one cause of his selection as administrator. While allowances for counsel fees should be carefully scrutinized, the court below and the referee have found that these amounts were not excessive, and, in reviewing the history of the management of this estate and the amount of litigation, we cannot overrule the conclusion of the judge below.

[7] The defendants further except because the plaintiff has been allowed $1,000 counsel fees in this litigation. His final report disclosed that after handling the estate at a cost of $18,000 out of which $10,000 went to him as commissions, $2,631 to lawyers for fees in regard to the litigation of the estate, and between $5,000 and $6,000 for clerk hire and incidental expenses, the plaintiff held in his hands for the heirs and distributees only $685.34 out of an estate, whose total assets amounted to $110,000. To this report the defendants excepted, and by the judgment of the court below the balance due them has been increased to $5,346.33. This litigation has been not in the interest of the estate nor a mere formal proceeding to close it up, but in truth and in fact it has been a contest between the heirs at law on the one side and the administrator whom they sought to make individually liable on the other. The result shows that, while the administrator has not been fixed with large sums which the defendants allege he should be made liable for, the contest has been to protect himself individually from such liability, and the services of the attorneys were for his personal benefit in that regard. Besides, it has been adjudged that he is indebted to the estate nearly $5,000 more than he returned in his report as due the heirs at law and the distributees. The counsel fees for opposing the recovery of such judgment should be charged against the administrator personally as is the judgment itself.

In Stonestreet v. Frost, 123 N. C. 644, 31 S. E. 838, it is said: "We think that the administrator should not have been allowed the $100 fee which he paid the attorney out of the assets of the estate, for the reason that the service was rendered by the attorney for the attempted prevention of the recovery against the administrator by the distributees of that which belonged to them." And in Allen v. Royster, 107 N. C. 283, 12 S. E. 135, it is also said: "An administrator should not be allowed credit for fees paid counsel in defense of an action to compel him to a final account with the next of kin." The true rule that the fiduciary "is entitled to be credited for a reasonable sum paid to an accountant or attorney for stating the account. We think, too, if there is any difficulty in doing it, he is entitled to the advice of counsel and to credit for any reasonable fee paid for that purpose. But for any payment beyond this it must be an exceptional case to entitle him to credit." Whitford v. Foy, 85 N. C. 276.

[8] For the above reasons, we also think that the cost of this litigation below should be divided between the parties. The final result is recovery by the defendants of about $6,000 in excess of the amount which the administrator admitted to be due them in his final account. But for the fact that they sought to charge him with further large sums in which they are not successful, the entire cost of the litigation should have fallen upon the plaintiff. Notwithstanding its form, this is really an action by the defendants to charge the plaintiff individually with sums which he had received for the estate, and in which action the defendants have recovered judgment against him. The account should also be reformed to charge the administrator with interest from the date of filing the report on so much of the amount which is now adjudged to have been due by him at that date, on which interest is not calculated in the judgment below.

[9, 10] The defendants in accordance with rule 22 (86 S. E. vii) of this court objected at the time of making up the case to the sending up of the stenographer's notes in form of question and answer, instead of in narrative form, as we have often stated should be done. Cressler v. Asheville, 138 N. C. 482, 51 S. E. 53. These notes, however, were sent up on the demand of the plaintiff, together with other unnecessary parts of the record. The defendants contend that such unnecessary additions amount to 175 printed pages. Upon a careful estimate we think that at least 125 printed pages of the matter sent up over the objection of the defendants, and upon the demand of the plaintiff, were unnecessary, and the cost of copying and printing the same should be taxed against the plaintiff. Land Co. v. Jennett, 128 N. C. 4, 37 S. E. 954. This is in addition to the allowance of 60 pages to be taxed in favor of the defendant under rule 22.

In defendants' appeal there is error.

COMMISSIONERS OF CUMBERLAND COUNTY v. COMMISSIONERS OF HARNETT COUNTY.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 20, 1911.)

1. COUNTIES (§ 24*)—LEGISLATIVE CONTROL OF.

Counties as a rule are mere agencies of the state, constituted for the convenience of local administration in certain portions of the state's territory, and in the exercise of ordinary governmental functions they are subject to almost unlimited legislative control, except when restricted by constitutional provision.

2. STATUTES (§ 21*)—ENACTMENT—DIVISIONS OF COUNTY—ADDITION OF—PASSAGE.

Pub. Loc. Laws 1911, c. 591, purporting to amend Pub. Laws 1854-55, c. 8, creating Harnett county, by adding thereto a strip of territory detached from Cumberland county, was intended merely to annex additional territory to Harnett county without reference to the power of contracting debts or the levy and collection of taxes to pay the same, and was therefore not invalid, because not passed in the manner required by Const. art. 2, § 14, for the passage of laws relating to incurring state and municipal indebtedness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 18-27; Dec. Dig. § 21.*]

3. COUNTIES (§ 16*)—CHANGE OF BOUNDARIES—APPORTIONMENT OF INDEBTEDNESS.

When a portion of a county is detached and added to another, the burdens of existing indebtedness and the apportionment thereof, in the absence of constitutional provision, and in so far as the inhabitants are concerned, are matters entirely of legislative discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 12-15; Dec. Dig. § 16.*]

4. COUNTIES (§ 16*)—CHANGE OF BOUNDARIES—APPORTIONMENT OF INDEBTEDNESS.

Pub. Loc. Laws 1911, c. 591, amending Pub. Laws 1854-55, c. 8, by detaching certain territory from Cumberland county and adding it to Harnett county, provides (section 6) that the commissioners of the two counties shall have full power to properly adjust the indebtedness of Cumberland county, outstanding on May 1, 1911, which is properly chargeable to such detached portion, and to make an equitable tax levy thereof. Held that, so far as such act provided for the adjustment of the Cumberland county floating debt, it not only conferred a power, but imposed a duty, that the commissioners were bound to exercise.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 12-15; Dec. Dig. § 16.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Cumberland County; Whedbee, Judge.

Action by the Commissioners of Cumberland County against the Commissioners of Harnett County to enjoin the latter from collecting taxes or exercising governmental authority over certain territory. From a decree in favor of defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

On the hearing it was properly made to appear:

"(1) That the General Assembly of North Carolina, at its regular session of 1911, passed and ratified an act, the same being chapter 591 of the Public Local Laws of 1911, which act, as well as the same it purports to amend, to wit, chapter 8 of the Public Laws of 1854-55, is hereby referred to and made a part of these facts agreed.

"(2) That the territory purporting to be added to the county of Harnett by said act is approximately 12 miles in length and 4 miles in width at its widest point, embracing about 6 square miles of territory, containing about $280 taxable property and 108 taxable polls and 120 voters.

"(3) That said act of 1911 was not read on three separate days in either branch of the General Assembly, nor was there any roll call upon the passage of the same at any reading, nor were the ayes and noes recorded on the journals of either the House or the Senate; that the bill was originally introduced in the Senate; said bill being identical with said act, except that it did not contain the latter part of section 6 of said act, beginning with the word "provided," and including the remainder of said section. This proviso in said section was incorporated as a House amendment on its third reading in the House, and the bill was sent back to the Senate, and this amendment was concurred in by the Senate on March 4th, and was ratified on March 6th; neither the bill nor the amendment being passed as a roll bill.

"(4) That in the passage of the bill which forms the act establishing the county of Harnett, viz., chapter 8 of the Public Laws of 1854-55, said bill was not read on three separate days in either branch of the General Assembly, nor were the ayes and noes called or recorded in the journals."

That the commissioners of Cumberland had levied taxes on the detached portion of territory for general and specific purposes for the year 1911, and had placed the tax lists in the hands of the sheriff of Cumberland, who was proceeding to collect same or threatening to do so, and the commissioners of Harnett county had done the like. "That there had been no agreement between the boards of commissioners of the respective counties, either made or attempted, looking to the assumption on the part of Harnett county or said disputed territory of its proportional part of the bonded or floating indebtedness of Cumberland county, as provided in section 6 of said act; such agreement having been deferred, pending a judicial determination of this controversy. * * * That each of the respective boards of commissioners, through the officers of their respective counties, assert and are attempting to maintain general jurisdiction of the territory in question for all governmental purposes."

Upon these the controlling facts, relevant to the inquiry, it was contended for the commissioners of Cumberland that the act of 1911 is invalid and unconstitutional, and that the territory in question has always been and is now a part of Cumberland county; that the municipal authorities of Harnett county should be restrained and enjoined from collecting taxes or exercising any governmental authority over said territory. Defendants contend that the act is valid, and the commissioners of Cumberland be restrained. The court entered judgment, (1) declaring the act constitutional and valid, (2) restraining commissioners of Cumberland from collecting taxes in said territory, and (3) directing commissioners of the two counties to ascertain the proportionate part of the bonded indebtedness, etc., of Cumberland county properly chargeable to Harnett, etc.

To this judgment commissioners of Cumberland excepted and appealed.

Q. K. Nimocks, Newton, Herring & Oates, and V. C. Bullard, for appellants. J. C. Clifford, for appellees.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] Numerous and repeated decisions of the court are in affirmance and illustration of the principle that: "Counties and townships are, as a rule, simply agencies of the state, constituted for the convenience of local administration in certain portions of the state's territory, and in the exercise of ordinary governmental functions they are subject to almost unlimited legislative control, except when restricted by constitutional provision." Board of Trustees v. Webb, 155 N. C. 379, 71 S. E. 520; Lutterloh v. Fayetteville, 149 N. C. 65, 62 S. E. 758; Jones v. Commissioners of Stokes, 143 N. C. 59, 55 S. E. 427; State v. Commissioners, 122 N. C. 812, 30 S. E. 352; McCormac v. Commissioners, 90 N. C. 441; Mills v. Williams, 33 N. C. 558. Speaking to this question in Stokes Case, supra, the Chief Justice said: "The defendant suggests, however, that it infringes upon the provisions of the Constitution 'establishing and requiring them to be maintained in their integrity.' But we do not find any such provisions. The Constitution recognizes the existence of counties, townships, cities, and towns as governmental agencies (White v. Commissioners, 90 N. C. 437 [47 Am. Rep. 534]), but they are all legislative creations, and subject to be changed (Dare v. Currituck, 95 N. C. 189; Harriss v. Wright, 121 N. C., p. 172 [28 S. E. 269]), abolished (Mills v. Williams, 33 N. C. 558) or divided (McCormac v. Commissioners, 90 N. C. 441) at the will of the General Assembly." The power of the Legislature then being ample, it is clear from a perusal of the statute that the territory in question has been detached from Cumberland and made a part of the county of Harnett, and except as to taxes already levied and civil and criminal cases already commenced, these limitations being expressly made by the act itself, the county of Cumberland and its officers may not further exercise direct authority in said territory.

[2] It is urged that the act in question is invalid, because the same was not passed as required by article 2, § 14, of the Constitution—that in reference to incurring state and municipal indebtedness. Connor & Cheshire, Constitution, pp. 117, 118. But this is not a correct apprehension of the terms and purpose of the act. The power to exercise ordinary governmental functions, collecting taxes or other, was given to the county of Harnett in the act creating the county, in 1855, and the present statute simply annexed additional territory to the county, thereby bringing the same within the power. As to contracting debts and the levy and collection of taxes to pay the same, these questions will be referred to the statutes applicable and to the revenue acts, general or special, controlling in such matters.

[3] When, as in this case, a portion of territory is detached, etc., the burdens of existing indebtedness and the apportionment thereof, in the absence of constitutional provision, and in so far as the inhabitants are concerned, are referred entirely to the legislative discretion. Lutterloh v. Fayetteville, supra; Commissioners of Dare v. Commissioners of Currituck, 95 N. C. 189; Currituck v. Commissioners of Dare, 79 N. C. 565.

[4] Under the statute we are now considering, the Legislature intends that the existing indebtedness shall be apportioned, and in the proviso to section 6 has directed that the commissioners of the two counties "shall have full power and authority to properly adjust the share of the bonded and floating debt of Cumberland county, outstanding on the 1st day of May, 1911, which is properly chargeable to the detached portion of Cumberland county. And to make an equitable levy of taxes thereon to cover the same and to provide for the collection and payment thereof." This is a case where the conferring of power imposes the duty for its exercise. Jones v. Commissioners of Madison, 137 N. C. 580, 50 S. E. 291. And the final portion of his honor's judgment comes well within the purview of the statute and the precedents applicable to the facts presented. Commissioners v. Commissioners, 107 N. C. 291, 12 S. E. 89.

There is no error, and the judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

Affirmed.

EPPLEY v. BRYSON CITY.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 20, 1911.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 9*)—STATUTORY PROVISIONS—PROCEDURE.

Priv. Laws 1911, c. 217, § 1, authorizing the commissioners of Bryson City to acquire land by condemnation for the construction of an electric light plant, was insufficient to confer power on the city to condemn land for failure to provide any procedure therefor, under the rule that the procedure necessary to give effect to right to condemn must also be prescribed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 27-34; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

2. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 9*)—RIGHT OF MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—STATUTES.

Though Priv. Laws 1911, c. 217, § 1, attempting to confer power of eminent domain on Bryson City to condemn land for an electric light plant, was insufficient for that purpose, the city was authorized to maintain such proceedings under Pub. Laws 1911, c. 86, § 1, amending Revisal 1905, § 2916, granting to all municipal corporations the right to build and operate a system of electric light plants, taken in connection with the sections of the Revisal of 1905, which it amends, which not only confers in express terms the right to condemn property, but also prescribes the necessary procedure.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Swain County; Webb, Judge.

Action by Marion Eppley against Bryson City to enjoin defendant from maintaining a dam on Deep River, and praying its abatement as a nuisance. From an order denying plaintiff's motion for an injunction, he appeals. Affirmed.

Bryson & Black, for appellant. F. C. Fisher, for appellee.

BROWN, J. The defendant, a municipal corporation, is duly authorized by law to erect, own, and operate an electric light plant. Chapter 217, Private Acts 1911. An election was held, and the voters approved the scheme. The bonds were issued and the work commenced, and several thousand dollars expended, and especially in the purchase of land and a water power on Deep river. The dam has been erected, and it turns out now that after a survey of the property adjacent to the site of the defendant's dam about 1²/₁₀ acres of plaintiff's rocky hillside mountain land is flooded. The dam has been finished, and the electric light plant well advanced towards completion.

It appears from the affidavits in the record that the only controversy between plaintiff and defendant is the value of the 1²/₁₀ of an acre of overflowed land. The plaintiff demands $400 damages, which sum defendant avers is extortionate, and defendant offers to submit the question to arbitration.

[1] It is contended by plaintiff that the defendant has no power of eminent domain, and no right to condemn his land for municipal purposes. The act of 1911 (Private Laws of 1911, § 1) reads as follows: "That the board of commissioners of the town of Bryson City shall have power to lay out, build and construct a system of sewerage and sewerage pipes for said town; to build and construct an electric light plant and repair the streets and sidewalks in said town, and to protect the same by adequate ordinances; and if in the construction, extension or maintenance of said sewer system, electric light plant or repair work, it shall become necessary to acquire land, right of way of easement, both within or without the corporate limits of said town, said board shall have the power to condemn the same in the same manner as is now provided by law for the condemnation of land for streets."

It is contended that there is no method of procedure provided in the acts incorporating Bryson City for condemning land for streets, and that therefore there is no procedure provided for condemning plaintiff's land. This seems to be true, and, in order that a municipal corporation shall lawfully exercise the right of eminent domain, the power must be expressly conferred or arise by necessary implication, and the procedure necessary to give it effect must be provided. 15 Cyc. 568. But the defendant is not confined to the act in question as the only source of its power to appropriate plaintiff's land and to have his damage assessed by a legal tribunal.

[2] Conceding that chapter 217, Private Laws 1911, is of no effect, so far as conferring, either in direct terms or necessary implication, the rights of eminent domain upon the defendant, still it is not without that right. Chapter 86, § 1, Pub. Laws of 1911, amending section 2916, Revisal 1905, grants to all towns, cities, and municipal incorporations the right to build, construct, maintain, and operate a system of electric plants, etc. That act, in connection with the sections of the Revisal of 1905, which it amends, not only confers in express terms the right to condemn property for such public purposes, but provides all necessary legal machinery for appropriating the property and assessing the owner's damage. Unless the plaintiff and defendant can come to some agreement as to the value of his overflowed land and the damages incident thereto, if any, the defendant can proceed under that act to have them assessed.

The judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

EPPLEY v. BRYSON CITY.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 20, 1911.)

Appeal from Superior Court, Swain County; Webb, Judge.

Action by Marion Eppley against Bryson City to enjoin defendant from erecting a dam for an electric light plant on Deep River. Plaintiff moved for a restraining order, which was denied, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Bryson & Black, for appellant. F. C. Fisher, for appellee.

BROWN, J. This action was commenced to restrain defendant from building the dam before its erection was begun.

As the court refused to enjoin them, the authorities of defendant proceeded to build the dam, and it is now completed. The matter involved is the same as in the other case between same parties (73 S. E. 197) at this term, and is governed by that decision.

The judgment is affirmed.

HAYNIE v. NORTH CAROLINA ELECTRIC POWER CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 20, 1911.)

1. PARENT AND CHILD (§ 7*)—LIABILITY FOR INJURY TO SERVANT—ACTION—THEORY—CONTRACT—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where, in an action for the death of a boy in the employment of the defendant, the plaintiff based his claim upon a violation by the defendant of the contract of hiring by which the injury occurred, the burden is on plaintiff to show the breach of contract and that it was the proximate cause of the child's death.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Parent and Child, Cent. Dig. §§ 86-99; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

2. PARENT AND CHILD (§ 7*)—ACTION FOR CAUSE OF DEATH OF INFANT—THEORY—CONTRACT—BURDEN OF PROOF.

A father who hires his son out may stipulate as to the kind of work his child may be employed in (unless prohibited by statute), and the consent of the parent that the child may be employed at one kind of labor is not a consent that he be placed in another and more dangerous work.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Parent and Child, Cent. Dig. §§ 86-99; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

3. PARENT AND CHILD (§ 7*)—DEATH OF INFANT SERVANT—LIABILITY OF EMPLOYERS—CARE REQUIRED—CONTRACT OF HIRING.

Where persons hired an infant as water carrier under an agreement with his father that he should be kept on a certain side of a river, and not allowed to go near the engines and machinery, situated on the opposite side, they were bound to use due diligence to keep the child away from the machinery and at the work he was hired to perform, or to return him to his father, and a showing of his presence near the machinery with the knowledge of the defendants shows a violation of a duty to him which will support an action for his death.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Parent and Child, Cent. Dig. §§ 86-99; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

4. PARENT AND CHILD (§ 7*)—INFANT EMPLOYE—CONTRACT OF HIRING—BREACH—DEATH—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

In an action for the death of an infant, a showing of a failure of his employers to keep him away from dangerous machinery, as required by the contract of hiring, with knowledge of his habit of playing there, will permit the jury to infer that if the agreement had been carried out his death would not have been caused by such machinery, and is a sufficient showing of proximate cause to support a finding for the plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Parent and Child, Cent. Dig. §§ 86-99; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

5. PARENT AND CHILD (§ 7*)—DEATH OF INFANT EMPLOYE—CONTRACT OF HIRING—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Where an action for the death of an infant is based upon an alleged violation of the agreement of hiring, made with the infant's father, by which it was stipulated that such infant should be kept away from machinery, etc., that the boy went near dangerous machinery in disobedience of orders was the thing the defendants contracted they would not allow him to do, and cannot be availed of as a defense on the ground of contributory negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Parent and Child, Cent. Dig. §§ 86-99; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

6. PARENT AND CHILD (§ 7*)—LIABILITY FOR INJURY TO INFANT SERVANT—ACTION—CONTRACT—ACQUESCENCE IN BREACH—BURDEN.

Where, in an action for the death of an infant servant, the theory of the action is that a breach of the contract of hiring made with the deceased's father was the proximate cause of the injury, the burden is upon the defendants to show that the father acquiesced in the breach, unless the facts appear from the plaintiff's own evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Parent and Child, Cent. Dig. §§ 86-99; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Madison County; Webb, Judge.

Action by Peter Haynie, administrator of William G. Haynie, deceased, against the North Carolina Electric Power Company and another. From a judgment of nonsuit granted at the close of plaintiff's case, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and new trial granted.

Locke Craig, Moore & Rollins, and Jones & Williams, for appellant. Martin & Wright, for appellees.

BROWN, J. The evidence offered by plaintiff tends to prove that his son, the intestate, aged 13 years, was killed in the engine room of defendants situated on the west side of the French Broad river about July 12, 1910, by falling on the belt connected with the engine. The evidence tends to prove that the boy was employed by defendants Willard & Son as a water carrier, for the men engaged on the east side of the river, in building a railroad track, and that on the west side of the river were situated all the engines and machinery for blasting and moving rock, etc. The evidence shows that at the time the boy was killed the engineer in charge of the engine was Raymond Turner, aged 20. The boy was killed by falling on the belt. The belt threw him off between the belt and the wall. His skull was cracked, his leg broken, and he was mashed to pieces and died in four hours. The boy had often been seen playing around the belt by Turner, the engineer, Correll, the foreman, and he was notified of the danger, but kept on playing around the belt. The evidence tends to show further that C. R. Willard knew of the boy's conduct and that the engineer and foreman had repeatedly warned the boy. The foundation of plaintiff's action is the allegation that his son was non sui juris, inexperienced, and incapable of appreciating great danger, and, by reason of his youth and inexperience, careless in incurring danger; that he hired his son to defendants to work upon the east side of the river as a water carrier away from the dangerous machinery and he should be protected from such dangers by the defendants. Plaintiff avers that this agreement was violated by defendants and his son permitted to go in the engine house on the west side of the river and to be around and about the machinery in consequence of which he was killed.

[1] The plaintiff does not base his claim upon any defective machinery, but upon a distinct violation by defendants of the contract of hiring. Upon the allegations of the complaint, the burden rests upon plaintiff to show a breach of the contract and that it was the proximate cause of his son's death.

The plaintiff testifies that he consented to the employment of his son by defendants for the purpose of carrying water on the east side of the river; that he forbade them to let his son go on the other side where the machinery was; that the foreman promised that his son would be kept at work on the east side; and that he would see to it.

[2] It is well settled that the father may stipulate as to the kind of work his child may be employed in (unless forbidden by statute), and the consent of the parent that the child may be employed at one kind of labor is not consent that he be placed in another and a more dangerous kind of work. Braswell v. Oil Co., 7 Ga. App. 167, 66 S. E. 539. Thus it was held that the fact that a parent hired his son as a "doffer boy" did not authorize the employer to change his work and place him in more dangerous environments. Cotton Mills v. King, 51 Tex. Civ. App. 518, 112 S. W. 132; Hendrickson v. Railroad, 137 Ky. 562, 126 S. W. 117, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 311. The notes to this case are very instructive and contain many cases illustrating and supporting this view.

The sum and substance of the many cases cited in those notes are that it is a general rule that an employer putting a minor servant, against his parent's consent, to do work by which the child is injured, commits an actionable wrong for which the employer is liable, although there is no other evidence of negligence upon his part. Union Pac. R. R. v. Fort, 17 Wall. 553, 21 L. Ed. 739, and cases cited in Rose's notes annotating this case. And under such circumstances it is also held that the minor servant's contributory negligence is no defense to such action. Marbury Lumber Co. v. Westbrook, 121 Ala. 179, 25 South. 914, and cases cited. As illustrating this doctrine, we may refer to cases in ante bellum days, where slaves were hired out to perform certain kinds of work and within certain limits, and the owner was permitted to recover damages for a breach of the contract because of injury to the slave. Slocumb v. Washington, 51 N. C. 357; Spivey v. Farmer, 3 N. C. 339.

In the brief of the learned counsel for the defendant it is contended:

[3] 1. That plaintiff failed to show that defendants violated any duty to plaintiff's intestate. The evidence, if believed, shows that defendants violated the contract of hiring.

[4] 2. That there is no evidence that any act or omission of defendant was the proximate cause of the boy's death. From the evidence it is a just inference which a jury may draw that if the defendants had carried out the agreement and kept the boy away from the machinery, or returned him to his father, the injury would not have occurred.

[5] 3. That all the evidence shows that the boy was guilty of negligence and disobedience of orders in going into the engine room where he was killed. To guard against that was the very reason why the plaintiff restricted his child's employment and required the defendants to confine him to the east side of the river. Under such circumstances, the defendants cannot avail themselves of such defense. Marbury Lumber Co. v. Westbrook, supra.

We do not mean to hold that the defendants became insurers of the intestate's life; but, if the agreement be as testified to by plaintiff, it was the duty of defendants to use due diligence and care to keep him away from the machinery and at the work he was hired to perform, or else to return him to his father.

[6] It may be that the father waived the terms of the agreement and acquiesced in his son working on the west side of the river; but the burden would be on defendants to show that unless the facts appear from the plaintiff's own evidence.

The judgment of nonsuit is set aside.

New trial.

(158 N. C. 32)

PATILLO et al. v. LYTLE et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 23, 1911.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 668*)—JURISDICTION OF PROBATION—UNAUTHORIZED JOINDER AS PLAINTIFF.

Mere knowledge by a tenant in common, who had been joined as plaintiff in partition without authority, of the institution of the proceedings, is insufficient to bind him by a sale therein.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Dec. Dig. § 668.*]

2. ESTOPPEL (§ 91*)—JUDGMENT—SALE—SETTING ASIDE—ESTOPPEL.

Where a tenant in common has been joined as a plaintiff in partition without authority, failure to object, or even an expression of willingness that the land should be sold, will not estop him to move to set aside the sale, in the absence of any act which will cause injury to the other parties, or the purchaser, if such tenant be not held bound.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. §§ 257-259; Dec. Dig. § 91.*]

3. PARTITION (§ 78*)—SALE—SALE OF FRACTIONAL INTEREST.

The sale of an undivided fractional interest less than the whole tract in partition proceedings, leaving the remainder to be held in severalty by one of the tenants in common, was not a compliance with Acts 1887, c. 214, § 1 (Revised 1905, § 2506), providing that in proceedings for partition actual division may be made of a part of the land and a sale of the remainder, or a part held by the cotenants may be partitioned, and the remainder held in common, and was unauthorized.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. §§ 265-273; Dec. Dig. § 78.*]

4. PARTITION (§ 106*)—SALE—ABSENCE OF CONFIRMATION—EFFECT.

An intending purchaser at a partition sale is a mere preferred proposer, and not a purchaser, until after the sale has been confirmed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Dec. Dig. § 106.*]

5. PARTITION (§ 110*)—SALE—ABSENCE OF CONFIRMATION—EFFECT.

Revised 1905, § 2512, provides that on the coming in of a report of a partition sale and its confirmation, and payment of the purchase money, title shall be made to the purchaser as directed by the court. Section 2513 provides that the person authorized to sell property in partition shall file his report of sale, and, if no exception be filed thereto within 20 days, it shall be confirmed, providing that any party after confirmation may impeach the proceedings for mistake, etc., by petition. Held, that a deed executed by the commissioner without confirmation was unauthorized and void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. §§ 398-400; Dec. Dig. § 110.*]

6. PARTITION (§ 107*)—SALE—VACATION—PROCEEDINGS—MOTION.

Nominal plaintiffs in partition, who did not in fact authorize the use of their names as such, properly assailed the sale by motion in the cause to set it aside.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Dec. Dig. § 107.*]

7. PARTITION (§ 107*)—JUDGMENT BY CONSENT—PARTIES AFFECTED.

Parties to a suit cannot by agreeing to a consent decree affect the rights of persons in interest not parties; so that the fact that a decree of partition and sale which partitioned all of the land was by consent would not prevent the tenants in common, who were not parties, from moving to set it aside.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Dec. Dig. § 107.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; Webb, Judge.

Partition by John Patillo and others against James Lytle and others. From an order denying a motion by Hattie Moore and other plaintiffs to set aside the sale, they appeal. Reversed, and judgment and order of sale ordered set aside.

This is a proceeding for the partition of the land described in the pleadings among the heirs of Thomas Patillo. At June term, 1911, an order was made for the sale of the land, which was made by the commissioner on August 7, 1911, and D. W. Harrison became the highest bidder, and the land was knocked down to him at the price of $1,205, which he paid to the commissioner. No report of sale was made by the commissioner, and the sale was, of course, never confirmed by the court. The commissioner, without any order authorizing him to do so, executed a deed for the land to the bidder, D. W. Harrison. At October term, 1911, Carrie Burgin, Hattie Moore, Rose Bradley, Della Davidson, and Ida Mims made a motion before the court to set aside the sale, because, while their names appeared in the list of plaintiffs, they had not authorized counsel for the other plaintiffs, or any one else, to make them parties, and that they were thus made parties without their knowledge or consent, and, further, that they are opposed to a sale of the land and desire an actual partition thereof. Judge Lane found as facts at the hearing of the motion that the land brought its full value at the sale; that three of the movers had notice of the suit after it was commenced, and made no objection thereto; that one of them at the sale expressed her willingness to have the land sold, but that Carrie Burgin did not know of the proceeding, and therefore had given no authority to any one to make her a party, nor had she been notified what had been done. He further found that a sale of the land was necessary for a fair division of the same. He thereupon denied the motion of all the parties, confirmed the sale, and adjudged D. W. Harrison to be the owner of all the undivided interests in said land except that owned by Carrie Burgin, and, further, that they were tenants in common, Harrison owning all the undivided interests, except the one belonging to Carrie Burgin. The motioners excepted and appealed.

Mark W. Brown, for appellants. Craig, Martin & Thomason, for appellees.

WALKER, J. This case proceeded very irregularly in the court below from the beginning to the end of it. The court evidently found as a fact that the motioners had not authorized the proceeding to be brought, and that all except Carrie Burgin were bound by the orders and decrees therein, because they happened to know of it; one of them having shown a willingness at the sale that the land should be sold. It would have been better if his honor had distinctly found whether or not they had authorized themselves to be made parties, but without any such specific finding we think it a fair inference from the other findings that he concluded as a matter of fact that no such authority had been given.

[1, 2] We do not think, therefore, that they were in law parties to the proceeding. A mere knowledge of the proceedings, in the absence of authority given to make them parties, would not be sufficient to bind them, nor did a mere expression of willingness that the land might be sold have that effect as to Ida Mims. Before they could be estopped by conduct, they must have done something which caused the other parties or the purchaser to act in some way which will prejudice them if they are not held bound by what has been done in the proceedings, and no such result has followed. Boddie v. Bond, 154 N. C. 359, 70 S. E. 824; Eaton's Equity, p. 169.

[3] But there is another more serious question in the case. The court, if it had the power to confirm the sale and further adjudge as it did, without first bringing in all necessary parties, has in legal effect partitioned only a fractional interest in the land, instead of the whole thereof. It is true Acts 1887, c. 214, § 1 (Revisal, § 2506), provides that in all proceedings for partition actual division may be made of a part of the land and a sale of the remainder, or a part only of any land held by the tenants in common may be partitioned and the remainder held in common, but this provision does not sustain the judgment rendered below upon the motion to set aside the order of sale. The court's order did not provide for a sale of a part and actual division of the remainder, or that a part only be partitioned and the remainder held in common, but it simply ordered the sale to stand as to a fractional interest, an undivided interest, less than the whole, and the remainder to be held, not in common, as the statute provides, but in severalty by Carrie Burgin. But there is direct authority upon the subject. In Brooks v. Austin, 95 N. C. 474, the court, adverting to a similar state of facts, says by Chief Justice Smith: "A three-tenths interest in the 30-acre tract is proposed to be sold for division, the tenant or tenants of the other seven-tenths not being before the court, nor could they rightfully be, since they have the property in common in the larger tract. Simpson v. Wallace, 83 N. C. 477. We have met with no case in which such an undivided interest has been the subject of partition and sale at the instance of those owning it, when the other tenants are not present in the action. The statute requires actual partition among tenants in common of the whole tract, though shares may be united and apportioned to several, or a single share may be allotted to one, the residue of the land being still held in common by the other tenants, but, however done, the partition must be of the whole. The sale as a mode of partition can only be resorted to when otherwise it would be to 'the injury of some or all of the parties interested.' Code, § 1904. The actual divisibility of the land into parts as an inquiry to be made before an order of sale can only be legally made when all the tenants are before the court." See also, Gregory v. Gregory, 69 N. C. 522.

[4] There is no innocent purchaser in this case who can be affected by setting aside the decree. Harrison is no such a purchaser. He is not a purchaser at all, but a mere "preferred proposer," as he is styled. Miller v. Feezor, 82 N. C. 192; Joyner v. Futrell, 138 N. C. 301, 48 S. E. 649. In the last-cited case it is said: "The only other question which we need consider—that is, as to the validity of the deed of the executor and its sufficiency to pass the title, without any confirmation of the sale by the court—is equally well settled. This court, and all courts, we believe, having jurisdiction to pass upon judicial proceedings for the sale of land, have uniformly held that it is necessary that the sale be reported to the court, and that it be confirmed, before the commissioner or other person appointed by the court to make the sale can have any power to make title to the purchaser. The commissioner is invested with a naked power, which must be exercised under the supervision and control of the court, and he has no authority to act save that which he derives from the court under its order or judgment. The bidder at a judicial sale, on the other hand, acquires no right before the sale is reported by the officer and the sale is confirmed by the acceptance of his bid. Until then, the bargain with him is not complete, and he acquires no title of any kind to the land. He is regarded as a mere preferred proposer until he has been accepted by the court as the purchaser, and every bidder is presumed to know, because he should know, that his bid is made subject to the condition of its acceptance or rejection by the court. A formal direction to make title is not always necessary to confer upon the commissioner the power to convey the land to the purchaser by deed, but a confirmation of the sale cannot be dispensed with in any case, unless perhaps in some way it has been waived. It is a condition precedent to the exercise of the right to convey the title. This principle has been settled by numerous authorities. Bost. Ex parte, 56 N. C. 482; Brown v. Coble, 76 N. C. 391; Mebane v. Mebane, 80 N. C. 34; Latta v. Vickers, 82 N. C. 501; Foushee v. Durham, 84 N. C. 56; Miller v. Feezor, 82 N. C. 192; Attorney General v. Navigation Co., 86 N. C. 408; Dickerson, Ex parte, 111 N. C. 108 [15 S. E. 1025]; Vanderbilt v. Brown, 128 N. C. 498, 39 S. E. 36; Mason v. Osgood, 64 N. C. 467; Rorer, Jud. Sales, § 122."

[5] We also held that the deed of the commissioner without confirmation, being unauthorized, was void. Revisal, §§ 2512, 2513. Harrison is to be treated, therefore, as a mere proposer, whose bid was awaiting acceptance by the court, and was subject to its rejection. But, if the sale had been confirmed, it would not have bound Carrie Burgin, who was not a party to the proceeding (Henderson v. Wallace, 72 N. C. 451) and without whose presence, as a party, the court could not, as we have seen, proceed under the statute to partition the land. The judge cannot make an order of sale or any other order in the case, which is contrary to the mandatory provisions of the statute. The court and the parties must proceed according to the statute, and not otherwise. It is a wise provision which requires all the land to be partitioned in some way pointed out by the statute, which we cannot repeal or modify by judicial construction, nor can we approve such a radical departure from statutory methods. What we have said in this case is supported by the decision of the court at this term in Taylor v. Carrow, 72 S. E. 76, as will appear in the opinion of which the following passage is a clear summary: "The judge in the beginning was vested with the power to decree actual partition, or a partial partition, or a sale for partition. Having set aside the report, as he had power to do, the matter was then open to him as res nova. Being better advised by the report or further evidence, he could not only refer it to new commissioners, but he could direct actual partition of the whole tract, or a sale of the whole, or a partition of part and a sale of the remainder, just as he could originally. No title vested until the decree of confirmation upon the final report of the commissioners. Until the decree of confirmation the proceedings are not final, but interlocutory, and rest in the discretion of the court, even though the purchase money has been paid and the purchaser has taken possession of the premises. Knapp on Partition, 336."

[6] The parties took the proper course to set aside the decree by a motion in the cause, as they were parties nominally, though not so in fact. Doyle v. Brown, 72 N. C. 393; Sumner v. Sessoms, 94 N. C. 377.

[7] It is suggested that this is a consent decree. But parties to a suit cannot by consent impair the rights of those in interest, who are not made parties, and the decree directly affects their rights, though they were not heard. The whole of the land was partitioned, and the judgment, therefore, operates upon every interest in it.

The judgment will be set aside, as also the order of sale, and deed to the commissioner, the latter returning the purchase money to D. W. Harrison, and the case may then proceed by making all necessary parties, and in other respects as the parties may be advised.

Error.

PATTERSON v. NICHOLS.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 20, 1911.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 107*)—MASTER'S LIABILITY—NEGLIGENCE.

If the place where an employé was required to work was not in a reasonably safe condition, the employer was negligent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 179; Dec. Dig. § 107.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 234*)—INJURIES—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

In an employé's action for personal injuries, the court instructed that, before the jury could find contributory negligence, they must be satisfied that plaintiff knew of the danger he was incurring, or in the exercise of reasonable care could have known thereof, and that the work was so obviously dangerous that one of reasonable prudence would not have engaged in it, or that in the performance of his work he did not exercise reasonable care for his own safety. Held, that the instruction was proper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 684-686; Dec. Dig. § 234.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 293*)—INJURIES—INSTRUCTIONS—NEGLIGENCE.

Plaintiff was injured while extending a shaft in a laundry, which was suspended from the ceiling by hangers, by having his overalls caught in the set screw which projected below the shaft; plaintiff at that time standing on a ladder placed against the wall to enable him to reach the shaft. The court on the first issue of negligence charged the jury to answer that issue, "Yes," if they found that defendant was negligent in not supplying plaintiff with a safer appliance while in the performance of his duty, and to answer it, "No," if they found that a collar with a projecting screw was in common use in such places. Permitting the screw to project was one of the grounds of negligence relied on. Held, that the instruction was inconsistent and misleading, since the jury might have properly found that both facts existed, in which case they were told how to answer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 293.*]

4. NEGLIGENCE (§ 139*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

When plaintiff relies upon several acts of negligence, it is proper to submit them separately and to charge that, if the jury do not find the facts as contended by plaintiff upon each question of negligence, the jury should find for defendant on that question.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 371-377; Dec. Dig. § 139.*]

5. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 293*)—INJURIES—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLIANCES.

Plaintiff was injured while standing on a ladder engaged in extending a laundry shaft suspended from the ceiling by hangers. Plaintiff placed the ladder against the wall, instead of hanging it over the shafting by hooks attached to the ladder, and was standing upon it with his back toward the shafting, when his overalls were caught by a projecting set screw in the shaft. The court instructed that if defendant provided a ladder for plaintiff to stand on while putting on the belt, and that was a part of plaintiff's duty, and the ladder was the only appliance furnished by defendant upon which to stand while putting on the belt, and was a reasonably safe appliance to use for that purpose, and it was necessary for him to use the ladder while performing such duty, and that defendant was negligent in not supplying plaintiff with a safer appliance on which to stand in the performance of his duty, causing the injury, the jury should find that the plaintiff was injured by defendant's negligence. Held, that the instruction, fairly interpreted, referred to the ladder as an appliance and to its safety for the purpose for which it was used, and did not submit the question of any defect in the ladder.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1148-1161; Dec. Dig. § 293.*]

6. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 107*)—EMPLOYER'S DUTY—SAFE PLACE TO WORK.

It is an employer's duty, in the exercise of reasonable care, to furnish a reasonably safe place of work, especially where the machinery is somewhat complicated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 179; Dec. Dig. § 107.*]

7. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 105*)—MASTER'S DUTY—SAFE APPLIANCES.

It is an employer's duty to supply appliances and machinery, which are reasonably safe and suitable for the work, and such as are approved and in general use in similar plants.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 186; Dec. Dig. § 105.*]

8. MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 101, 102*)—MASTER'S DUTY—REPAIRING MACHINERY.

An employer is required to maintain machinery and appliances in a reasonably safe condition by the exercise of reasonable care, as well as to originally put it in that condition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 178; Dec. Dig. §§ 101, 102.*]

9. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 278*)—INJURIES—SAFE APPLIANCES—EVIDENCE.

In determining whether a place of work is reasonably safe, evidence as to the appliances used therein is competent; but the fact that they are approved and in general use may not be conclusive as to their sufficiency, and where an employé was injured while attempting to put a belt on a pulley, and there was no evidence that it was practicable to use a shifter at a pulley so located, or that one had ever been used in any plant for any purpose, or that any other employé had ever been required to touch the pulley, it was error to submit the question of the use of the shifter to put the belt on.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 960; Dec. Dig. § 278.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; Lane, Judge.

Action by Sherman Patterson against James J. Nichols. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, and new trial granted.

This is an action to recover damages for personal injury.

On the 6th day of March, 1909, the plaintiff, who had been employed in the wash-room of the defendant's laundry for four years, was engaged by the defendant as repairman, repairing defendant's machinery. He had been at this work about two weeks, when he was directed to extend a shaft so that another machine might be put in. In order to extend the shaft, it was necessary for the plaintiff to stop that part of the machinery, and that was done by throwing off the belt which connected it with the main shaft. This belt was usually thrown with a pole, but was put on by hand.

The shaft which was being extended was suspended from the ceiling. It was about 10 or 12 feet from the floor and 2 feet from the wall. Where the end went into the hangers, there was a collar, which was kept tight by a set screw which projected below the shaft about 4 inches. The set screw was close to the hanger and 12 or 14 inches away from the pulley on which the belt ran. After the plaintiff had made the extension, he undertook to put the belt on to see whether the shaft would run right. For the purpose of getting to the shaft to put the belt on the pulley, there was provided a ladder with hooks on it so that it could be hung over the shaft. And, when used in this way, a person putting on the belt would be working with his face towards the shafting and the set screw. The plaintiff, instead of hanging the ladder over the shafting, leaned it against the wall, on the side of the pulley where the set screw was, so that in climbing up he had his back to the shaft and the screw, and a space of about two feet between the shaft and the wall, in which to work.

As the plaintiff was climbing the ladder, and reaching over to pull the belt on the pulley, the set screw caught in the back of the collar of his overalls, and he was thrown around the revolving shaft and injured. There was evidence that the hooks on the ladder were for the purpose of hanging over the shaft, to oil the machinery when not in motion, and that, in the performance of the duty imposed on the plaintiff, it was necessary to rest the ladder against the wall. There was no evidence of any defect in the ladder. No shifter was used by the defendant, and there was no evidence that a shifter was in general use for putting on and off belts at pulleys located as was the one at which the plaintiff was injured, or elsewhere. There was evidence that in modern laundries the set screw is countersunk, and not permitted to project from the collar.

The following verdict was returned by the jury:

(1) Was the plaintiff injured by the negligence of the defendant, Nichols, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

(2) Did the plaintiff by his own negligence contribute to his injury? Answer: No.

(3) What damage, if any, has the plaintiff sustained? Answer: $2,000.

His honor charged the jury on the first issue as follows, omitting his statement of the contentions of the parties:

"In order for the plaintiff to recover in this action, he must satisfy you by the preponderance or greater weight of the evidence: First, that this defendant was negligent, as alleged, and the plaintiff must satisfy you that he was injured, and that the negligence of the defendant was the proximate cause of his injury. If he fails to satisfy you in any one of these propositions, then he would not be entitled to recover.

"Now, what is negligence? Negligence is the failure to exercise such care, prudence, and caution, under all of the circumstances surrounding the situation, as an ordinarily careful, prudent, and cautious man would be expected to use and exercise under the circumstances. It is the failure to exercise such care and the failure to do something that an ordinarily careful, prudent, and cautious man would be expected to do under the circumstances, or it is the doing of something that an ordinarily cautious, careful, and prudent man would not be expected to do under all the circumstances that existed, surrounding the case. So it is the failure to use proper care under the circumstances, by the doing or the omission of some act that a reasonably prudent, careful, and cautious man would be expected to do.

"If the jury find by the greater weight of the evidence that the defendant, James J. Nichols, provided for the plaintiff a ladder to stand on while putting on the belt; that the putting on of this belt was a part of the duty of the plaintiff while engaged in the service of the defendant; that this ladder was the only appliance furnished by the defendant upon which to stand while putting on the belt; that the ladder was a reasonably safe appliance to use for the purpose of putting on the belt; that it was necessary for him to use the ladder while in the performance of his duty; that the defendant was negligent in not supplying the plaintiff with a safer appliance on which to stand while in the performance of his duty; and that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff—the jury will answer the first issue, 'Yes.'

"If the jury find by the greater weight of the evidence that the defendant, James J. Nichols, did not equip his plant at the place where the plaintiff was changing the belt with a shifter and idler, that such shifter and idler would have been a safe appliance and suitable for the purpose of changing the belt, that the putting on and off of the belt without such shifter and idler was dangerous and uselessly dangerous to the plaintiff, that it was uselessly dangerous to require the plaintiff to put on and off this belt with a stick while standing on a ladder, that the defendant was negligent in not supplying his plant at this place with a shifter and idler, and that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff, the jury will answer the first issue, 'Yes.'

"But if you find that the defendant did provide proper appliances for the purpose of putting on and taking off this belt, and that the stick provided there for taking off the belt was a suitable and reasonably safe appliance for taking it off, and such as was in general use in plants and places of this kind for removing belts, and that the belt could have been put on by the use of this ladder in a proper manner, by standing it at the proper place, as the defendant contends, by pushing on the belt, that that was a reasonably safe and suitable way and appliance there for putting on and taking off the belt, then you would answer the first issue of negligence, 'No'; otherwise you would answer it, 'Yes.'

"Now if you find by the greater weight of the evidence that there was a set screw projecting about an inch from one of the shafts; that it was necessary for the plaintiff in the discharge of his duty to work in close proximity to this set screw; that had the set screw been countersunk, as described by the witness, it would not have been dangerous; that in the exercise of reasonable care it was the duty of the defendant to countersink this set screw; that it was dangerous for the plaintiff to perform his duty as he was required to perform it while this set screw was projecting from the shaft, as described by the witness; that it was negligent in the defendant to require the plaintiff to work in close proximity to the projecting set screw; and that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff—the jury will answer the first issue, 'Yes.'

"I charge you further, gentlemen of the jury, that the law did not require the defendant to do more than to exercise reasonable care to provide reasonably safe machinery and appliances, and the defendant was not required to adopt the latest appliances or machinery, but only to use that which was in general use, in places of like kind and character. And if the jury shall find from the evidence that shafting with projecting set screws was in general use in steam laundries of the kind and character the defendant was operating, the use of shafting with a projecting set screw by the defendant would not be negligence, and the jury should answer the first issue, 'No.'

"The defendant, Nichols, was not required to use a shaft with a sunken set screw merely because such shafts were put upon the market and were being used and approved by others, and if the jury shall find from the evidence that machinery such as was being used by the defendant was in general use in other laundries, the use of such machinery with a projecting set screw would not be negligence, and the jury should answer the first issue, 'No.'

"That if the jury shall find from the evidence that a shaft collar with a projecting screw such as was being used by the defendant, Nichols, was in common use, and that the shaft which he was using was of the kind that was being used in other laundries, the use of a shaft with a projecting screw would not constitute negligence on the part of the defendant, and the jury should answer the first issue, 'No.'"

The defendant excepted to the different parts of the charge instructing the jury how the issue should be answered. At the conclusion of the evidence, the defendant moved for judgment of nonsuit, which was overruled, and the defendant excepted. There was a judgment upon the verdict, and the defendant appealed.

A. S. Barnard, for appellant. Philip C. Cocke, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. The motion for judgment of nonsuit was properly overruled.

[1] There was evidence for the consideration of the jury that the place, where the plaintiff was required to perform his duty, was not, under all the circumstances, reasonably safe, and that this was the cause of the plaintiff's injury, and, if so, there was evidence of negligence.

The absence of a shifter, the presence of a projecting set screw, the fact that a ladder had to be used, that the ladder had to be set against the wall, that the plaintiff had to go up the ladder in a space of two feet between the shaft and the wall, with his back to the screw, and had to reach over the pulley to put on the belt while the machinery was in motion, are all circumstances, if found to exist, which enter into the question of a reasonably safe place.

[2] We are also of opinion that his honor correctly charged the jury on the second issue that: "Before you can answer the second issue, 'Yes,' you must be satisfied by the greater weight of the evidence that the plaintiff knew the danger which he was incurring, or in the exercise of reasonable care could have known it, and that the work required of him by the defendant was obviously so dangerous that a man of reasonable prudence would not have engaged in it, or that in the performance of his work he did not exercise reasonable care for his own safety. Unless the jury so find that the plaintiff was negligent as herein stated, you will answer the second issue, 'No'"—and that he could not, as matter of law, direct the jury to answer the second issue, "Yes."

[3] We think, however, there is error in the instructions on the first issue, which entitles the defendant to a new trial.

When the charge on the first issue is considered as a whole, there are inconsistent directions to the jury, which must have left them in doubt as to a correct finding upon the issue.

To illustrate: His honor charged the jury to answer the first issue, "Yes," if they found that the defendant was negligent in not supplying the plaintiff with a safer appliance on which to stand while in the performance of his duty, and to answer it, "No," if they found that a collar with a projecting screw was in common use. Suppose the jury found both facts to exist, how should the issue be answered?

[4] When several acts of negligence are relied on by the plaintiff and there is evidence to support them, it is proper to submit separate charges as to each, presenting the contentions of the plaintiff, upon which the issue of negligence may be answered in the affirmative, and telling the jury that, if they do not find the facts as contended, the defendant would not be negligent in that respect.

[5] The charge upon the use of the ladder as a safety appliance is not free from doubt. If, by proper construction, it was intended to leave to the jury the question of a defect in the ladder, we would hold it erroneous, because no evidence of such defect was introduced; but we think a fair interpretation of the language leads to the conclusion that his honor was speaking of the ladder as an appliance, and of its safety for the purpose for which it was being used.

We also think there was error in the charge as to the use of a shifter, upon the ground that there was no evidence to support it.

[6-8] It is the duty of the employer, "where the machinery is more or less complicated, and more especially when driven by mechanical power, to provide for his employees, in the exercise of proper care, a reasonably safe place to work, and to supply them with machinery, implements, and appliances reasonably safe and suitable for the work in which they are engaged, and such as are approved and in general use in plants and places of like kind and character; and an employer is also required to keep such machinery in such condition as far as this can be done in the exercise of proper care and diligence. Witsell v. Railroad, 120 N. C. 557 [27 S. E. 125]; Marks v. Cotton Mills, 135 N. C. 287 [47 S. E. 432].” Hicks v. Manufacturing Co., 138 N. C. 326, 50 S. E. 705.

The rule is well stated by Justice Walker in West v. Tanning Co., 154 N. C. 47, 69 S. E. 689: “The master does not guarantee the safety of his servant while engaged in the discharge of his duties. He is not an insurer, and is not bound to furnish him an absolutely safe place to work in, but is required simply to use reasonable care and prudence in providing such a place. He is not bound to furnish the best known machinery, implements, and appliances, but only such as are reasonably fit and safe and in general use. He meets the requirements of the law if, in the selection of machinery and appliances, he uses that degree of care which a man of ordinary prudence would use, having regard to his own safety, if he were supplying them for his own personal use. It is culpable negligence which makes the employer liable, not a mere error of judgment.”

[§] In determining whether the place is reasonably safe, evidence as to the appliances used is competent, but, if shown to be such as are approved and in general use, may not be conclusive, and it may be that, in the absence of evidence that shifters were in general use, circumstances might arise in which it would be proper to submit the question of negligence to the jury upon proof that no shifter was used, as in cases where the employé is working at the machine and is required constantly, in the performance of his duty, to shift the belt; but these conditions do not exist here.

The plaintiff was injured at a pulley 10 or 12 feet from the floor, and there is no evidence that it was practicable to use a shifter at a pulley so located, or that one had ever been used in any plant for any purpose, or that any employé of the defendant, except the plaintiff, had ever been required to touch the pulley, and the plaintiff does not show that he had done so, except when doing the work of extending the shaft, immediately before his injury.

In the absence of evidence, it was erroneous to submit this view of the case to the jury. Burton v. Mfg. Co., 132 N. C. 17, 43 S. E. 480; Jones v. Johnson, 133 N. C. 487, 46 S. E. 1030; Stewart v. Carpet Co., 138 N. C. 61, 50 S. E. 562.

There is also an exception to the charge on damages, which it is not necessary to consider; but we call attention to the fact that the rule as to the measure of damages stated in Wallace v. Railroad, 104 N. C. 451, 10 S. E. 552, is full and comprehensive, and that elements of damage embraced therein, as to which no evidence is offered, should be eliminated.

For the errors pointed out, there must be a new trial.

New trial.

ARTHUR v. HENRY et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 20, 1911.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 323*)—INJURY TO THIRD PARTIES—INDEPENDENT CONTRACTOR.

An owner of a quarry began blasting in operating it, and thereby threw stones on the premises of the adjacent owner, who complained and gave notice of the danger to him. The owner then leased the quarry to a third person for the purpose of having the operations continued, and the third person agreed to indemnify the owner against damages. Held, that the owner was liable for the acts of the lessee in the operation of the quarry.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 1264; Dec. Dig. § 323.*]

2. ADJOINING LANDOWNERS (§ 8*)—NEGLIGENCE IN BLASTING.

Where one in operating a quarry on his land threw stones on the land of the adjacent owner without the consent of the latter, the latter could recover the damages sustained.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adjoining Landowners, Cent. Dig. § 63; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

3. ADJOINING LANDOWNERS (§ 8*)—NEGLIGENCE IN BLASTING.

An owner of land, who consents to the operation by the adjacent owner of a quarry on the adjacent land, may not recover for damages to his land unless there is negligence in the operation of the quarry.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adjoining Landowners, Cent. Dig. § 63; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

4. ADJOINING LANDOWNERS (§ 8*)—NEGLIGENCE IN BLASTING—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to show negligence in the operation of a quarry causing injury to adjacent land, authorizing a recovery for the damages sustained.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adjoining Landowners, Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 994*)—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES—QUESTION FOR COURT.

The court on appeal will not pass on the credibility of the witnesses.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3901-3906; Dec. Dig. § 994.*]

6. DAMAGES (§ 91*)—PUNITIVE DAMAGES—WHEN RECOVERABLE.

Where the acts of a wrongdoer evince a reckless indifference to the rights of another, or the acts were done wantonly, or from a bad motive, punitive damages are recoverable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 193-201; Dec. Dig. § 91.*]

7. ADJOINING LANDOWNERS (§ 8*)—NEGLIGENT BLASTING—WANTONNESS—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to justify a finding of wantonness in the operation of a quarry causing injury to adjacent land, authorizing punitive damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adjoining Landowners, Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

8. ADJOINING LANDOWNERS (§ 8*)—NEGLIGENT BLASTING—NOTICE OF DANGER—EVIDENCE.

Where a lessee of a quarry wantonly operated it to the injury of the adjacent land, and the owner of the quarry executed the lease with knowledge of injury from the operation and for the purpose of continuing the operation, evidence of a conversation of the owner of the adjacent land and the owner of the quarry, prior to the execution of the lease, as to the operation and injuries resulting therefrom by rock falling on the adjacent land, was admissible to charge the owner of the quarry with notice of the danger to the adjacent land at the time of the execution of the lease.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adjoining Landowners, Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

9. DAMAGES (§ 181*)—PUNITIVE DAMAGES—EVIDENCE—WEALTH OF DEFENDANT.

Where punitive damages may be awarded, evidence of the financial condition of defendant is admissible in behalf of plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 474, 499; Dec. Dig. § 181.*]

10. EVIDENCE (§ 211*)—ADMISSIONS.

A statement by plaintiff, while testifying in an action for injuries to his land, that he claimed no damages prior to a designated date, does not prevent an inquiry as to all damages not barred by limitations, for it does not amount to a retraxit, and does not show a contract for want of mutuality and consideration, but is a mere statement which ought to have weight with the jury in determining the damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 211.*]

11. TRIAL (§ 351*)—ISSUES—SPECIAL ISSUES—SUFFICIENCY.

Where the issues adopted by the trial court are sufficient to present all the contentions of the parties arising on the pleadings, the refusal to submit other issues is not error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 834; Dec. Dig. § 351.*]

12. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 85*)—INJURY TO PROPERTY — ABSENCE OF DEFENDANT FROM STATE.

A plaintiff suing for injuries to his land caused by the operation by defendant of a quarry on adjacent land is entitled, under Revisal 1905, § 366, to recover damages for acts done within three years before the commencement of the action, excluding from the computation the time defendant was absent from the state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 449-455; Dec. Dig. § 85.*]

13. TRIAL (§ 252*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action for the negligent operation of a quarry, there was no evidence of injury to the health or person of plaintiff, nor suggestion that he claimed damages on that account, but the evidence confined the damages to his land, the refusal to charge that there was no evidence that plaintiff sustained any personal injury was not erroneous, though the court might have given the charge as a precautionary charge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 596-612; Dec. Dig. § 252.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; Carter, Judge.

Action by John P. Arthur against Philip S. Henry and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

This action was brought by the plaintiff against the defendant to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff on account of the operation of a stone quarry by the defendant Philip S. Henry on land belonging to the defendant and adjoining plaintiff's land. An injunction was sought in the case against all the defendants, but damages claimed only as against the defendant Philip S. Henry. The plaintiff claimed that the defendant had operated his quarry, which was within a few feet of the line between plaintiff and defendant, and about 400 feet from the plaintiff's house, in a negligent, careless, and reckless manner, and had thrown stones, dirt, dust, and other substances on the plaintiff's premises; had killed and destroyed his fruit trees, shade trees, herbs, and grass; had thrown stones and dirt and dust into and on the plaintiff's house; and had, by means of the noise caused in the operation of said stone quarry and in operation of a stone crusher as a part thereof, created a nuisance and seriously damaged his property. The plaintiff also claimed that the defendant had made a lease of his stone quarry for the purpose of avoiding liability for damages to the plaintiff, and that the lessee, Faragher Engineering Company, operated said quarry in a negligent, careless, and reckless manner, damaging his property; and, further, that all of these acts were done by the defendant willfully and wantonly and committed for the purpose of injuring the plaintiff, and with the knowledge that said action would injure the plaintiff and his property.

The quarrying was begun in May or June, 1904, and blasting was necessary and resorted to, and, in the progress of the work stones were thrown upon the plaintiff's land and on his house. The defendant carried on his operations from June, 1904, to some time in October, 1906. The evidence of the plaintiff himself shows that he had no personal knowledge as to the date of the commencement of these operations, being away from home at the time; that on his return he found that a rock had been thrown onto the roof of his house, injuring it, requiring an expense of $1.50 for repairs, which defendant paid. Upon the throwing of the stone on the house appellant ceased his operations and did not resume until plaintiff consented he might. No stones were ever thrown upon the house after the first one, but were thrown in his yard. The plaintiff was never at home when the blasting was going on, but at his office in the First National Bank Building and Library Building, but could hear the explosions. He made no claim for the injury done the house, and makes none in this action, and said on his examination that he did not claim damages prior to the 4th day of August, 1906. In July, 1906, the attorney in fact of appellant leased the quarries to a corporation called Faragher Engineering Company, and this company began operating the quarries about August or September afterwards, and continued until March or April, 1907.

There was evidence showing that the plaintiff owned a lot of land in the city of Asheville, consisting of several acres, where he resided with his sister, both being unmarried; that defendant purchased a tract of land adjoining the plaintiff's; that the defendant's land was situated south and east of the plaintiff's land on the side of the Town Mountain in the corporate limits of Asheville; that the defendant's land lay considerably above the plaintiff's land; that in 1904 the defendant opened up a stone quarry on his land at a point about 30 or 40 feet from the plaintiff's line, and about 400 feet from the plaintiff's house, but at an elevation of 50 to 100 feet above the plaintiff's residence; that this stone quarry was operated by means of blasting; and that a stone crusher was operated at the quarry, where the stone was crushed into dust and small pieces of stone, which stone crusher was run by steam power. The evidence tended to show: That, beginning in 1904, the defendant had in person operated the quarry from time to time. That while he so operated it the plaintiff's lands were damaged, as alleged by the plaintiff. That in June and September, 1905, and February, 1906, the defendant told the plaintiff that he wanted an agreement drawn whereby the quarry could be operated without liability on his part, and proposed to make some arrangement with insolvent persons to conduct the quarry, and, after considerable talk about the matter, there were some bitter words between the parties; the defendant saying, "I will find a way to use that quarry without being liable." That in July, 1906, the defendant leased the quarry to the Faragher Engineering Company, to whom defendant had promised to lease it before he left for Europe. In this lease, defendant retained the right to have a representative at the quarries to measure the stone removed, and had the lessee to agree to indemnify him against all claims and actions for damages, but did not retain the right to supervise the proper and safe operation of those quarries, or require the lessee to agree to conduct them safely. Operations in the mine again began in 1909. There was also evidence that the defendant knew the injurious character of the operations at the quarry; that he knew the operations were calculated to injure the plaintiff; that he had endeavored to get the plaintiff to draw a contract whereby he would be released from liability, had endeavored to get him to act as his attorney and adviser, had proposed to lease the quarry to insolvent persons for the purpose of being relieved of liability, and finally had told the plaintiff that he would find a way to operate the quarry without liability; and that he leased the quarry to the Faragher Engineering Company. The defendant was absent from the state from May, 1906, to October, 1907.

At the conclusion of the evidence, the defendant moved for judgment of nonsuit, upon the ground that the operation of the mine up to the time the Faragher Company began work was with the consent of the plaintiff, and that the defendant was not responsible for the acts of Faragher Company, which was overruled, and the defendant excepted.

The defendant tendered the following issues, which his honor declined to submit, and the defendant excepted:

"(1) Was the plaintiff's property injured by the willful and wanton acts and negligence of the defendant prior to August 4, 1906, as alleged in the complaint?

"(2) If so, what actual damages is plaintiff entitled to recover?

"(3) Is plaintiff entitled to recover punitive damages on account of said willful and wanton acts and negligence, and, if so, how much?

"(4) Was the cause of action, if any, of plaintiff against defendant prior to August, 1906, barred by the statute of limitations at the date of the commencement of this action?

"(5) Was plaintiff's property injured by the willful and wanton acts and negligence of the Faragher Engineering Company, as alleged in the complaint, after August 4, 1906?

"(6) Is the defendant liable to plaintiff for the willful and wanton acts and negligence of the Faragher Engineering Company, as alleged in the complaint?

"(7) If so, what actual damage is plaintiff entitled to recover?

"(8) Is plaintiff entitled to recover from the defendant punitive damages on account of the willful and wanton acts of the Faragher Engineering Company, alleged in the complaint?

"(9) If so, how much?"

The court adopted the following issues, to which defendant excepted:

"(1) Was the plaintiff, John P. Arthur, damaged by the negligent, wrongful, and unlawful acts of the defendant, Phillip S. Henry, as alleged in the complaint?

"(2) What amount of damages by way of compensation for such acts committed after 4th of March, 1905, if any, is the plaintiff entitled to recover?

"(3) Were such acts done by the defendant wantonly and willfully and in reckless and wanton disregard of the plaintiff's rights?

"(4) What amount of punitive damages, if any, is the plaintiff entitled to recover for such acts committed after the 4th of March?"

The defendant requested the court to instruct the jury as follows, which request the court refused, except as stated:

"(1) There is no evidence in the case to justify the awarding by the jury of punitive or exemplary damages for any of the alleged acts of the defendant committed prior to August 4, 1906.

"(2) Punitive or exemplary damages cannot be recovered by plaintiff against defendant for any acts of the Faragher Engineering Company, alleged in the complaint.

"(3) There is no evidence in the case of malice or wantonness toward plaintiff on the part of the defendant.

"(4) There is no evidence in the case that any of the alleged acts of the defendant were willful.

"(5) There is no evidence in the case to fix any liability upon defendant for any of the acts alleged against the Faragher Engineering Company, or for damages or injuries done defendant by said company.

"(6) If the jury shall find from the evidence in the case that the defendant conducted his blasting operation with the consent of the plaintiff, the plaintiff cannot recover damages against the defendant.

"(7) If the jury shall find from the evidence in the case that plaintiff from time to time in the progress of the quarrying operations of defendant, alleged in the complaint, requested defendant to continue his work and not to stop on his (plaintiff's) account, and defendant did continue until notified by plaintiff to desist and cease to carry on said operations, and the defendant, upon receipt of such notice, did desist and cease, the plaintiff cannot recover damages on account of injuries to his property resulting from said operations." The court modified this instruction by adding thereto the following: "Provided due care was exercised in the conduct of such operations." As modified, the said instruction was given.

"(8) That the cause of action of plaintiff for damage and injury to the plaintiff's trees and shrubbery, if any was done by the defendant, was barred by the statute of limitations when this action was begun.

"(9) There is no evidence that the plaintiff sustained any personal injury or injury to his health by any operations of defendant or his lessee."

There are also exceptions to evidence and to parts of the charge.

The jury answered all the issues in favor of the plaintiff, and from a judgment thereon the defendants appealed.

Jas. H. Merrimon and J. G. Merrimon, for appellants. Locke Craig, Jones & Williams, and Martin & Wright, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. There are 43 exceptions in the record, all of which may be considered under the following propositions:

(1) Is there evidence which justified submitting the case to the jury?

(2) Is there evidence upon which the defendant can be held liable for the acts of Faragher Company?

(3) Is there any evidence of wanton or malicious conduct on the part of the defendant which will support an award of punitive damages?

(4) Did the plaintiff consent to the operations of the defendant, and, if so, does such consent absolve him from liability?

(5) Does the evidence of the plaintiff that he claimed no damages prior to August, 1906, prevent a recovery of other damages, not barred by the statute of limitations?

(6) Is there error in refusing the issues tendered by the defendant, or in submitting those passed on by the jury?

(7) Is the plaintiff's cause of action, or any part thereof, barred by the statute of limitations?

Eliminating for the present the effect of consent by the plaintiff to the operations of the defendant, and also the plea of the statute of limitations, it is well to consider the first three propositions together, as much of the evidence bears on all of them, and it is also advisable to determine in the outset how far, if at all, the defendant is liable for the conduct of the Faragher Company.

[1] It is in evidence that, prior to the lease to the Faragher Company, the defendant had been operating his quarry; that blasting was necessary in the work he was doing; that he had thrown stones on the premises of the plaintiff; that complaint had been made, and he had been told of the danger to the plaintiff; and that the lease to the Faragher Company was for the purpose of having these operations continued. It is also in evidence that the quarry was within the corporate limits of the city of Asheville, and that there were several homes, including that of the plaintiff, near to it.

This evidence, if accepted by the jury, brings the case within the doctrine of Hunter v. Railroad, 152 N. C. 688, 68 S. E. 237, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 851, 136 Am. St. Rep. 854, in which the defendant began blasting on its right of way for a lawful purpose, and, after notice of danger to the plaintiff, entered into an agreement with another to do the work in the same way, under a contract which, by its terms, would establish the relation of independent contractor, and it was held that the defendant was liable for the acts of the contractor.

In Thomas v. L. Co., 153 N. C. 358, 69 S. E. 275, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 584, Justice Manning reviews the cases holding that one cannot escape liability by entering into an independent contract, if the work to be done is intrinsically dangerous, and says, with reference to the Hunter Case, supra: "In Hunter's Case, this court ruled that the work there handed over to the independent contractor to be done, to wit, blasting of rock, fell within the established exception to the rule of nonliability, by reason of its dangerous character."

These decisions were the result of the unanimous opinion of the court, and on their authority we must hold that the work to be done was of such character that the defendant could not protect himself by the lease he made, and that he is liable for the acts of the Faragher Company in the prosecution of the work.

If so, all the evidence as to the operation of the quarry may be considered in determining whether there was sufficient evidence to be submitted to the jury.

[2, 3] The plaintiff was entitled to recover damages, if the defendant threw stones upon his land without his consent, and, if he consented to the use of the quarry, he could also recover if the work was negligently done.

As we are not now considering the effect of consent on the part of the plaintiff, the question then arises: Was there evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant or Faragher Company?

[4] There was evidence that by the use of proper precautions there would be no danger to the plaintiff's property, and that persons 400 or 500 yards away would not be disturbed by the noises more than by ordinary traffic. There was also evidence that the precautions used were not sufficient; that the defendant used for smothering the blasts six small pine logs; that stones were showered on the premises of the plaintiff, and fell around the house the plaintiff and his sister were living in; that one stone as large as an ordinary letter box came over the house and shattered the limbs of a tree in front of the house; that stones fell on the sheds on the premises; and that grapevines and fruit trees were destroyed. There was also evidence that one of the blasters employed at the quarry was reckless, and that another said, just before a blast, that he was going to shell the town, and that when he fired the blast rocks and stones flew everywhere. This was, in our opinion, ample evidence of negligence.

[5] There was much evidence to the contrary, tending to prove that diligence was exercised by the defendant, and that he was careful to avoid injury to the plaintiff; but it is not within our province to pass on the credibility of the witnesses.

If there was evidence of negligence for the consideration of the jury, was there any view of the case in which the question of punitive damages could be submitted to them?

[6] If there was evidence that the acts of the defendant evinced a reckless indifference to the rights of the plaintiff, that they were done wantonly, or from a bad motive, punitive damages could be awarded.

[7] There was evidence that the defendant knew that the operation of the quarry was dangerous, and that it was injurious to the property of the plaintiff; that he had tried to buy the plaintiff's property; that complaints had been made to him from time to time, and he had promised to correct the trouble; that he had endeavored to secure the services of the plaintiff to draw a contract for him with other persons, by which he would escape liability; that he had proposed to lease the quarry to insolvent persons for this purpose; that he had threatened the plaintiff, saying he was going to operate a power house all night; that the plaintiff told him that he would have him indicted, and he replied that he would find a way by which he could use the quarry without incurring any liability to the plaintiff; that within a few months he leased the quarry to the Faragher Company for the purpose of having it operated, in which lease there was no stipulation for prudent management, or that any precautions should be taken to protect the property of the plaintiff, but it was provided therein that said company would save the defendant harmless from any and all actions or claims for damages of all kind, character, or description caused by any operations, conduct, or work in, at, and upon the said quarries, by, through, and with its servants, agents, and employes, and would prosecute any and all actions necessary for the full, complete, and ample protection of the defendant against such claims; and that while the quarry was operated by the Faragher Company conditions were worse than before.

There was also evidence on the part of the defendant directly contradicting the evidence of the plaintiff, and tending to prove that he had treated the plaintiff at all times with neighborly consideration; that he had always discontinued the operations when the plaintiff asked him to do so; that he never resumed the operation of the quarry unless requested to do so by the plaintiff; that he made the lease to the Faragher Engineering Company in good faith and for the purpose of carrying out works of public improvement; that the Faragher Engineering Company was capable of carrying on these operations in an inoffensive manner; that Mr. Odell, the engineer of the Faragher Engineering Company, was an engineer of ability and knew how to carry on these operations without offense; and that it would be contrary to all the intercourse between the plaintiff and the defendant to find that the defendant had been actuated by the sinister motive of wishing to injure the plaintiff by this lease.

These were matters for the jury, and at least furnished some evidence that the defendant was recklessly indifferent to the rights of the plaintiff.

[8, 9] If there was evidence of negligence and wantonness on the part of the Faragher Company, the conversation of the plaintiff with the defendant in 1904, as to the operation of a quarry near him, the letter of February 16, 1906, and the rock which fell on the house of the plaintiff in 1904, were competent as tending to fix the defendant with notice of the danger to the plaintiff's property at the time of the lease to the Faragher Company, and, whenever punitive damages may be awarded, evidence of the financial condition of the defendant is admissible in behalf of the plaintiff (Tucker v. Winders, 130 N. C. 147, 41 S. E. 8), and his honor carefully restricted the evidence to these purposes.

This brings us to the consideration of the evidence tending to show consent on the part of the plaintiff, and it must be remembered that the defendant has at all times denied that there was negligence in the operation of the quarry, and that his contention is that the plaintiff consented for him to work the quarry, and not for him to work it negligently.

There is evidence of such consent, but it is coupled with the condition that the quarry must not threaten injury to life or property, and the question was properly submitted to the jury, as follows: "If the jury shall find from the evidence in the case that the plaintiff, from time to time, in the progress of the quarrying operations of defendant, alleged in the complaint, requested defendant to continue his work and not to stop on his (plaintiff's) account, and defendant did continue until notified by the plaintiff to desist and cease to carry on said operations, and the defendant, upon the receipt of such notice, did desist and cease, the plaintiff cannot recover damages on account of injuries to his property resulting from said operations, provided due care was exercised in the conduct of such operations, but a request of the plaintiff to the defendant not to cease and discontinue his work on those premises will not be construed by the law to authorize the defendant to conduct these operations in a negligent or in an obviously dangerous manner, and if you find from the evidence that the operations of the defendant in this quarry and this stone crusher, during the period covered by your inquiry, were at the instance and express suggestion of the plaintiff, and you further find that these operations were conducted with due care, and that there was no other or further injury to the property of the plaintiff than was necessarily involved in the operation of the quarry, then the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover. But if you find that the operations were negligently carried on, and that unnecessary injury was done to the property of the plaintiff, the fact of the plaintiff's request or suggestion would not deprive him of the right to recover here."

[10] Nor did the statement of the plaintiff on the witness stand that he claimed no damages prior to August 4, 1906, prevent an inquiry as to all damages not barred by the statute of limitations. It is a statement which ought to have had weight with the jury; but it does not amount to a retraxit, and as a contract there is no mutuality and no consideration.

[11] The issues adopted by the court were sufficient to present all the contentions of the parties, and they arose on the pleadings, and, when this is true, the refusal to submit other issues is not error.

[12] Nor do we find any error as to the statute of limitations. The action was commenced on the 4th day of August, 1909, and it was admitted that the defendant was absent from the state continuously for 17 months, from May 22, 1906, and his honor told the jury they could not award damages for acts done prior to three years before the commencement of the action, excluding from the computation the time the defendant was absent from the state, which is in accord with the statute. Rev. 1905, § 386.

[13] His honor might with propriety have given the ninth prayer for instruction as a cautionary measure; but he was not compelled to do so, as there was no evidence of injury to the health or person of the plaintiff, and there is no suggestion in the record that he claimed damages on that account, and the charge permits no recovery except for injury to property.

We have examined the record with care, and have considered all the exceptions, and find no error.

No error.

ARTHUR v. HENRY.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 20, 1911.)

DAMAGES (§ 52*)—TRIAL—PHYSICAL INJURY.

One may not recover damages for fright unaccompanied by physical injury; but, where one is frightened to such an extent that he suffers physical pain and is made sick, the wrongdoer is liable provided the fright brought about by his negligence was the proximate cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. § 100; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; Webb, Judge.

Action by Fanny V. Arthur against P. S. Henry. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

James H. Merrimon and James G. Merrimon, for appellant. Locke Craig, Martin & Wright, and Jones & Williams, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. The evidence in this case and the questions presented are practically identical with those in the case of John P. Arthur v. Henry, 73 S. E. 206, at this term, except in that case the plaintiff was seeking to recover damages for injury to his property, compensatory and punitive, while in this the plaintiff, who is a sister of John P. Arthur and lived in the house with him, sues to recover damages for injury to her health. In this action punitive damages were not awarded.

There was evidence which, if accepted by the jury, established the fact that the plaintiff was made sick and suffered in body and mind, as the result of the operations of the defendant and of the Faragher Company, for whose acts the defendant was liable, and his honor was careful to exclude the idea that the plaintiff could recover for fright unaccompanied by physical injury. He said to the jury: "That mere fright is not actionable. Because a man or woman gets frightened at something, it is not actionable. If you find that the plaintiff in this cause was frightened, that she was put in fear, the court charges you that that is not actionable; but if you find that she was put in fear and frightened to such an extent that she suffered physical pain, suffered in body and mind, and was made sick, and that such fright and fear was brought about by the negligence of the defendant and was its proximate cause, then the law says it is actionable. If you find the defendant was guilty of negligence, and that rocks fell about the house, and that thereby she was put in fear or frightened, but if you find that she was not made sick by reason of such fright, but her sickness was caused by other causes, that her sickness came from some other cause, and that she was not made sick by reason of this fright, and that she was made sick by some other cause than the fright, she could not recover. As I have said, mere fright is not actionable, but if she was put in fear by reason of rocks falling around, if you find they did so fall, and she became sick, and that the sickness was the immediate result of the fright, that the sickness followed from the fright, and that, had it not been for such fright and fear, the sickness would not have come, then it is actionable; but, if it did not flow directly from that, she would not be entitled to recover. Or if you find that she was not put in fear and not frightened, and not made sick by the negligence of the defendant, if such acts were negligent, then she would not be entitled to recover. If you find that she was consulted and that she consented that they might go on with the blasting, on condition that they would come and give her notice before the blasts were set off, and that they did give her notice, then the court charges you that she could not recover."

This follows the principle announced in Kimberly v. Howland, 143 N. C. 398, 55 S. E. 778, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 545, which has been affirmed at this term in May v. Tel. Co., 72 S. E. 1059.

RITTER LUMBER CO. v. MOFFITT.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 20, 1911.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 273*)—EXCEPTIONS—SCOPE.

An exception to the whole charge on a certain issue which contains several distinct propositions, and which does not point out the errors complained of, will not be considered on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 273; * Trial, Cent. Dig. § 694.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Macon County; Cline, Judge.

Action by the Ritter Lumber Company against George W. Moffitt. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The plaintiff alleges in its complaint that on the 2d day of May, 1908, the defendant executed his five notes, by which he promised to pay the plaintiff, in the aggregate, $987.84, and that on the same day he executed certain chattel mortgages to secure the payment of the same. The defendant in his answer admits the execution of the notes and mortgages, and alleges, by way of counterclaim, that he and the plaintiff had entered into a logging contract, which the plaintiff had failed to perform, and that he had been damaged thereby. Separate issues were submitted to the jury on the items of damage alleged in the answer, all of which were answered in favor of the defendant, except the third as to reskidding logs.

The allegation of the answer in reference to reskidding is as follows: "(2) And that the said plaintiff agreed with this defendant to keep the tramroads running and to remove all logs as fast as they were skidded, and this the said plaintiff failed and refused to do, so that this defendant was compelled to reskid about 1,000,000 feet of logs, to his great damage, to wit, in the sum of $750." And the parts of the written contract relating thereto are: "The said party of the first part (Moffitt) agrees to cut all of said trees and timber into mill lengths of twelve, fourteen, and sixteen feet long, allowing on each log four inches to square the lumber, and will deliver the same at such place on the double-deck skidways along the tram as may be designated by the said party of the second part (the Lumber Company). The trees and timber cut and delivered as aforesaid shall be inspected and measured according to 'Lumberman's Favorite Log Scale Rule,' and all logs shall be measured at the small end, under the bark, narrow diameter, and all logs shall be delivered on the tramroad skidways, which are to be double-deck skidways, and shall be scaled at the mill."

The defendant, among other things, testified: That he and the plaintiff executed the contract set out, and attached to and made a part of the defendant's answer, and that this was the only written contract about the transaction. That, pursuant to the terms of said contract, he commenced to build skidways along the line of tramway mentioned in said contract, the tramroad not being built at that time, but had been definitely marked out and surveyed and pegs placed along the line of survey. That he built 100 or more skidways along the line of the tramway that had been surveyed. That some of the skidways were double decked and some single decked. He admitted it was his duty to construct the skidways provided for in the contract, upon which the logs were to be delivered.

He further testified that, independent of the written contract, the defendant agreed to have the logs removed to the mill as fast as the defendant put them on the skids, and thus keep the skidways clear, and that it failed to do so, and that the skidways were consequently filled up with logs, and defendant was compelled to drag about 1,000,000 feet of the logs into the vicinity of the skidways and leave them there, and then, when the skidways were cleared of logs, defendant was obliged to take his hands and cattle back and reskid this 1,000,000 feet or hire other parties to do this for him; that is to say, to put these logs on the skidways in position to be loaded on the tram cars, and that this necessitated an additional expense of 50 cents a thousand to the defendant to reskid this 1,000,000 feet, or a total of $500, which the plaintiff had not paid him for.

From a judgment rendered in accordance with the issues, the defendant appealed.

J. Frank Ray and Robertson & Benbow, for appellant. Johnston & Horn and L. C. Bell, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. There are seven exceptions in the record, all of which are formal, except three to parts of the charge.

The first of these must be disregarded, because it is to the whole charge on the third issue, which covers 3½ pages of the printed record, and contains several distinct propositions, and the errors complained of are not pointed out. Gwaltney v. Assur. Co., 132 N. C. 929, 44 S. E. 659.

The second is to the part of the charge on the third issue, as follows: "The defendant obligated himself in this contract to skid logs, and on double-deck skids, along the skidways over the tram, and, as the court thinks, there is nothing in the written contract in regard to the time when the logs would be taken off the skidways by the lumber company; and so I charge you that, nothing else appearing, the defendant could not recover anything under this issue." An examination of the contract shows that there is no stipulation requiring the plaintiff to move the logs from the skidway in any particular time, and, if the defendant relied on the contract alone, there could be no recovery on this item of damage, as stated by his honor, as the evidence shows that the defendant did not rely upon the position that under the contract the plaintiff could not unreasonably delay the removal of the logs, but on an independent agreement between him and the plaintiff. This question was submitted to the jury under proper instructions.

The third exception is to the statement of the contentions of the parties, all of which arose on the evidence.

Upon an examination of the whole record, it appears to us that the case has been tried impartially, and that there is no error.

No error.

(157 N. C. 449)

BEARD v. TAYLOR.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 20, 1911.)

DEEDS (§ 38*)—DESCRIPTION—SUFFICIENCY—INDEFINITENESS.

A deed, issued at an execution sale, called for a tract, owned by the debtor (naming him), "containing about 11 acres, where he now lives, excepting three acres including house and barn—which was allotted him as his homestead the remaining eight acres or so much thereof as may be necessary to satisfy said execution." Held, that the deed was void for indefiniteness, in that it could not be said what part of the eight-acre tract was intended to be conveyed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 65-79; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Swain County; Webb, Judge.

Action by T. G. Beard against W. M. Taylor. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The entire case on appeal is as follows: "This is an action of ejectment against Taylor, the judgment debtor, by Beard, judgment creditor, the grantee of the purchaser at the execution sale. The court submitted the fourth issue, set out in the record, and charged upon the same as follows: 'The court charges you that, if you believe all the evidence in this case, you will answer the fourth issue, "No."' The court is of the opinion, and so charges you, that the description in that deed from the sheriff to the party under whom the plaintiff claims is so vague and insufficient that it does not convey any property at all, or any part thereof. So the court charges you that, if you believe all the evidence, you will answer the fourth issue, "No."' To this charge the plaintiff, Beard, excepts, or, to be more specific, to the part: 'The court charges you that, if you believe all the evidence in this case, you will answer the fourth issue, "No."' Also to the part: 'The court is of the opinion, and so charges you, that the description in that deed from the sheriff to the party under whom the plaintiff claims is so vague and insufficient that it does not convey any property at all, or any part thereof.' The plaintiff, Beard, excepts to that part of the judgment in this action on said fourth issue declaring that plaintiff is not the owner of the 11 acres, or any part thereof."

The following statement appears in the record: "Calls of Sheriff's Deed of 11-Acre Tract. Also another tract of land, owned by W. M. Taylor, containing about 11 acres, where he now lives, excepting three acres including house and barn—which was allotted him as his homestead the remaining eight acres or so much thereof as may be necessary to satisfy said execution."

There was a judgment in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff excepted and appealed.

F. C. Fisher, for appellant. Bryson & Black, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. The case on appeal does not disclose what evidence was introduced on the trial, nor does it set out or identify the deed referred to, and as the action of the judge is presumed to be correct we must affirm the judgment. If, however, the exception is intended to present the correctness of a ruling by the judge that the description under the heading, "Calls of sheriff's deed for 11-acre tract," is void for uncertainty, we would hold that there is no error. If the description had stopped at the word "homestead," it would have been sufficient, but the additional clause makes it impossible to say what part of the eight acres is intended to be conveyed.

Cathey v. Lumber Co., 151 N. C. 592, 66 S. E. 580, is in point. In that case the grantor attempted to convey 324 acres, part of a tract of land of 724 acres, and it was held that no title passed; the court saying: "The deed under which defendant claims does not purport to convey the whole of a described tract of land, but only a certain number of acres thereof, to wit, '324 acres of land, part of a certain tract of land composed of Nos. 3044, 3097, and 3098, in Graham county.' The boundaries of the entire tract, from which the 324 acres are to be taken, are set out with exactness, and the entire tract, as stated in the deed, contains 724 acres. The deed furnishes no means by which the 324 acres can be identified and set apart, nor does the instrument refer to something extrinsic to it, by which those acres may be located. It is self-evident that a certain part of the whole cannot be set apart, unless the part can be in some way identified. Therefore, where a grantor undertakes to convey a part of a tract of land, his conveyance must itself furnish the means by which the part can be located; otherwise his deed is void, for it is elementary that every deed of conveyance must set forth a subject-matter, either certain within itself, or capable of being made certain by recurrence to something extrinsic, to which the deed refers."

The judgment must be affirmed.

No error.

STATE v. CORPENING.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 20, 1911.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 409*)—EVIDENCE.

The part of a letter which contained severable and distinct admissions by accused tending to show guilt were admissible in evidence, though the remaining part was lost or destroyed; distinct parts of a writing containing admissions favorable to the offering party being admissible in evidence, leaving the other party to put the remaining part of the document in evidence if it explains or qualifies the admission.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 719*)—TRIAL—IMPROPER ARGUMENT.

It was error for the state's attorney, in a seduction case, to read to the jury the facts in a similar case in an adjoining county, relied upon as supporting prosecutrix's evidence, and to state to the jury that a jury in the other county had convicted in that case, and that the supporting evidence was much stronger in the present case than in the other case, though the state's attorney may properly state the facts of the decisions relied upon by him to the extent of applying the law of such decisions to the instant case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 719.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Macon County; Webb, Judge.

Will Corpening was convicted of seduction, and he appeals. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

Defendant assigned as error the fact appearing of record that, with other letters, complete in form and tending to establish guilt, the court, over defendant's objection, admitted a portion of a letter containing relevant admissions of defendant, the remaining portions of the letter having been lost or destroyed; that the plaintiff's attorney, over defendant's objections, was allowed to make improper use of the facts of another case in his argument to the jury.

HOKE, J. [1] The portion of the letter admitted in evidence contained severable and distinct declarations or admissions tending to establish guilt on the part of the defendant, and, in our opinion, the same were properly received in evidence.

The portion of the letter which remained afforded the best evidence of the admissions contained in it, and apart from this admissions of this character are not ordinarily considered to be within the best evidence rule. McKelvey on Evidence, p. 94. It is sometimes said that, when an admission appears in a writing, the whole instrument, or so much of it as relates to the matter embraced in the admissions, must be read; but this must be taken with some qualification, and a party may always offer a distinct and severable portion of a writing, containing declarations or admissions of his adversary which tend to establish his position, leaving to that other the right to put such remaining portions in evidence which may serve to explain or qualify the admission. 1 Ency. of Evidence, pp. 385, 609, and note 50, p. 610; Rouse v. Whited, 25 N. Y. 170, 82 Am. Dec. 337; Cramer v. Gregg, 40 Ill. App. 442; Jones v. Fort, 36 Ala. 449; 1 Elliott on Evidence, § 241, p. 349.

In this last citation, it is said: "Every admission is to be taken as an entirety of the fact which makes for the one side, with the qualifications which limit, modify, or destroy its effect on the other side. Thus, as is already shown, where part of a statement or document is introduced as an admission by and against a party, or even part of a conversation or correspondence is so used, he is entitled to introduce such other part thereof, if any, as modifies or explains the alleged admission. Indeed, there is some authority to the effect that the party offering the evidence as an admission must put in the entire conversation or document, but the better rule is that, while he may do so, it is generally sufficient for him to introduce such part as he desires to use, at least where it appears complete in itself, and nothing more appears to be necessary in order to understand it."

[2] We think, however, there must be a new trial of this cause, by reason of improper user of the facts in another prosecution for like offense, which had taken place in an adjoining county the preceding year. State v. Maloney, 154 N. C. 200, 69 S. E. 786. As we understand the record, the counsel for the prosecution read the facts in Maloney's Case, relied upon as supporting evidence to the prosecutrix, and, over defendant's objection, was allowed by the court to say in effect that a jury of Jackson county had convicted Maloney, and the supporting evidence was much stronger "than in Maloney's Case," etc. True, we have held that under our statute attorneys are allowed to argue the whole case to the jury, both as to the law and the facts, and they are permitted to state the facts of the decision relied upon to the extent of applying the law of such case to the one being tried. Harrington v. Wadesboro, 153 N. C. 439, 69 S. E. 399. It is also true that on perusal of the entire statement the solicitor for the state, capable and conscientious as he is, was evidently using the facts of Maloney's Case to sustain his position that there was evidence, as required by the statute, in support of the testimony of the prosecutrix; but we are of opinion, as stated, that in the faithful effort to discharge his duty he exceeded the rule which should prevail in such cases by using the facts in Maloney's Case, and the action of another jury upon them, in aid of the prosecution here.

For the error in allowing the argument to proceed, the cause must be submitted to another jury, and it is so ordered.

New trial.

BRAZILLE v. CAROLINA BARYTES CO.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 20, 1911.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 474*)—OPINIONS—MENTAL CAPACITY.

On an issue of plaintiff's mental capacity when he signed a release of a claim against defendant for personal injury his wife was properly permitted to give her opinion as to his mental incapacity at that time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2196-2219; Dec. Dig. § 474.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 67*)—PRESUMPTIONS—CONTINUATION OF MENTAL CONDITION.

One suing for personal injury, though found to have been incompetent to sign a release of claim therefor on December 23, 1909, through physical and mental suffering, is not presumed to have so far remained in that condition as to affect his right to maintain the action in October, 1911.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 87, 88, 103; Dec. Dig. § 67.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 296*)—INJURY TO EMPLOYÉ — INSTRUCTIONS — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

In an employé's personal injury action, an instruction that, if he was negligent in any degree, and this was the proximate cause of his injury, he could not recover was properly refused, as tending to confuse the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1180-1194; Dec. Dig. § 296.*]

5. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 296*)—BLASTING OPERATIONS—INJURY TO EMPLOYÉ—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for injury to an inexperienced employé while tamping dynamite in a hole for blasting, an instruction requested by defendant that, if the accident was caused by the manner in which the hole was loaded, defendant was not negligent was properly modified by requiring a finding that the way adopted was not a reasonably safe way of loading.

9. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 219*)—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—BLASTING OPERATIONS.

Use of an iron tamping rod by an employe in a blasting operation will not prevent him from recovering for injury resulting therefrom, unless the apparent danger was so great that its assumption would amount to a reckless indifference to probable consequences.

12. COSTS (§ 256*)—UNNECESSARY RECORDS—TAXATION.

Under Supreme Court rule 22 (140 N. C. 661, 66 S. Appeal from Superior Court, Madison County; Lane, Judge.

Action by Charles Brazille against the Carolina Barytes Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Martin & Wright, for appellant. Guy V. Roberts, W. W. Zachary, and Moore & Rollins, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries. The plaintiff alleges that the company furnished him and other employes iron tamping rods, to be used in tamping dynamite, and while so being used the iron tamping rods caused an explosion which seriously and permanently injured the plaintiff. He further alleges that in a few days after his return from the hospital, and while blind and suffering in mind and body from said injuries, and mentally incompetent and incapable of transacting any business, the defendant company, by fraud and false representation, secured his signature to an alleged release. The defendant denied that the release was procured by fraud, and alleged that the plaintiff was competent to transact business at the time it was signed. There was evidence that the plaintiff was an inexperienced miner, and did not know the danger of using the iron tamping rods; that the defendant knew that it was highly dangerous to allow its employes to use them, but decided to take the risk, as the company could get along faster and do more work. The jury found, in response to the 13 issues submitted to it, that the plaintiff was injured by the negligence of the defendant company; that he was not guilty of contributory negligence; that he did not assume the risk; that he was not injured by the negligence of a fellow servant; that the plaintiff did not have sufficient mental capacity to execute the release; that the defendant had knowledge of plaintiff's mental incapacity; that the release was obtained by fraud and fraudulent representation; and that the amount ($372) paid the plaintiff at the time he signed the release was not a fair and reasonable consideration, and assessed the plaintiff's damages at $4,850.

[1] The first exception is because the plaintiff's wife was allowed to testify as to his mental incapacity the day he signed the release. This was competent. Stewart v. Stewart, 155 N. C. 341, 71 S. E. 808; Clary v. Clary, 24 N. C. 78; Whitaker v. Hamilton, 126 N. C. 466, 35 S. E. 815; Horah v. Knox, 87 N. C. 485; Bost v. Bost, 87 N. C. 479.

Exception 2, for refusal of the motion to nonsuit, cannot be sustained.

[2] Exception 3 is because the court did not set aside the verdict upon the motion of the defendant, on the ground that, the jury having found the plaintiff mentally incompetent when he signed the release, and he having failed to allege and prove sanity since, he could not bring this action. If there was estoppel, it was upon the defendant, who had alleged in its answer that the plaintiff had mental capacity. It is true the jury found that the plaintiff was incompetent to sign the release December 23, 1909, by reason of his physical and mental suffering at that time, caused by his injuries; but there was no presumption that such suffering, with the consequent mental and physical inability to attend to business, continued down to the time of the trial in October, 1911.

Exception 4 was because the court signed judgment upon the verdict.

[3] Exception 5 is because the court refused to instruct the jury that if "the plaintiff was negligent in any degree and this was the proximate cause of his injury they will answer the tenth issue 'yes.'" An instruction that if the plaintiff was "negligent in any degree" would simply confuse the jury and has been condemned in ——— v.

———, at this term. Beach, Con. Neg. §§ 21-26; Thompson, Negligence, §§ 170-172, and 267; 7 A. & E. Enc. 383. The court properly refused to instruct the jury that if they believed the evidence to answer the tenth issue "yes" and also in refusing to instruct the jury to make the same response if the plaintiff knew the danger of using an iron tamping rod. These are the 6th and 7th exceptions. In lieu of them the instruction of the court on these propositions was in accordance with our precedents.

[4] The 8th, 12th and 18th exceptions are because the court refused to instruct the jury to answer the issue as to fraud in obtaining the release in the negative. There was evidence tending to show fraud which was sufficient if believed by the jury to justify the finding of the issue in the affirmative. Among them was the evidence that the plaintiff's wife and brother were not permitted to be present in the office when the release was signed but were left outside in the cold; that the release was executed in a few days after the plaintiff left the hospital, and while he was suffering great pain and mental anxiety occasioned by his injuries; that plaintiff was ignorant and unable to write, blind, and his hearing badly impaired; that, as he testified, he thought that he was giving a receipt for wages; that he had no friends or counsel to advise him; that the consideration paid was $372, whereas the jury found that $4,850 was reasonable and just compensation. These and other circumstances were sufficient to carry the case to the jury and justify its finding. Hayes v. R. R., 143 N. C. 128, 55 S. E. 437; Dorsett v. Mfg. Co., 131 N. C. 259, 42 S. E. 612; Bean v. R. R., 107 N. C. 746, 12 S. E. 600.

[5] The ninth exception is because the court modified an instruction asked by the defendant, that if the accident was caused by the manner in which the hole was loaded to answer the issue as to the defendant's negligence, "No," by adding, "if this was not a reasonably safe way of loading a hole."

[6] Exception 10 is because the court instructed the jury "that it was the duty of the employers to instruct their employes in the use of dangerous machinery or dynamite before assigning them to such duty." This instruction was proper. Horne v. Railroad, 153 N. C. 239, 69 S. E. 132. Exception 11 was on substantially the same grounds.

[7] Exception 14 is because the court charged the jury that if they found that the consideration paid for the release was grossly inadequate that this was a circumstance which they could consider in passing upon the fourth issue, as to fraud in procuring the release. This charge was in accordance with Dorsett v. Manufacturing Co., 131 N. C. 259, 42 S. E. 612.

[8] Exception 15 is because the court charged the jury: "That, unless you find by the greater weight of the evidence that the plaintiff knew of the great danger in using iron tamping rods, and voluntarily and willingly made up his mind to run the great risk incident to using the same, then you should answer the twelfth issue, 'No.'" This charge is in accordance with Hicks v. Manufacturing Co., 138 N. C. 320, 50 S. E. 703; Lloyd v. Hanes, 126 N. C. 359, 35 S. E. 611.

[9] Exception 16 is because the court charged the jury "that the use of an iron tamping rod, if it was obviously dangerous, will not prevent the plaintiff from recovering for an injury resulting therefrom, unless the apparent danger is so great that its assumption would amount to a reckless indifference to probable consequences." This is practically the language used by the court in Coley v. Railroad, 129 N. C. 411, 40 S. E. 195, 57 L. R. A. 817.

[10] Exception 17 is because the court charged: "That the servant assumed the risk ordinarily incident to his employment, but he does not assume the risk from dangers which arise from the failure of the master to furnish his servant reasonably safe and suitable tools with which to do the work required of him, unless, in the careful performance of the work with the tools furnished, the inherent probabilities of injury are greater than those of safety." The defendant admits that this language is substantially what was said in Hicks v. Manufacturing Co., 138 N. C. 319, 50 S. E. 703.

[11] The eighteenth and last exception is because the court erred in instructing the jury: "Where the master falls in his duty to the injured servant, this failure is the proximate cause of the injury, and the fact that the negligence of a fellow servant also commingles with it as a proximate cause will not exonerate the master from liability." This exception cannot be sustained. Thompson on Negligence, §§ 4856, 4857, 4858.

This court said, in Kornegay v. Railroad, 154 N. C. 392, 70 S. E. 732: "The charge of the court, when properly considered as a whole, was in accordance with the principle settled in the cases just cited. We are not permitted to select detached portions of the charge, even if in themselves subject to criticism, and assign errors as to them, when, if considered with the other portions of the charge, they are readily explained, and the charge in its entirety appears to be correct. Each portion of the charge must be construed with reference to what precedes and follows it."

[12] The defendant excepted at the time of settling the case on appeal, "for that the court, at the instance of the plaintiff, sent up the contentions of the parties as a part of the charge, and put in a large part of the testimony in the form of stenographer's notes, instead of in narrative form." This exception was in accordance with the provisions of rule 22 of this court (140 N. C. 661, 66 S. E. vii), and complies with the repeated decisions thereon. Cressler v. Asheville, 138 N. C. 482, 51 S. E. 53. As there was no point made on the judge's reciting the contention of the parties, and they were not needed to enlighten the court as to any of the exceptions, it was unnecessary to send them up; and it was also improper to send the stenographer's notes up in the form of question and answer, but the evidence should have been stated in narrative form, as we have so often ruled. The unnecessary matter thus sent up we estimate at 40 printed pages, the cost of copying and printing which will be taxed against the appellee, as provided in rule 22. Land Co. v. Jennett, 128 N. C. 3, 37 S. E. 954.

No error.

HERRING et ux. v. WILLIAMS et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 23, 1911.)

1. WILLS (§ 614*)—CONSTRUCTION—ESTATES—DEVISES.

Where a testator gave his wife all his property, real, personal, and mixed, and whatever the same should be at his death, "to have and to hold during her natural life," and at her death, the property, or so much thereof as might be then in her possession, over to another, the wife took only a life estate, subject to a remainder in fee, and hence the wife having conveyed her estate, her grantee was liable for waste committed upon the property during her life.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Dec. Dig. § 614.*]

2. POWERS (§ 33*)—CONSTRUCTION—DEED.

Where a devisee had an estate for life and the power of disposition, her deed to the property, which did not refer to the power, conveyed only her life estate.

Walker and Hoke, JJ., dissenting.

On petition for rehearing. Petition allowed, and former opinion overruled.

For former opinion, see 153 N. C. 231, 69 S. E. 140, 138 Am. St. Rep. 659.

BROWN, J. We have given this case a re-examination, and have been forced to the conclusion that our former construction of the will of the testator Williams was erroneous. The writer holds himself as much responsible for the conclusion reached in the first opinion as if he had written it himself instead of the learned and able judge whose name is prefixed to it. But further examination having convinced us that we were in error, it is our duty to say so, and to hold that the original judgment of his honor, Judge Guion, is correct.

The facts are fully and accurately stated in the first opinion. By reference to the report of the case it will be seen that the defendant Carrie Williams, widow of the testator, executed an ordinary deed in fee to her codefendant Williams, without any reference in the deed whatever to any power conferred by the will. This is an action by the remainderman Bettie Meton or Melton, the feme plaintiff, against Green for waste, damages, etc., for wrongfully cutting all the timber from the land for purposes of sale only.

[1] It is said in the former opinion of the court in this case that "the primary purpose of the courts, when a will is presented for construction, is to ascertain the intention of the testator from the language used by him." And in determining this question the courts hold, as pointed out by Justice Manning, that the rules of construction require that all the words used by the testator shall be given effect, "unless they are in themselves meaningless, or so vaguely expressed a purpose that no definite intention can be inferred, or are plainly inconsistent with an otherwise clearly expressed intention, or are repugnant to some established rule of law." It is in our application of this latter principle to the will presented for construction that we now think we fell into error in the decision of this appeal. We gave to the words "or as much thereof as may be in her possession at the time of her death" an effect, which, after further consideration and investigation of the authorities, we do not think can fairly be sustained. The will of the testator, William R. Williams, contained the following language: "I give, devise and bequeath unto my beloved wife, Carrie Williams, all my property, real and personal and mixed, of what nature or kind so ever, and wherever the same shall be at the time of my death to have and to hold during her natural life, and at the death of my wife, the said Carrie Williams, the said property or as much thereof as may be in her possession at the time of her death is to go to Bettie Meton, her heirs and assigns forever."

In construing this will, we held that the use of the words "or so much thereof as may be in her possession at the time of her death" conferred upon Mrs. Williams a power of disposition and thereby enlarged her life estate into an estate in fee in the event she should exercise such power. Guided now by that cardinal rule for the construction of wills—the intention of the testator—we are of opinion that it was the intention of Mr. Williams to give his wife merely a life estate with remainder to Bettie Metou in fee.

In order to give expression to every word used by the testator, we are not required to hold that the language quoted above refers to real property, but can restrict it to the personality of the testator, and such restriction is sustained by both reason and authority because it avoids inconsistency in the provisions of the will and maintains its integrity. Adopting this construction, we hold that the interest of Mrs. Williams, the wife of the testator, in the real estate is fixed by the specific language of the will "to have and to hold during her natural life."

It is said in American & English Ency. of Law, vol. 30, pp. 737, 738, that: "Where the quantity of the estate is devised definitely and specifically, the rule that a devise coupled with an unlimited power of disposition and control carries an absolute interest in the property has no application, and only a life estate coupled with a power of disposal passes. This power it has been adjudged is only coextensive with the estate which the devisee takes under the will." And the same text contains this statement: "It is clear, however, that by appropriate expressions of intent the power will not refer merely to the life interest of the first taker, but will give him a life estate coupled with a power to dispose of the entire estate absolutely." This latter statement is sustained by Troy v. Troy, 60 N. C. 624, in which property was devised to the wife for life with remainder to testator's son, and the wife was by express terms given power to sell all or any part of the property in the exercise of her judgment, and other expressions in the will indicated a clear intention on the part of the testator to confer upon his wife a general power of disposition and to enlarge the life estate created by the will. Referring to this power Chief Justice Pearson says that it is "a power appurtenant to the life estate, and the estate which may be created by its exercise will take effect out of the life estate as well as out of the remainder." This case is not authority for the contention that the language in the will before us should be so construed as to give Mrs. Williams a general power of disposition and thereby empower her to convey the real property in fee. The intention to confer the power was clearly expressed in Troy v. Troy, and the question of the establishment of such power by implication was not presented. The decisions in other courts are to the effect that the intention to create the power of disposition must clearly appear from the language of the will, and will not be implied from language entirely consistent with the special reference to the life estate, and in that view we concur.

In considering a case in which the testator used the words "the remainder that is left," the Supreme Court of Missouri says: "It is needless to say that an intention clearly expressed in a will should not be defeated, except by some inflexible rule of law or public policy, unless a wholly inconsistent intention is manifest upon reading the entire instrument. This is particularly true when the inconsistency is raised by implication only. The implication to have such effect should be very conclusive." In Wardner v. Baptist Memorial Board, 232 Ill. 613, 83 N. E. 1080, 122 Am. St. Rep. 138, it is held that the use of the words "all that remains of the property" did not manifest an intention to create a power in the life tenant to dispose of the whole estate, the court saying: "It is a general rule in all cases where by the terms of the will there has been an express limitation of an estate to the first taker for life and a limitation over, with general expressions apparently giving the tenant for life an unlimited power over the estate, but which do not in express terms do so, that the power of disposal is only coextensive with the estate which the devisees take under the will, and means such a disposal as the tenant for life could make, unless there are other words clearly showing that a larger power was intended." And in Giles v. Little, 104 U. S. 291, 26 L. Ed. 745, the testator's property, real and personal, was left to his wife with the provision that "if she should marry again, then it is my will that all the estates herein bequeathed, or whatever may remain, shall go to my surviving children, share and share alike." It was contended that there are words in this clause of the will which imply an absolute power of disposition, and give to the children only what may remain undisposed of in the wife's hand at the termination of her estate. "The contention," says Mr. Justice Wood, "rests upon the words 'or whatever may remain,' and is that they imply that a part or all of the estate might be absolutely disposed of by the wife during her widowhood. If the purpose of the testator in the disposition of his property is what the other parts of his will clearly indicate, then these words cannot be construed to change that purpose. They can have operation without giving them that effect. He was seised of real estate and possessed of personal property. Both were included on the devise to the wife, and she was to have the enjoyment of both during her widowhood. The use of many species of personal property necessarily consumes it. The words under consideration may, therefore, fairly be construed to refer to the personality, and the entire clause to give to his children a remainder in the real estate and whatever of the personalty was not consumed, by the widow during widowhood." Smith v. Bell, 6 Pet. 68, 8 L. Ed. 322, and Bramell v. Cole, 136 Mo. 201, 37 S. W. 924, 58 Am. St. Rep. 619, are to the same effect.

The case of Green v. Hewitt, 97 Ill. 113, 37 Am. Rep. 102, strongly supports the views expressed in the foregoing cases. The following language was used by the testator in that case: "I give and bequeath to my beloved wife . . . the farm on which we now reside, . . . also all my personal property of every description, so long as she remains my widow; at the expiration of that time the whole, or whatever remains, to descend to my daughter." It was held that the wife took a mere life estate in the entire gift. The court says: "The misapprehension of the legal effect of the devise doubtless grows out of the use of the expression 'whatever remains' by the testator, in limiting the remainder to his daughter. The use of that expression is of no vital significance, and cannot be permitted to override the clearly expressed intention that the widow should take a life estate only. . . . It had reference to the anticipated condition of the personal estate when it would, under the limitation, pass into his daughter's hands. And this is all the significance the expression has." See, also, Thompson v. Adams, 205 Ill. 552, 69 N. E. 1, a more recent decision by the same court.

In Russell v. Wernitz, 88 Md. 210, 44 Atl. 219, the testator gave the residue of his property to his wife "to hold and dispose of as she may see fit, while she remains single, and at her death or marriage, the remaining property is to be equally divided between my two daughters." The court held that the widow took only a life estate in the real property, with remainder to the daughters, and that she had no power to dispose of the same in fee. "But it is contended," says the court, "that the words 'the remaining property' should be regarded as indicating that the testator intended that the appellant should have the right to diminish the corpus of the estate. But we do not accept this view. The will, evidently, was not drawn by one accustomed to the preparation of such instruments. The words employed were not chosen with regard to their technical meaning. The property that passed under the second item comprehended both realty and personalty. All of it was liable to waste or decay. Some portions of it doubtless would deteriorate by its use, and other articles were of such nature that their use was their consumption. In view of the general and particular intents of the will, it is not straining the construction of these words to regard them as indicating the intention of the testator that his widow should not be accountable for such loss or waste as might result from her personal enjoyment of the property." In Cox v. Sims, 125 Pa. 522, 17

Atl. 465, the testator gave to his wife the residue of his estate for life, and after his death all of said property or "so much as may remain unexpended" to his children. The court in disposing of the appeal said: "We are satisfied that her estate in the lands of the testator is for life, and that she has no power, express or implied, to dispose of any interest therein." A similar ruling was made in Taylor v. Bell, 158 Pa. 651, 28 Atl. 208, 38 Am. St. Rep. 857.

The English cases, which are reviewed by the New Jersey Court of Chancery in Tooker v. Tooker, 71 N. J. Eq. 513, 64 Atl. 806, will be found to sustain our conclusion that the words used in the will before us are not sufficient to create power to dispose of the real property of the testator in fee. Constable v. Bull, 18 L. J. Eq. 302; Bibbens v. Potter, 10 Ch. Div. 733; In re Adams Trust, 11 Jur. N. S. 961.

The view that the language of this will, which it is contended creates a general power of disposition, refers to the personal property that may be in Mrs. Williams' possession at the time of her death, finds direct support in Williams v. Parker, 84 N. C. 90, in which the devise was in the following language: "I give and bequeath to my wife, Polly Williams, and my grand-daughter, Sarah Jane Williams, all my land whereon I now live, and all my personal property of every order, during my wife Polly's lifetime, and at my wife Polly's decease, if there should be any property or money left, then I devise and bequeath," etc. It was held by this court that the property referred to as being left was personal property and did not include the real estate. This case is cited and approved in Brawley v. Collins, 88 N. C. 605, in which the following clause appeared in the will under consideration: "It is my will that all property, money and effects willed by me to my wife, Mary, that may be left at her decease, shall be equally divided between my daughter Betsy, and grandsons, Stephen Brawley and Peter W. Brawley." The plaintiffs, the grandsons referred to in this clause, asserted title to the land in dispute as a limitation in remainder to them and their aunt in equal parts, after the death of the testator's wife, contending that the use of the word "property" included real and personal estate. This court in an opinion by Chief Justice Smith rejected this contention, and held that it was the intention of the testator to limit the scope of the expression "all property, money and effects that may be left at her decease" to personal property. Chief Justice Smith says: "Manifestly as land is not subject to a contingency, since it must, not may, be left when life estate expires, he intended such goods as might be destroyed or consumed by the preceding owner, but in fact are not, but remain for the bequest in remainder to operate on." The court was guided in that case by the intention of the testator, and at the same time all the language of the will was given effect, and we accomplish a similar result in the case before us by holding that the words "or as much thereof as may be in her possession" refer only to personal property, thereby preventing the repugnancy that arises from a construction by which the will is held to create a life estate with remainder over and in the same sentence grants a power by which the life estate may be enlarged into a fee and the remainderman disappointed. As the court says in Brawley v. Collins, supra, our duty is not to inquire what the words may comprehend, but what do they signify, and in what sense are they used by the testator, and, "when this is satisfactorily ascertained from an inspection and comparison of the several provisions of the instrument, the construction must be adopted which carries out the intent."

We have not deemed it necessary to review the authorities cited in our former opinion. Many of them will be found to fall within one of two classes, both of which are readily distinguishable from our case: First, cases in which there is a devise for life with language which expressly gives the devisee a general power to dispose of both real and personal property; and, second, cases in which the devise is not limited to a life estate, but the property is devised absolutely with a provision that what remains at the death of the devisee shall go to certain designated persons. The cases of Troy v. Troy, supra, and Parks v. Robinson, 138 N. C. 269, 50 S. E. 649, fall within the first class. There is a point made by the plaintiff, which we overlooked, which seems to us to be conclusive of her right to recover damages as against defendant Green.

[2] If we should concede that the language of the will should be so construed as to confer upon Mrs. Williams the power to dispose of the real property, such construction would not defeat the plaintiff's right to recover in this action against her grantee Green. The deed to the defendant Green by Mrs. Williams does not purport to have been made in the exercise of the power of disposition; it contains no reference whatever to such power, and, upon a well-settled principle of law in this court, the deed could not convey an estate in fee. The will, by language that is unequivocal, gives Mrs. Williams a life estate in her husband's property, real, personal, and mixed, and her deed, in the absence of any reference to the power of disposition, which she claims is conferred by the will, is held to convey only her life estate. "When the donee of a power to sell has an estate of her own in the property affected by the power, and makes a conveyance of the property without reference to the power, the construction established by the decisions is that she intends to convey only what she might rightfully convey without the power." Towles v. Fisher, 77 N. C. 440; Exum v. Baker, 118 N. C. 545, 24 S. E. 351. And

"the intention to execute the power must be apparent and clear, so that the transaction is not fairly susceptible of any other interpretation; and if it be doubtful under all the circumstances, that doubt will prevent it from being deemed an execution of the power." Carraway v. Moseley, 152 N. C. 353, 67 S. E. 765. We are of opinion, therefore, that it was properly held in the court below that the deed from Mrs. Williams to the defendant Green conveyed only her life estate.

In view of the fact that this opinion affirms the judgment of the superior court in favor of the plaintiff, we have examined the other exceptions in the record and find that they are without merit. It was not necessary to consider them when the case was originally before the court because the main question was decided in favor of the defendant who brought the appeal to this court. Petition allowed.

ALLEN, J. (concurring). Petitions to rehear, except as to the time of filing, are regulated by rules adopted by this court, and not by statute, because a statute cannot be suspended, and a rule may be, if the justice of the cause requires it. They are for convenience and to aid in the attainment of justice, and not to perpetuate a wrong. If, therefore, I come to the conclusion that a decision of this court is erroneous, and that it unjustly deprives a citizen of his property, I shall favor a reversal of the decision, although no fact has been overlooked, and no new authority can be found. Entertaining this view, I feel that it is proper for me to consider the questions presented by the petition, and in the outset it is well to state the facts.

In August, 1902, W. R. Williams died, seized in fee of the land in controversy and of a town lot, leaving a will, in which he disposed of his property as follows: "I give, devise and bequeath unto my beloved wife, Carrie Williams, all my property, real and personal and mixed, of what nature or kind soever, and wheresoever the same shall be at the time of my death, to have and to hold during her natural life, and at the death of my wife, the said Carrie Williams, the said property or as much thereof as may be in her possession at the time of her death, is to go to Bettie Meton, her heirs and assigns forever. And I do nominate, constitute and appoint my said wife the sole executrix of this my last will and testament, hereby revoking and making void all and every other will or wills at any time heretofore made by me, and do declare this my last Will and Testament." Shortly thereafter the devisee, Carrie Williams, executed a deed to the defendant Green, her brother-in-law, purporting to convey the town lot in consideration of $700, which the defendant alleges in his answer he paid to her, and on February 23, 1903, she purported to convey to said defendant in fee the tract of land in controversy in exchange for a town lot conveyed to her in fee. The deed to the defendant does not refer to any power conferred by the will, and the only consideration to support it is the execution of the deed to her in exchange therefor.

W. R. Williams and wife had no children, and Bettie Melton, now Bettie Herring, is their foster child, reared by them since she was ten weeks old. It is true that the intention of the testator should be gathered from the will and the attendant circumstances, but it should be clear and unmistakable before it is held that one who takes a life estate under the will can, within six months after the death of the testator, sell one of the two pieces of land devised, and hold and use the money, and can exchange the other for other land and own that in fee simple, and thereby defeat the interest of the remainderman.

I concur in the construction placed upon the will in the opinion of Mr. Justice BROWN, but if, by any interpretation, a power of disposition is conferred on the life tenant as to the land, it could only be exercised when necessary for support and maintenance, which does not appear here. The testator gave to his wife a life estate in the land and personal property, and to his foster child an estate in remainder, and he must have intended both to take effect. He appointed his wife executrix, and knew his personal property would be in her possession, and he also knew that it might be consumed or destroyed, and that in all probability some of it might not be in her possession at her death, and it seems to me that a reasonable construction of the language "or as much thereof as may be in her possession at the time of her death," is that it refers to the personalty. When there are found two species of property, the one technically and precisely answering the description in the devise, and the other not so exactly answering that description, the latter will be excluded. Bolick v. Bolick, 23 N. C. 248. I will not undertake to review the authorities supporting this view, as they are stated with clearness and accuracy in the opinion of the court. I also think it was necessary for the deed to refer to the power.

It is said in Kent, vol. 4, p. 335: "The general rule of construction, both as to deeds and wills, is that if there be an interest and a power existing together in the person, over the same subject, and an act be done without a particular reference to the power, it will be applied to the interest and not to the power"—and this is cited with approval in Exum v. Baker, 118 N. C. 545, 24 S. E. 351. The case of Towles v. Fisher, 77 N. C. 438, is, I think, a direct authority on this point. In the case under consideration all the property, real, personal, and mixed, is devised to Carrie Williams for life, and at her death the said property, or so much thereof as may be in her possession at the time of her death, is given to Bettie Melton. Carrie Williams attempted to convey to the defendant in fee.

In the Towles Case, William Shaw devised his land to his wife for life, and he devised to James Callum and Mary Callum "on the death of his wife," all the property, real and personal, belonging to his estate, which may be in possession at the time of her death. There was a codicil providing that sales should be made with the consent of the executors. The wife attempted to convey in fee without the consent of the executors, and without reference to the power. After holding that the deed was not valid because the executors did not consent thereto, the court says: "In addition to this, when the donee of a power to sell has an estate of her own in the property affected by the power, and makes a conveyance of the property without reference to the power, the construction established by the decisions is that she intends to convey only what she might rightfully convey without the power. These doctrines are so generally accepted that we think no reference to the authorities is necessary. They may be found cited in the brief of the counsel for the plaintiff. The deed to Primrose conveyed only the life estate of Priscilla Shaw." The rule seems to be well established, and it seems to me to be meaningless if it be said, that when one, who owns an interest with a power of disposition, conveys more than he owns, without reference to the power, that the conveyance will be referred to the power.

If, however, these views are not sound, and by correct construction the wife took a life estate under the will, with the power to sell the land, I still think the deed to the defendant is not good, because I do not think an exchange of lands was contemplated, or that it would be a valid execution of the power for the life tenant to convey the land devised to her for life to her brother-in-law in fee, and receive in exchange therefor a deed in fee for another tract of land.

WALKER, J. (dissenting). This court has repeatedly held, and with decided emphasis, that the weightiest considerations demand that the court should adhere to its former decision in a case, where it was made with unanimity and after full argument and consideration (Lewis v. Rountree, 81 N. C. 20; Ashe v. Gray, 90 N. C. 137); and it will not on petition, however earnestly and zealously pressed by counsel, re-examine the same authorities and reconsider the same course of reasoning in order to reverse its previous ruling (Dupree v. Insurance Co., 93 N. C. 237; Hannon v. Grizzard, 99 N. C. 161, 6 S. E. 93). No case ought to be reheard upon petition unless it was decided hastily and some material point was overlooked, or some direct and controlling authority was not called to the attention of the court and was overlooked by it. Watson v. Dodd, 72 N. C.

240; Hicks v. Skinner, 72 N. C. 1; Devereux v. Devereux, 81 N. C. 12; Haywood v. Daves, 81 N. C. 8. In Weisel v. Cobb, 122 N. C. 67, 30 S. E. 312, it was said that "rehearings of our decisions are granted only in exceptional cases, as the highest principles of public policy favor a finality of litigation, and even when granted, every presumption is in favor of the judgment of the court already rendered," and, further, that where neither the record nor the briefs on the rehearing of a case disclose anything that was not apparently considered at the first hearing, the judgment will not be disturbed. The present Chief Justice, in Elmore v. Railroad, 131 N. C. 576, 42 S. E. 989, strongly and earnestly inveighed against the prevalent and increasing tendency to ask for rehearings, and stated what he thought should be the invariable rule, and the one established by more than a hundred decisions of this court, that the purpose of a rehearing is not to consider the same facts, briefs, and authorities used on the former hearing. With all possible deference, I assert that we are doing that very thing now, as the sequel will show. Nothing was brought forward on the rehearing but what we heard and knew before, viz., that there is some conflict in the authorities, but I do not think that I take much risk in stating that the great weight of authority in this country, if not in England, favors the judgment formerly rendered by this court. The case was thoroughly and carefully considered by us, and it is manifest, from the opinion delivered by Justice Manning—one of the ablest and most learned, one of the most diligent and painstaking and exhaustive in investigation, of the judges who have ever sat in this court—that no authority of importance was overlooked or disregarded. It is only a question now, as will be seen, whether we should follow our own decisions and the majority of the courts, or the minority of them. It may be remarked generally, and in limine, that the cases cited in the opinion now filed, as supporting the decision, have no application to the special facts of this case, but were rendered upon a state of facts substantially different. Consider the case of Giles v. Little, 104 U. S. 291, 26 L. Ed. 745, the principal one relied on in the opinion of the court, and we find that there was personal property of a kind which would be consumed by its use and where the expression "whatever may remain" is used in a limitation over, it was held as restricted to the consumable personal property, such as crops and provisions, and this testator had none of this sort. But even this view is rejected by some of the other courts, as not only changing the words, but as defeating the clearly expressed intention of the testator. In those cases where it is held that the jus disponendi is confined to the life estate given by the will, it appeared that there was no limitation over, and the language and nature of the devise required such a construction. A very few courts, confounding cases like ours with cases of that kind, have been misled into holding that where the general right to dispose of the property is given to the life tenant, with a limitation over of what remains, it is restricted to the life estate and does not extend to the fee. The fallacy of this reasoning is apparent when we consider that the life tenant has, by law, the right to dispose of the life estate, and did not require any authority or power from the testator to do so, and such a ruling makes the words as to the disposal useless and inoperative, contrary to the rule that we must sustain the will as a whole, giving effect to every part of it. The testator having devised the life estate, could not unreasonably restrict the right to dispose of it, which is a legal incident of it, and why should we say that he intended to give that right which she already had, rather than that which would be of some use and benefit to her? Why should we practically strike out words, rather than give them the only meaning they could reasonably have? The first and great rule in the exposition of wills, to which all other rules must yield, is that the intention of the testator, expressed in his will, shall prevail, provided it be consistent with the rules of law. Smith v. Bell, 6 Pet. 68, 8 L. Ed. 322. And in seeking for the intention of the testator as to the construction or interpretation that should be placed upon ambiguous terms or clauses in a will, the relation of the parties, the nature and situation of the subject-matter, the purpose of the instrument and the motives which might reasonably be supposed to influence him in the disposition of his property, may properly be considered. Smith v. Bell, supra; 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 21; 17 Cyc. 673, and cases cited in each. In this case it appears that the testator owned the land, which was sold to the defendant, John H. Green, and a mule and wagon, and, perhaps, a cart, things not consumed in their use. He gives, devises, and bequeaths all his property, real, personal, and mixed, of every kind, to his wife during her life, and at her death, the property, or as much thereof as may then be in her possession, to Bettie Melton. It is evident from the words used that the testator intended to give his widow the same use and benefit of all his property. There is nothing in this will or in the character and condition of his estate, or the state of his family, which authorizes the construction that he intended to restrict the words of limitation over to the personalty or the consumable part thereof, any more than to the real property, for his words are, "the said property (that is, real, personal, and mixed) or as much thereof (that is, the same property just described, it being the only meaning of this adverb), as may be in her possession at the time of her death, is to go to Bettie Melton." Is that not the only natural and reasonable construction of his language? He had the undoubted right to give her a life estate with the general power of disposal, and how more clearly could he have expressed such a purpose? When he says "the said property," or as much thereof as may be in her possession," how can we say that he did not mean all of the property, though he said so, but only a part? Suppose, as here, he had no consumable property, by which she could support herself, such as crops or provisions, and she had no funds with which to make the other property available for her support and maintenance, must she starve for the want of power under the will to convert what he did give her into productive or consumable property? Was it intended by the testator to give his widow, who was entirely dependent upon his bounty, a stone when she needed bread? He must be supposed to have understood the situation and to have provided for her with reference to it. The plaintiff's own witness, F. G. Ward, testified, that the property was "in such shape" that she could not make a living upon it, or it seemed to him that way. Any construction that prevents her from disposing of all the property would lead to the conclusion that her husband intended to give her something which, instead of being a benefit, would be a burden to her.

It was held in Hemingway v. Hemingway, 22 Conn. 462, that the word "possessed" denotes ownership and not merely personal or corporeal occupation. When the testator limited over the property—real, personal, and mixed—"in her possession at the time of her death," he clearly meant such as she had not disposed of by sale or otherwise, for property which was in her actual possession, and under her control, would go to the remainderman anyhow. It is better and safer to give effect to the words of the testator, and all of them, according to their natural sense and their accepted meaning, than to surmise that while he expressed himself broadly and comprehensively in favor of his dependent wife, so that his gift to her could take effect beneficially, he did not mean it, but something else that favors a remainderman, who was not his child, or even a blood relation, so far as appears. The first object of his care and bounty, it would seem, must be less considered than the second, so that the latter may enjoy the substantial benefit of the gift. The language of the court in Clark v. Middlesworth, 82 Ind. 240, in construing a testamentary clause substantially like this one, is very significant in this connection: "We think it quite clear that the will of A. B. Clark gave to his widow, Mary A. Clark, a life estate in said lot, and that it also gave her, by the clearest implication, a power to dispose of the same. The words 'and at her death, should anything remain,' are senseless and without meaning unless the testator intended that the tenant for life might, prior to her death, dispose of the property devised to her for life. The words show that he must have contemplated this at the time, and therefore have intended it." And so are the words of Justice Connor in Parks v. Robinson, 138 N. C. 269, 50 S. E. 649: "To restrict the power of disposal of her life estate would be to nullify its effect. She had such power incident to her life estate. To confine the power of disposal to such life estate would do violence to the rule of construction that every word used by the testator should be given force." That was held to be law by this court, contrary to some of the authorities cited in support of the impending ruling, and, too, where there was no ulterior limitation. How much more does the construction now placed upon this will neutralize their meaning, if it does not literally excise the words used by the testator to express his desire in respect to his wife, who needed his help far more than the feme plaintiff. It has the effect of reading out of the will something that we would expect him instinctively to put into it, and reading into it something that it would be unnatural for him to have willed, considering the admitted facts and circumstances. The difference between a gift for life with a power of disposal, express or implied, and without an ulterior limitation, and one with such a limitation, is stated in 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. pp. 737, 738, which is quoted by the court in its opinion. In the latter case, the estate is for life, and the remainder will take effect, as to all property not disposed of, and as to this, the fee passes to the purchaser, the same as if the property had been given in fee, instead of for life, to the devisee and legatee. In other words, as said by Judge Pearson in Troy v. Troy, 60 N. C. (Hinsdale Ed.) 624, "the power is appurtenant to the life estate; and the estate created by its exercise will take effect out of the life estate, as well as out of the remainder." But it is useless to continue the argument in favor of the correctness of our former decision, as it is so fully sustained by cases decided by courts of the highest authority, whose opinions are respected and followed everywhere, and by text-writers. "Although a devise be expressly for life of a devisee, yet if the devisee be, by other clauses of the will, permitted to use and dispose of the subject absolutely at his pleasure, or if so much as may remain undisposed of by him at his death (which implies a power of unqualified disposition) be given over at his decease, the devisee is construed, by a necessary implication of the testator's intention, to take a fee simple." 2 Minor's Insts. 969, 970. So in Madden v. Madden, 29 Va. 377, in an able and exhaustive review of the cases on the subject, it was ruled to be settled law that, "Whenever there is an interest given, coupled with an absolute power of disposition in respect to all property of every description, real and personal, the first taker would have the absolute property, and that there was no disinction between a case of a gift for life, with a power of disposition added, and a gift to one indefinitely, with a superadded power to dispose of by deed or will." In Farish v. Wayman, 91 Va. 430, 21 S. E. 810, the estate was to Agnes Redd for life, with this provision: "Should she die without leaving a child, in that case the property or what remains of the same, to go to Nancy Massie"—and it was held that she could dispose of it absolutely in fee, the court saying: "This language cannot be reasonably construed otherwise than that the devisee under it has not only the power to use this property, but to consume it, if she will. The gift over at her death of what 'may remain of the same' shows that the testator intended, notwithstanding the direction that the property was to be held by the trustees named, during her natural life, that she should have the power to dispose of, consume, or spend it in her lifetime, which she could only do by being invested with the fee simple. What might remain of the same was all that was to go over. The language forcibly implies an unlimited and unqualified power of disposition. The devisee could acquire no greater estate, nor exercise greater power over it. To put any restriction upon her absolute dominion over it, would be to say that the whole, or some part of it, should go over to second taker, when the will expressly says that only 'what may remain of the same' shall pass to the second taker." To the same effect is Clark v. Middlesworth, 82 Ind. 240, in which the testator gave all his real and personal estate to his wife for life, and at her death, if anything remained, the same to be divided among his heirs at law. The same court followed this decision in Silvers v. Canary, 109 Ind. 267, 9 N. E. 904, where the clause of the will was substantially like that we are construing in this case. It was held that the wife, to whom the real and personal property were given for her life, had power to convey the fee in the land, and might do so without referring to the will. It seems to me that the reasoning in Paine v. Barnes, 100 Mass. 470, is directly applicable to this case. The property willed was real and personal, and the court said that, upon the authorities, the meaning of the phrase, "if anything should remain in connection with the devise of a remainder of real property after an estate for life," would imply a power to convey, as otherwise there could be no reason for the doubt whether the estate would remain. There are many other cases of the same purport, but as a number of them are reviewed in the former opinion of the court, it is not necessary to comment upon them. It seems to me also that this case may be distinguished from those cited in the opinion of the court by the fact that the testator uses the word "possessed" or "in her possession," thereby necessarily implying, not as the word "remain" or "remaining" may, perhaps, be construed, that she might dispose of some, if not all of the property, real and personal, and it might not, at her death, be "in her possession"; that is, owned and held by her. I do not find that word used in any will construed in the cases on this subject.

If I were at liberty to discuss the evidence to be found in the record, the intention of the testator, as it was adjudged to be at the former hearing, would be made manifest. Williams v. Parker, 84 N. C. 90, and Brawley v. Collins, 88 N. C. 605, have no bearing at all upon the question in this case. They only decide that "personal property" was intended, where the word "property" was used, because of the association of the latter with other words which clearly indicated such a purpose, and in Brawley v. Collins, Chief Justice Smith said that the word "property" would embrace all kinds—real and personal and mixed—unless its meaning is restricted by the context; citing Foster v. Craig, 22 N. C. 209. The words in this will are more indicative of a purpose to include all kinds of property, real, personal, and mixed, for those very words are used, and they are followed by these: "The said property or as much thereof as may be in her possession at the time of her death." The word "property," as thus used, manifestly refers to the kind just above enumerated, and this interpretation is directly warranted by what is said in the cases just cited. So that they are authorities, in my judgment, against the present conclusion of the court. Each case must be determined by its own facts. Where, therefore, it appears from the context of the will under construction that the testator, in using the word "property," referred to both kinds—real and personal—the word, as this court said, must have that meaning. That is our case exactly. If the words of the will, when considered with the context, or with the circumstances surrounding the testator, at the time it was written, show that he must have intended to include real estate in the term "property," it must have that meaning, and this should be so even though there are consumable things. I may be permitted to add to the authorities above cited the recent case of Underwood v. Cave, 176 Mo. 1, 75 S. W. 451, decided by one of the ablest courts of the Union, and in which I find the following: "It is my will that the property, real and personal, hereby bequeathed to my wife, shall be hers absolutely during her natural life, to use and enjoy as she may see proper, and at her death, if there should be anything left, my will is that it be vested and applied to the use of the Lone Jack Baptist Church, used as may be thought most conducive to the advancement of the Christian religion." It was held that the wife took a life estate, with superadded power to dispose of the fee, and that the exercise of the power by her cut out the remainderman. So in Burford v. Aldridge, 165 Mo. 419, 63 S. W. 109, 65 S. W. 720, we find a still stronger authority and a case more like ours. The clause of the will was as follows: "I will, devise, and bequeath to my beloved wife, Sarah, all of my property, personal, real and mixed, that may be left after paying the above bequests, to use and manage as she may deem best as long as she may live; and at her death, I desire and so will, that what may be left of my estate after her death shall be divided equally between my two brothers, Emsley Wharton and John G. Wharton, and my sister Eliza Plummer, and my brother-in-law D. W. Burford." In commenting on this language in the will, Judge Valliant says: "But under this will the widow was entitled to consume as much of the estate as she desired, the body as well as the product. And on the other hand, if she lived within the rents and interest and left a surplus of that, there is at least room for contention that such surplus would not have gone to her administrator on her death, but to the remainderman under the will. Therefore, whilst she was in a sense a trustee of the property for the use of the remaindermen, yet she had a very substantial interest in it, and the remaindermen could not call her to account or restrict her in amount in what she chose to expend for her own gratification, even though it consumed the whole estate, as long as good faith was preserved." "If we seek admittance into the family circle and learn the relations and feelings of the testator towards each of the beneficiaries of his bounty," and follow the controlling rule in the construction of wills, to which all technical rules should give way, and give effect to the true intention of the testator, as the same may be gathered from the whole instrument, if not violative of some established rule of law, and in arriving at that intention, if we take into account the relation of the testator, not only, as we have said, his relations to the beneficiaries, but also the conditions and circumstances surrounding him at the time of the execution of his will, reading it, as near as may be, from his standpoint, and giving full effect, if possible, to every clause and portion of it, we cannot conclude otherwise than that he intended his wife to be the first object of his bounty and to provide for her a comfortable and sufficient support, without hampering her in the use and enjoyment of the property, but allowing her to deal with it, in her own way, as her necessities might require, and leaving only what might be left of it to the remainderman.

It is said, though, that there was error in the former decision, because we overlooked the fact that the deed to Green did not refer to the will or the power. This is a misapprehension as to the nature of this power of disposal. "It has repeatedly been held that where a person having power to convey the fee-simple estate, and also having a life estate or other interest, executed a conveyance of the fee, the deed will be referred to the execution of the power (or jus disponendi), because otherwise it cannot take full effect according to its terms." 31 Cyc. 1125. The case referred to in the opinion of the court is presented where there is an estate which is coupled with a power disconnected therewith, in which the donee has no beneficial interest. In such a case it will be presumed that the deed is intended to pass the interest and not to execute the power, unless the latter is in some way referred to in it. Besides, in this case, we are dealing with the jus disponendi, and not with a technical power, or a naked power of appointment. The case of Grace v. Perry, 197 Mo. 550, 95 S. W. 875, is directly in point and holds that no reference to the will was necessary to constitute a good and valid exercise of the power. See, also, Underwood v. Cave, supra.

It is suggested that Towles v. Fisher, 77 N. C. 437, is an authority for the position that the deed of the testator's widow conveys only a life estate, because it does not refer to the power contained in the will. That case is in perfect accord with the law, as I have before stated it to be. In Towles v. Fisher, the testator conferred upon his wife, Priscilla, the power of appointment to "charitable or religious" uses, and, by a codicil, the power to sell and dispose of any part of the land by and with the consent and advice of his executors, and the court very correctly held that it was necessary to have the consent of the executors and to refer to the power in her deed, for otherwise it would only pass the life estate. But it cannot be successfully argued from the construction of the provision of that will that a reference to the will in her deed was required in order to a valid exercise of Mrs. Williams' right of alienation or jus disponendi, for that is what it is and all that it is. If we hold otherwise, it seems to me, with all due deference, that we will be out of line with the controlling authorities upon the subject, both text-writers and cases. But it is very evident from the language of the court in Towles v. Fisher that the words "all the property, real and personal, belonging to my estate, which may be in her possession at the time of her decease (shall go over) and be equally divided between James and Mary Callum," would have conferred upon his wife, Priscilla, the absolute right of alienation in fee, but for the other provisions which are inconsistent with the existence of such a right and which are not in the will of W. B. Williams, the testator in this case. It would not have been necessary, in order to meet the contention of the plaintiffs in that case, to have referred to the express and inconsistent power given by the will to be exercised only with the consent of the executors, if the court had thought that she did not have the right of disposal under the words of the will which we have quoted. The clear inference from the course of Justice Rodman's reasoning is that such words would confer the right to sell and convey in fee; otherwise he would have sufficiently answered the argument of the plaintiffs by simply stating that it did not, irrespective of any other clauses of the will.

We have not adverted to the fact, which was mentioned in our former opinion, that this is an action of waste, alleged to have been committed on the land devised, and is not one for the recovery of the tract of land which was received by the widow in exchange, or as the consideration for the land she conveyed. Surely the testator did not intend to subject her to an action for waste.

My conclusion is that the former decision, being right, should be approved, and that the petition should be dismissed.

ROGERS v. WHITING MFG. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 20, 1911.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 101, 102*)—MASTER'S DUTY—SAFE PLACE OF WORK.

An employer is required to exercise reasonable care to provide a reasonably safe place of work for his employes, especially where they work about machinery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 179; Dec. Dig. §§ 101, 102.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 105*)—MASTER'S DUTY—SAFE APPLIANCES—CUSTOM.

An employer is bound to exercise reasonable care to furnish such reasonably safe machinery and appliances suitable for the work as are approved and in general use in similar plants.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 185-191; Dec. Dig. § 105.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 270*)—INJURIES—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—USAGE IN OTHER PLANTS.

In a woodworking employe's action for injuries while operating a lathe, claimed to have been caused by failure to furnish a guard over the saws to prevent them from throwing back splinters, evidence that guards were in general use on similar machines was admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 921; Dec. Dig. § 270.*]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 286*)—INJURIES—JURY QUESTION—NEGLIGENCE.

In an action for injuries while operating a lathe caused by failure to furnish a guard over the saws, evidence held to make it a jury question whether defendant was negligent in not so guarding the saws.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 1028; Dec. Dig. § 286.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 253*)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

In a mill employe's action for personal injuries by failure to furnish a guard or shield over saws to prevent their throwing splinters, a requested charge that, even if the jury find that a mill in each of two states named and one in each of two other places named had machines to which saw shields were attached, that was not sufficient to show a general custom, was properly refused, where a witness testified that he had seen nine different mills in which such guards were used.

6. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 121*)—INJURIES—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

If the flying of a splinter from a saw injuring an employe was caused by the absence of a shield over the saw, and failure to provide a shield was a want of reasonable care by the employer, he would be liable for the injuries.

Appeal from Superior Court, Graham County; Cline, Judge.

Action by A. C. Rogers against the Whiting Manufacturing Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Davis & Davis, for appellant. Morphew & Phillips, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. This is an action for damages for an injury sustained while operating a lathe machine for the defendant. The plaintiff contended that the proximate cause of his injury was the failure of the defendant to furnish a guard or shield to go over the saws to prevent their throwing splinters and pieces of wood back, by reason of which defect the plaintiff was injured.

[1, 2] It is settled law in this state "that an employer of labor to assist in the operation of railways, mills, and other plants where the machinery is more or less complicated, and more especially where driven by mechanical power, is required to provide for the employes in the exercise of proper care a reasonably safe place to work and supply them with machinery, implements, and appliances reasonably safe and suitable for the work in which they are engaged and such as are approved and in general use in plants and places of like kind and character." Hicks v. Mfg. Co., 138 N. C. 325, 50 S. E. 703, citing Witsell v. Railroad, 120 N. C. 557, 27 S. E. 125, and Marks v. Cotton Mills, 135 N. C. 287, 47 S. E. 432, and which is itself cited and approved in Helms v. Waste Co., 151 N. C. 372, 66 S. E. 312.

[3] The first nine of the defendant's exceptions are to the introduction of evidence tending to show that guards or shields were in general use in machines of like character or kinds. But such evidence is competent, and in this case it was shown that the witnesses had seen nine different mills in which such guards were in use.

[4] This was sufficient to justify the court in leaving it to the jury to find whether the defendant had been guilty of negligence in not having a protection of this kind, and it was not error to refuse a prayer: "Even if the jury shall find a mill in Georgia, one in Tennessee, one in Andrews, and one in Swain county has machines upon which were shields or hoods, this is not sufficient to show a general custom."

[5] The prayer was properly refused, for the evidence was there were at least nine mills as to which the evidence showed use of these shields over saws, though it is true that as to some of them the lathe machines were not in use in a sawmill, as was the case here; but that was immaterial.

[6] Nor was it error to refuse the defendant's prayer to charge that "unless the plaintiff has shown by the greater weight of evidence that these hoods or shields were in general use, the jury could not consider as proximate cause any injury caused by a chip flying out and striking the plaintiff." If the flying out of the chip was caused by the absence of the shield or hood, and the jury should further find that this would have been prevented by the use of the shield or hood, and the failure to provide such was want of reasonable care on the part of the defendant, it would be liable. Mason v. Railroad, 111 N. C. 482, 16 S. E. 898, 18 L. R. A. 845, 32 Am. St. Rep. 814.

[7] The defendant in his brief restricts himself to the first 10 assignments of error, thus under the rule abandoning the others, which hence need not be discussed. This case, in its general features, resembles Sims v. Lindsay, 122 N. C. 678, 30 S. E. 19, which has been often cited. See notes in Anno. Ed. No error.

LUDWICK et al. v. PENNY et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 23, 1911.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 739*)—ESTOPPEL—DEFENSES.

Revisal 1905, § 570, provides that, in an action to recover the possession of personal property, a judgment for plaintiff may be for possession or for the value thereof if delivery cannot be had, and for damages for detention, and, if defendant claims a return of the property, judgment for defendant may be for a return or for its value, with damages for the taking and withholding. Plaintiffs, in a former suit against them by defendant to recover personally in which the property was taken under claim and delivery, only counterclaimed for the conversion of their property. Held, that plaintiffs were not estopped by the judgment in their favor from suing for damages for wrongfully suing out the claim and delivery proceedings and levying process upon the property, since, under the statute, plaintiffs, even if they had claimed them, could not have recovered such damages in the other action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1267; Dec. Dig. § 739.*]

2. JUDGMENT (§ 540*)—"RES JUDICATA."

The rule of res judicata is based upon the idea that there should be an end of litigation, as well as upon the maxim that one should not be twice vexed for the same cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1079; Dec. Dig. § 540.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 7, pp. 6126-6130; vol. 8, pp. 7786, 7787.]

3. JUDGMENT (§ 713*)—RES JUDICATA.

While a judgment is conclusive upon matters raised by the pleadings or which might have been properly adjudicated thereunder, it is not conclusive as to causes of action which plaintiff might have joined, but which were not, in fact, joined or included in the pleadings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 1234-1241; Dec. Dig. § 713.*]

4. PROCESS (§ 168*)—"ABUSE OF PROCESS"—"MALICIOUS PROSECUTION."

There is a clear distinction between the malicious prosecution of an action so as to interfere with another's property or business, and the malicious abuse of process, which is the willful and wrongful use of the process itself, and does not require a termination of the suit in which the process issued to be available as a cause of action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Process, Cent. Dig. § 257; Dec. Dig. § 168.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 1, p. 50; vol. 5, pp. 4309-4310.]

5. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 34*)—RIGHT OF ACTION.

Since the malicious prosecution must have terminated before an action for damages therefor will lie, a cause of action for maliciously instituting an action to recover property, supported by claim and delivery proceedings for the purpose of destroying defendant's business, could not be set up as a counterclaim or otherwise by defendant in such action itself.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. § 70; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

6. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 47*)—ALLEGATIONS OF COMPLAINT.

The complaint alleged that plaintiffs were engaged in the restaurant business and paid a sum to defendant which was due him from the person from whom they purchased the business, defendant agreeing at the time that the property was free from liens, but that he afterwards was "guilty of abuse of process, in that he wrongfully, unlawfully, and maliciously instituted * * * a civil action and seized the property * * * by claim and delivery proceedings, and thereby took advantage of plaintiff's inability to give a bond, deprived them of the opportunity of carrying on their business"; that, by reason of the wrongful conduct of defendant "in prosecuting the said action," he caused valuable goods to become worthless; that, when defendant began "the civil action" against plaintiffs, he caused their property to be seized under claim, and delivery proceedings, knowing that it was free from incumbrance, and that he instituted "said civil action" and seized plaintiffs' property willfully to coerce plaintiffs to pay him money, and that, by reason of "the abuse of the process sued out against plaintiff" and the wrongful and malicious conduct aforesaid, plaintiffs were damaged, etc. Held, that the complaint alleged a cause of action for the malicious prosecution of a civil action, and an interference with the property by claim and delivery proceedings, and not merely for the malicious abuse of process.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. §§ 91, 92; Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

7. PLEADING (§ 84*)—CONSTRUCTION—LIBERAL CONSTRUCTION.

Pleadings are liberally construed, and plaintiff will be permitted to recover according to his allegations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 66-75; Dec. Dig. § 84.*]

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 232*)—PRESENTATION BELOW.

A party cannot rely on appeal on a different ground of objection to evidence than that stated below.

Brown, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Guilford County; Daniels, Judge.

Action by O. J. Ludwick and another against George T. Penny and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 152 N. C. 375, 67 S. E. 919.

The complaint was as follows:

"The plaintiffs, complaining of the defendant, allege:

"(1) That the plaintiffs were engaged in business in the city of High Point, Guilford county, N. C., up to August 13, 1907, under the partnership name of the Acme Café, and were the owners of property of the value of about $3,800 which they owned and used in connection with their said business, and without which they could not carry on their business.

"(2) That the plaintiffs engaged in business as the Acme Café, and had a large patronage, and were making of their business a financial success.

"(3) That these plaintiffs bought the Acme Café from F. E. Thomas on or about February 28, 1907, and at the time they purchased it they paid to the defendant George T. Penny, on account of certain indebtedness which F. E. Thomas owed him, the sum of $1,500, and the defendant George T. Penny at the time of the payment of the said money, and in consideration thereof, represented to the plaintiffs that the property connected with the Acme Café was free from all liens and incumbrances, and the said George T. Penny agreed in consideration of the payment of said $1,500 to cancel a certain mortgage which had theretofore been executed to him on said property by F. E. Thomas.

"(4) That the defendant was guilty of abuse of process, in that he wrongfully, unlawfully, and maliciously instituted about August 13, 1907, a civil action and seized the property of these plaintiffs by claim and delivery proceedings, and thereby taking advantage of the plaintiffs' inability to give a replevy bond, deprived them of the opportunity of carrying on their business, and completely destroyed the same.

"(5) That by reason of the wrongful, unlawful, and malicious conduct of the defendant in prosecuting the said action against these plaintiffs, and in taking their property from them, thereby depriving them of the opportunity of carrying on their business, the defendant caused valuable perishable property which these plaintiffs had and owned in connection with their said business to spoil and become worthless, to their great damage.

"(6) That at the time the defendant in this action began the civil action against these plaintiffs, to wit, on or about August 13, 1907, and at the time he caused the property of these plaintiffs to be seized under claim and delivery proceedings, he knew that the plaintiffs did not owe him any amount whatsoever, and that the property of these plaintiffs was free from any and all incumbrances to him, and was not subject to be rightfully taken under claim and delivery proceedings.

"(7) That, as these plaintiffs are informed and believe, the defendant George T. Penny instituted said civil action against them and caused their property to be seized as aforesaid, wantonly, recklessly, and willfully, for the purpose of unlawfully coercing the plaintiffs to pay him money which they did not owe.

"(8) That by reason of the abuse of the process sued out against plaintiffs by defendant, and the wrongful, unlawful, and malicious conduct of the defendant as aforesaid, these plaintiffs sustained and are entitled to recover of the defendant the sum of $4,000 actual damages.

"(9) That by reason of the wrongful, reckless, wanton, and malicious abuse of process by the defendant issued against the plaintiff, and the wrongful conversion thereby of the property of the plaintiff to the use of the defendant as above alleged, these plaintiffs are entitled to recover of the defendant the sum of $4,000 as punitive damages."

T. J. Gold and King & Kimball, for appellants. Justice & Broadhurst, for appellees.

WALKER, J. Plaintiffs brought this action to recover damages for unlawfully and maliciously suing out process and levying upon plaintiffs' property, thereby breaking up and destroying their business. Defendant had previously sued the plaintiffs for the recovery of the property, and under claim and delivery proceedings had seized the same. That suit was decided in favor of the defendants for the reason hereinafter stated. The defendant held a note and a mortgage on the property to secure the same, which was executed by one Thomas to Penny. The property was afterwards sold by Thomas to the plaintiffs Ludwick & Bame, who undertook to pay the note secured by the mortgage. They alleged that, by an agreement between all interested parties, and the payment of $1,500, the debt and mortgage had been satisfied, when Penny brought his suit against them. The jury so found in that action, and further found, in answer to issues submitted to them, that the value of the property sold and unsold by Penny was $2,500. The court thereupon adjudged that the defendants in that suit, Ludwick & Bame, recover of the plaintiff Geo. T. Penny the sum of $750, the value of the property which had been sold, and the costs of the action, and also the sum of $1,800, the value of the unsold property, as found by the jury, but as to the latter sum ($1,800) a stay of execution was ordered, so that the plaintiff Penny might have the opportunity to redeliver the unsold property. The defendants in that action, Ludwick & Bame, set up a counterclaim for the unlawful and wrongful conversion of their property by Penny, and for nothing more.

[1] The defendant in this action Geo. T. Penny pleads that the plaintiffs are estopped by the judgment in the action of Penny v. Ludwick & Bame to claim any damages for "breaking up and destroying their business by unlawfully and maliciously suing out process of claim and delivery and seizing their property, as that question was directly involved in the former suit." We do not adopt this view of the matter. The jury found in this case that "the defendant Geo. T. Penny had unlawfully, willfully, wrongfully, wantonly, recklessly, and maliciously sued out the process of the court in the case of Penny v. Ludwick & Bame, as alleged in the complaint," which was equivalent to saying that Penny, knowing that he had no cause of action against the defendants in that suit, Ludwick & Bame, had wrongfully, maliciously, and wantonly brought the suit and levied upon their property which was used in their business, which, it is alleged, subsequently destroyed it. This matter was not involved in the former suit. Revisal 1905, § 570, provides that in an action to recover the possession of personal property, if the property has been delivered to the plaintiff, and the defendant claims a return thereof, and becomes entitled to it by succeeding in the action, judgment for him shall be for a return of the property, or for the value thereof, in case a return cannot be had, and damages for taking and withholding the same. It is true the defendants in that case set up a counterclaim, but they did not allege any facts which would entitle them to any greater relief than is given to them by Revisal, § 570, and the counterclaim was superfluous pleading. The cause of action alleged in this case was not, therefore, involved in that suit, nor was it at all considered, nor did the defendants therein recover any damages on that account. One valid reason for not estopping the plaintiffs in this action by the judgment in the former suit is that the statute we have cited limits the recovery in the latter to the property or the value thereof, unless, perhaps, the defendants in that suit had set up a counterclaim for more; that is, not only for such damages, but for maliciously breaking up and destroying their business.

The defendant Penny relies upon the following principles, which he says are established by Porter v. Mack, 50 W. Va. 581, 592, 40 S. E. 459, 463, and numerous other authorities cited in the brief of his counsel: "When a person has a cause of action which he may assert by an action ex contractu for the direct damages, or ex delicto for both the direct and indirect damages, if he selects the former, he waives the latter, including all claim for indirect damages. Both actions are regarded as for the same wrong, of which he can have but a single satisfaction, though it in no wise compensates him for the damages sustained." 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. p. 237, note 1; Webb's Pollock on Torts, 658; Kendall v. Stokes, 3 How. 87, 11 L. Ed. 506; Norton v. Doherty, 3 Gray (Mass.) 372, 63 Am. Dec. 758; Ware v. Percival, 61 Me. 391, 14 Am. Rep. 565; Newby v. Caldwell, 54 Iowa, 102, 6 N. W. 154; Wagner v. Wagner, 36 Minn. 239, 30 N. W. 766; Thompson v. Myrick, 24 Minn. 12; Whitney's Adm'r v. Town of Clarendon, 18 Vt. 258, 48 Am. Dec. 150; Smith v. Way, 9 Allen (Mass.) 473. And again: "In all cases where the plaintiff has his option in the outset to bring tort or contract to recover damages for one and the same injury upon a state of facts which will support either, an adjudication in one, whichever he may elect, is, upon principle, a bar to the other." And, further, it is urged by him that "a cause of action and the damages recoverable therefor are an entirety. The party injured must be plaintiff, and must demand all the damages he has suffered or which he will suffer from the injury, grievance, or cause of action of which he complains. He cannot split a cause of action and bring successive suits for parts, because he may not at first be able to prove all the items of the demand, or because all the damages have not been suffered. If he attempts to do so, a recovery in the first suit, though for less than his whole demand, will be a bar to a second action." The principle here asserted in defendant's behalf, as defeating the plaintiffs' right of recovery in this action, finds support in the decisions of this court. Eller v. Railroad, 140 N. C. 140, 52 S. E. 305, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 225; Mast v. Sapp, 140 N. C. 538, 53 S. E. 350, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 379, 111 Am. St. Rep. 864.

The defendant also contends that the court has adopted in such cases as this the following rule: "Where two or more successive actions are identical as to the parties, the alleged cause of action, the defenses relied upon and the relief demanded, a judgment upon the merits in the first action will estop any and all parties from maintaining the subsequent ones. Except in special cases, the plea of res adjudicata applies, not only to points upon which the court was actually required to pronounce judgment, but to every point which properly belonged to the subject of the issue, and which the parties, exercising reasonable diligence, might have brought forward. Under our present system of pleading and practice, a party is conclusively presumed, when sued in a second action on matters before litigated, to have set up in the former action all the equitable defenses of which he might have availed himself to defeat the legal title." Tuttle v. Harrill, 85 N. C. 456; Anderson v. Rainey, 100 N. C. 321, 5 S. E. 182; Buchanan v. Harrington, 152 N. C. 335, 67 S. E. 747, 136 Am. St. Rep. 828; Harper v. Lenoir, 152 N. C. 723, 68 S. E. 228; Wagon Co. v. Byrd, 119 N. C. 460, 26 S. E. 144.

We have no desire to contravene what is thus stated by the authorities, for we believe that, when they are properly considered and understood, it will be found that the principle is correctly formulated by them, and is in itself just and right.

[2] There should be an end of litigation, and this is the fundamental idea upon which the rule of res judicata is founded, and to this may be added, as another reason for the rule, the maxim of the law that no one should be twice vexed for the same cause.

[3] But does this well-settled rule apply to this case? We think not, and the case of Tyler v. Capeheart, 125 N. C. 64, 34 S. E. 108, which explains and defines the doctrine on this question, is decisively against the defendant's contention. It is said in that case that: "A judgment is decisive of the points raised by the pleadings, or which might be properly predicated upon them; but does not embrace any matters which might have been brought into the litigation, or causes of action which the plaintiff might have joined, but which in fact are neither joined nor embraced by the pleadings. Although the present cause of action might have been set up as a second cause of action in the former suit, as it was not, and was not actually litigated, and was not 'such matter as was necessarily involved therein,' the plea of res judicata will not avail." We have seen that our statute confines the recovery in an action for personal property with the ancillary remedy of claim and delivery to the property itself or the value thereof, which, of course, excludes the recovery of any damages for maliciously suing out process and destroying the plaintiff's business, which is a distinct cause of action with a different rule as to the measure of damages. In his treatise on Torts (Vol. 1 [3d Ed.] p. 348), Judge Cooley tells us when an action will lie for the malicious prosecution of a civil suit; and in that connection he says: "So a suit for malicious prosecution will lie where the plaintiff's property or business has been interfered with by the appointment of a receiver, the granting of an injunction, or by writ of replevin." Brownstein v. Sahlein, 65 Hun, 365, 20 N. Y. Supp. 213; McPherson v. Runyon, 41 Minn. 524, 43 N. W. 392, 16 Am. St. Rep. 727. He also says that the same rules apply to actions for malicious civil suits as for criminal prosecutions, and thus states this branch of the rule: "It is laid down or assumed in all the cases that an action for the malicious prosecution of a civil suit is governed by the same principles as one for the malicious prosecution of a criminal action. There must be malice and the want of probable cause and the same rules apply in the proof or disproof of these elements. So the advice of counsel will have the same effect as in case of criminal prosecution, under the same conditions. And the malicious suit must be terminated in favor of the plaintiff in that action." Id. p. 352. Speaking of the malicious abuse of process, he distinguishes it from a malicious civil suit, where there is an interference with property or business, as follows: "If process, either civil or criminal, is willfully made use of for a purpose not justified by the law, this is abuse for which an action will lie. The following are illustrations: Entering a judgment and suing out an attachment for an amount greatly in excess of the debt; causing an arrest for more than is due; levying an execution for an excessive amount; causing an arrest when the party cannot procure bail, and keeping him imprisoned until, by stress thereof, he is compelled to surrender property to which the other is not entitled. In these cases proof of actual malice is not important, except as it may tend to aggravate damages. It is enough that the process was willfully abused to accomplish some unlawful purpose. Two elements are necessary to an action for the malicious abuse of legal process: First, the existence of an ulterior purpose; and, second, an act in the use of the process not proper in the regular prosecution of the proceeding. Regular and legitimate use of process, though with a bad intention, is not a malicious abuse of process.' In a suit for malicious abuse of process it is not necessary that there should have been a termination of the suit in which the process was issued, nor a want of probable cause for the suit." Id. p. 354 et seq.

[4] The distinction is clear. One consists in commencing and prosecuting a suit maliciously and interfering with property or business, and the other consists in the willful, unlawful, and wrongful use of the process itself.

[5] As the suit must have been terminated before an action will lie for prosecuting it maliciously, this cause of action could not be set up in the action itself as a counterclaim or otherwise. Fulton Grocery Co. v.

Maddox, 111 Ga. 260, 36 S. E. 647; Bonney v. King, 103 Ill. App. 601; Luby v. Bennett, 111 Wis. 613, 87 N. W. 804, 56 L. R. A. 261, 87 Am. St. Rep. 897. But the conclusive answer to the contention that the former judgment is res judicata is that the defendant asked for no more than the statute allowed him to recover in that action; that is, the damages for the conversion only and nothing more. This being the measure of his recovery, as fixed by the statute, he was not at liberty to ask for more damages than those authorized by the positive law in such cases, and therefore, having no opportunity to recover them in that action, he is not estopped to ask for them in this one. The very question involved in this case is decided against the defendant's contention in McPherson v. Runyon, 41 Minn. 524, 43 N. W. 392, 16 Am. St. Rep. 727.

[6] It is suggested that the complaint shows that the plaintiffs are suing for a malicious abuse of process only, but a cursory reading of the complaint will make it appear, we think, that the action is really one for the malicious prosecution of a civil action, and an interference with their property by claim and delivery proceedings. It is true plaintiffs allege that there was a malicious abuse of the process issued by the court, but they base this allegation solely upon the fact that they were unable to replevy the property by giving bond, which is manifestly insufficient to sustain such an action. They do allege, though, in substance, facts which are sufficient to constitute a good cause for malicious prosecution, for they say that defendant, knowing the plaintiffs were not indebted to him at all upon the debt and mortgage, unlawfully, wrongfully, willfully, wantonly, and recklessly commenced said action and prosecuted the same to their damage. They do not use the words "without probable cause," but no set form of words is required, if those of equivalent import are used, and the language of this complaint in that respect is much stronger than if the plaintiffs had employed the words, "and without probable cause." If what the plaintiff alleges is true, there was no probable cause but the action was wantonly instituted and with reckless indifference to plaintiffs' rights of property.

[7] Pleadings are now construed liberally, and plaintiff recovers according to his allegations. Cheese Co. v. Pipkin, 155 N. C. 394, 71 S. E. 442; Voorhees v. Porter, 134 N. C. 591, 47 S. E. 31, 65 L. R. A. 736; Blackmore v. Winders, 144 N. C. 212, 56 S. E. 874. But, after all is said the fact remains that the plaintiff in the former action alleged no more than would enable him to recover what the statute allowed him to recover as damages, and that corresponded exactly with the allegation. The case is governed by Bowen v. King, 146 N. C. 385, 59 S. E. 1044, where it is said: "While the allegation of the complaint may be broad enough to constitute a demand for the possession, it is evident from a perusal of the entire pleadings that the demand was not intended to be for the possession, which the plaintiff undoubtedly had when the action was commenced, but was to recover damages caused by reason of the wrongful seizure and detention of the property. As heretofore stated, it does not definitely appear how plaintiff reacquired possession of the property; but assuming—and there are statements from some of the witnesses tending to show this—that the possession was restored by means of a former action of claim and delivery, while plaintiff could have had his damages assessed in the former action (Revisal, § 570), the authorities seem to be to the effect that he was not required to take this course, but, after obtaining possession, could, in another action, recover damages for the injury done by the wrongful seizure and detention of his property. Woody v. Jordan, 69 N. C. 189; Asher v. Reizenstein, 105 N. C. 213 [10 S. E. 889]." Our conclusion is that the plaintiffs are not estopped by the former judgment.

The testimony of the plaintiff O. J. Ludwick was objected to upon the ground that the former judgment was res judicata, and the assignment of error based upon this exception cannot be broader than the exception itself.

[8] Where a party states the ground of his objection to evidence below, he cannot rely upon a different ground in this court. This is well settled. Kidder v. McIlhenny, 81 N. C. 123; Jones v. Cal, 93 N. C. 179. We do not mean to imply that there was any error in the court's ruling upon the evidence, or in its charge to the jury upon the damages. Those questions are not presented to us by the exceptions and assignments of error.

The court properly refused to sign the judgment tendered by the defendant upon a verdict in favor of the plaintiff.

No error.

BROWN, J. (dissenting). The facts, as I understand them, are that Penny brought an action against Ludwick to recover possession of certain personal property, consisting of a soda fountain, cash register, cigar case, stove, electric meter, refrigerator, electric fan, and a motor fan, used in a restaurant in High Point, and took out the ancillary remedy of claim and delivery. Ludwick failed to replevy, and the property was delivered to Penny. At the trial Penny failed to establish his right to recover the property, and judgment was given for Ludwick. The case is reported. 152 N. C. 376, 67 S. E. 919. In that action, as appears in this record, Ludwick not only denied Penny's title to the property and right to recover, but set up (something he was not compelled to do) a counterclaim, in which he averred that Penny had unlawfully and wrongfully seized the property, and converted it to his own use, to his great damage. Ludwick asked as relief that the property be restored, and that he recover as damages $4,000. Ludwick recovered judgment for $700 on third issue, and $1,800 on fourth issue. 152 N. C. 377, 67 S. E. 919.

Ludwick now brings this suit, alleging that Penny had maliciously sued out the claim and delivery, and had destroyed his business by the wrongful seizure of his property. I am of opinion that the plaintiff Ludwick, having seen fit to plead a counterclaim in the other action, and to claim damages for the wrong done him, should have set up all his items and claims for damage in that counterclaim, and have them all determined on one trial. He should not be permitted to divide up his damages as they all grew out of one and the same transaction and one and the same tort. For a long time I thought such a counterclaim could not be pleaded in an action on nature of claim and delivery, and that the defendant must wait until that action was ended in his favor and then sue for damages. But that question was settled by this court in Smith v. French, 141 N. C. 10, 58 S. E. 438, wherein it is held that the defendant may plead his counterclaim for damages for the tort in the claim and delivery action. In that case Mr. Justice Hoke says: "Even if the present opinion should be found to conflict with some former decision, it is only a question of procedure not involving a rule of property, and we think it better that our present construction of the statute should now be declared the true one as more in accord with the spirit and letter of our Code, which, as heretofore stated, designs and contemplates that all matters growing out of or connected with the same controversy should be adjusted in one and the same action. A counterclaim connected with plaintiff's cause of action or with the subject of the same will nearly always take its rise before action brought, but we hold that neither the statute nor the reason of the thing require that such counterclaim should necessarily or entirely mature before action commenced nor even before answer filed, if the provisions of the Code permit, and right and justice require that an amendment be allowed which will enable parties to end the same controversy in one and the same litigation."

Thus we see that this plaintiff had the right to plead a counterclaim for damages for the wrongful seizure of his property in the other action, and also that he did plead it. Having chosen to plead it, he should have set up all his items of damage in that counterclaim, and should not be heard again concerning same transaction. It is immaterial that plaintiff now avers that the taking of his property by legal process was maliciously done. It was all connected with and grew out of the one act, and could and should have been embraced in his counterclaim in the former suit. It is a well-settled principle that the commission of a single tortious act creates a single cause of action only, and all damages resulting therefrom must be recovered in one suit. 24 Am. & Eng. Ency. p. 788. The counterclaim set up by plaintiff in the former action is to be treated as if he had chosen to commence an independent action for damages. He should have set up all his damages in the one action, and have them determined on the one trial. This is the true spirit and value of code pleading. In the case of Porter v. Mack, 50 W. Va. 581, 592, 40 S. E. 459, 463, it is said: "The law seems to be well settled that when a person has a cause of action which he may assert by an action ex contractu for the direct damages, or ex delicto for both the direct and indirect damages, if he selects the former, he waives the latter, including all claim for indirect damages. Both actions are regarded as for the same wrong, of which he can have but a single satisfaction, though it in no wise compensates him for the damages sustained." In that case a recovery was sought to be had for an alleged conspiracy to break up the business of the plaintiff, and this was a second action, and the plaintiff was held bound by the adjudication of the previous action.

In his counterclaim this plaintiff averred that the taking of the property was wrongful. He could just as easily have averred that it was malicious. He could have claimed damages to his business as the result of the taking as well as the injury and sacrifice of his property. In 21 Am. and Eng. Ency. (1st Ed.) p. 237, it is said: "In all cases where the plaintiff has his option in the outset to bring tort or contract to recover damages for one and the same injury upon a state of facts which will support either, an adjudication in one, whichever he may elect, is, upon principle, a bar to the other." See, also, Norton v. Doherty, 3 Gray (Mass.) 372, 63 Am. Dec. 758; Ware v. Percival, 61 Me. 891, 14 Am. Rep. 565; Newby v. Caldwell, 54 Iowa, 102, 6 N. W. 154; Wagner v. Wagner, 36 Minn. 239, 30 N. W. 766. In Norton v. Doherty, supra, Chief Justice Shaw says: "On consideration the court are of the opinion that the former judgment was a good bar, because the first action was brought to recover damages for the same wrong or injury, and because it could be supported by the same evidence." Mr. Sutherland says: "Causes of action not divisible.—A cause of action and the damages recoverable therefor are an entirety. The party injured must be plaintiff, and must demand all the damages he has suffered or which he will suffer from the injury, grievance, or cause of action of which he complains. He cannot split a cause of action and bring successive suits for parts. He may not be able at first to prove all the items of the demand, or because all the demands have not been suffered. If he attempt to do so, a recovery in the first suit, though for less than his whole demand, will be a bar to a second action." In support of this statement the author cites a large number of cases, amongst others, Porter v. Mack, supra. These well-settled principles are clearly stated in the well-considered opinion of Mr. Justice Clark in Wagon Co. v. Byrd, 119 N. C. 460, 26 S. E. 144, in which it is held that: "The judgment or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction is conclusive, not only as to the subject-matter actually determined thereby, but also as to every other matter which properly belonged to the subject in litigation, and which the parties by the exercise of reasonable diligence might have brought forward at the time and had determined respecting it." The only evidence of damage which plaintiff offers on this trial is injury to his business by reason of the wrongful taking of his restaurant fixtures. He could and should have alleged and proven the same item of damage on the trial of his counterclaim. This is not an action for malicious prosecution which could not be commenced until after the termination of the former action. The complaint does not allege a want of probable cause, or any other of the usual and necessary allegations in a suit for malicious prosecution. On the contrary, in section 4 of the complaint this action is characterized as one for "abuse of process." Such an action need not await the termination of the former proceeding. "An action for damages for the abuse of legal process may be maintained before the action in which such process was issued is terminated." 19 Cyc. 632. It seems to me plain that every element of damage set up in this action could and should have been set up in the counterclaim in the former under the principles laid down in Smith v. French, supra.

I am of opinion that the former judgment for damages rendered in plaintiff's favor on his counterclaim is a bar to the recovery of further damages for same wrong.

PEELE v. POWELL.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 9, 1911.)

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 17*)—PROMISE TO ANSWER FOR DEBT OF ANOTHER—"SPECIAL PROMISE."

A "special promise" to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another means an express promise, and not one implied by law.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 7, p. 6590.]

2. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 33*)—PROMISE TO ANSWER FOR DEBT OF ANOTHER—CONSIDERATION.

Whether a promise to answer for the debt of another is made orally or in writing, it must have a consideration to support it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. §§ 50-53, 56; Dec. Dig. § 33.*]

3. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 158*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—CONSIDERATION OF WRITTEN PROMISE TO ANSWER FOR DEBT OF ANOTHER.

Where a promise to answer for the debt of another is in writing, the consideration need not appear in the writing, but may be shown by parol.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. §§ 373-376; Dec. Dig. § 158.*]

4. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 33*)—PROMISE TO ANSWER FOR DEBT OF ANOTHER—ORIGINAL PROMISE.

An original promise to answer for the debt of another, based on a consideration, is valid, though not in writing.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. §§ 50-53; Dec. Dig. § 33.*]

5. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 23*)—PROMISE TO ANSWER FOR DEBT OF ANOTHER—"ORIGINAL PROMISE."

An obligation to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another is original and valid, though in parol, if made at the time or before a debt is created, where credit is given solely to the promisor; or where credit is given on the promises of both, as principals and jointly liable, and not on the promise of one, as surety for the other; or a promise, made after the debt is created, when, by reason of the promise, the original debtor is released; or if it is a promise to pay out of funds placed in the hands of the promisor by the debtor; or if it be a promise based on a new consideration of benefit or harm passing between the promisor and the creditor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. §§ 18, 19; Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 6, pp. 5063-5064.]

6. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 34*)—PROMISE TO ANSWER FOR DEBT OF ANOTHER—PAYMENT OUT OF PARTICULAR FUND.

A promise to answer for the debt of another out of a particular fund, which is not received by the promisor, is not binding.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. § 54; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

7. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 34*)—PROMISE TO ANSWER FOR DEBT OF ANOTHER—CONSIDERATION.

A promise to answer for the debt of another, which is all or part of the consideration for property conveyed to the promisor, is valid, though not in writing.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. § 54; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

8. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 28*)—PROMISE TO ANSWER FOR DEBT OF ANOTHER—CONSIDERATION.

A promise to make good notes of another, transferred by the promisor in payment for property, is valid, though not in writing.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. § 45; Dec. Dig. § 28.*]

9. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 23*)—PROMISE TO ANSWER FOR DEBT OF ANOTHER—COLLATERAL PROMISE.

Where there is no benefit to one promising to answer for the debt of another, and the promise does not create an original obligation, but is a collateral promise, merely superadded to the promise of another to pay the debt, the original promisor remaining liable, the collateral promisor is not liable, unless there is a writing, whether the promise is made when the debt is created or not.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. §§ 18, 19; Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

10. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 158*)—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—ACCOUNT.

Where there is evidence of a valid promise to pay for goods furnished to another, the creditor's itemized and verified statement of account of goods sold to such other person for the amount alleged to be due by him in his complaint is competent to prove indebtedness of such other person.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. §§ 373-376; Dec. Dig. § 158.*]

11. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 158*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence, in an action to enforce an alleged promise by defendant's intestate to answer for the debt of another, held not to show the promise.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. §§ 373-376; Dec. Dig. § 158.*]

12. EVIDENCE (§ 354*)—DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE—BOOKS OF ACCOUNT—DECLARATIONS IN OWN INTEREST.

In an action against defendant's intestate on his alleged promise to answer for the debt of another, plaintiff's ledger and daybook, showing goods furnished to such other person, were not competent, as they were merely declarations of plaintiff in his own interest.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see *Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1432-1483; Dec. Dig. § 354.]

Walker and Hoke, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Bertie County; Carter, Judge.

Action by C. T. Peele against Isa G. Powell, administratrix of Edgar Powell, deceased. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. No error.

This is an action brought by C. T. Peele against Isa G. Powell, administratrix of Edgar Powell, to recover $286.65 and interest thereon from March 27, 1907, the value of goods sold and delivered to J. T. Cook, for which it is alleged the defendant's intestate is liable.

The plaintiff offered the following evidence: An itemized and verified statement of account of goods sold and delivered to J. T. Cook for the amount alleged to be due by him in his complaint. Objection by defendant sustained, and plaintiff excepted. The account was against Tom Cook; Edgar Powell, security.

Luther Bryant testified: That he was clerk in plaintiff's store from January 1, 1906, till the end of the year 1908; that for all goods sold to J. T. Cook from February 22, 1906, to March 27, 1907, the credit therefor was extended to Edgar Powell; that about the time of the last-mentioned date Mr. Peele told him (the witness) not to let Mr. Cook have any more goods without a written order from Mr. Powell. Cook had no credit at that time, and was a tenant of Mr. Powell. That in July, 1906, he heard Powell tell plaintiff to let Cook have goods, and he would see that they were paid for.

F. L. Bishop testified as follows: "On or about the 25th day of March, 1908, I met Mr. Powell in the road, and in the conversation between us Mr. Powell stated that Mr. Peele had him charged with a great big account that Mr. Cook had made at his store; and that he did not think that he ought to pay it, because Mr. Peele ought not to have let Mr. Cook have so many goods on such a crop as Mr. Cook was then working, but that he [Mr. Powell] had told Mr. Peele to let Mr. Cook have some goods, and that he reckoned he would have to pay it. I then told Mr. Powell what Mr. Peele had told me to tell him; that he presented Mr. Cook's account to him [Powell], and, unless he made some arrangements about that account, that he [Peele] was going to take some steps to collect it; that Mr. Peele said that he hated to take such measures against him, and that he wanted to avoid it if possible, but that he could not afford to lose the account."

L. J. Brewer testified: That in March, 1906, he was at Powell's house, and saw some one going out the gate, and that he asked Mr. Powell who it was, and he replied that it was Charlie Peele, who had been to see him about Cook's account, and that he told him that it was all right. He testified also that on another occasion, at the sheep shelter, in 1908, that Mr. Powell told him that Mr. Peele had a large account against him for Tom Cook, and that it amounted to about $290.

The plaintiff offered to prove by himself that he sold the goods to Cook, and the amount of the sales, which was excluded, and the plaintiff excepted. He also offered in evidence his ledger and daybook, for the purpose of proving the account against Cook, and excepted to its exclusion.

The principal controversy between the plaintiff and the defendant is as to the effect of the evidence; the defendant contending that it is not sufficient, under the statute of frauds, to bind the estate of his intestate. His honor was of this opinion, and, upon the conclusion of the evidence, entered judgment of nonsuit, and the plaintiff excepted and appealed.

L. L. Smith, for appellant. Winston & Matthews, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. (after stating the facts as above). The liability of a promisor to answer, "upon special promise, for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person," has been considered in numerous decisions of this court, and there is frequently much difficulty in determining whether a particular promise is within the statute.

[1] The term "special promise" means an express promise, and not one implied by law. Browne, Stat. Frauds, § 166.

[2, 3] Whether oral or in writing, it must have a consideration to support it (Draughan v. Bunting, 31 N. C. 10; Stanly v. Hendricks, 35 N. C. 87; Combs v. Harshaw, 63 N. C. 198; Haun v. Burrell, 119 N. C. 547, 26 S. E. 111); but, if in writing, the consideration need not appear in the writing, and may be shown by parol (Nichols v. Bell, 46 N. C. 32; Haun v. Burrell, 119 N. C. 547, 26 S. E. 111).

[4] If the promise is based on a consideration, and is an original obligation, it is valid, although not in writing. Hospital Ass'n v. Hobbs, 153 N. C. 188, 69 S. E. 79.

[5] The obligation is original, if made at the time or before the debt is created, and the credit is given solely to the promisor, as in Morrison v. Baker, 81 N. C. 80, and Sheppard v. Newton, 139 N. C. 536, 52 S. E. 143, or if credit is given on the promises of both, as principals and as jointly liable, and not on the promise of one, as the surety for the other (Browne, Stat. Frauds, § 197; Horne v. Bank, 108 N. C. 119, 12 S. E. 840). So is a promise, made after the debt is created, when, by reason of the promise, the original debtor is released (Sheppard v. Newton, 139 N. C. 533, 52 S. E. 143; Jenkins v. Holley, 140 N. C. 379, 53 S. E. 237, 111 Am. St. Rep. 846); and also if it is a promise to pay out of funds placed in the hands of the promisor by the debtor (Stanly v. Hendricks, 35 N. C. 86; Threadgill v. McLendon, 76 N. C. 24; Mason v. Willson, 84 N. C. 53, 37 Am. Rep. 612; Voorhees v. Porter, 134 N. C. 604, 47 S. E. 81, 65 L. R. A. 736); or if a promise based on a new consideration of benefit or harm passing between the promisor and the creditor (Whitehurst v. Hyman, 90 N. C. 489).

[6] If, however, there is a promise to pay out of a particular fund, and the fund is not received by the promisor, it is not binding. Bagley v. Sasser, 55 N. C. 350. If one, under the former practice, was arrested in a civil action, and was released on the oral promise of another to pay the debt, the promise was binding because the release from arrest satisfied the original debt (Cooper v. Chambers, 15 N. C. 261, 25 Am. Dec. 710; Draughan v. Bunting, 31 N. C. 10); but it was otherwise of an oral promise to pay upon condition that the creditor would not arrest the debtor, because the debtor remained liable (Britton v. Thrailkill, 50 N. C. 331; Rogers v. Rogers, 51 N. C. 300; Combs v. Harshaw, 63 N. C. 198).

[7, 8] Where the promise is for the benefit of the promisor, and he has a personal, immediate, and pecuniary benefit in the transaction, as in Neal v. Bellamy, 73 N. C. 384, and in Dale v. Lumber Co., 152 N. C. 653, 68 S. E. 134, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 407, or where the promise to pay the debt of another is all or part of the consideration for property conveyed to the promisor, as in Hockaday v. Parker, 53 N. C. 17, Little v. McCarter, 89 N. C. 233, Deaver v. Deaver, 137 N. C. 242, 49 S. E. 113, Satterfield v. Kindley, 144 N. C. 455, 57 S. E. 145, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 399, or is a promise to make good notes transferred in payment of property, as in Adcock v. Fleming, 19 N. C. 225, Ashford v. Robinson, 30 N. C. 114, and in Rowland v. Rorke, 49 N. C. 337, the promise is valid, although in parol.

[8] If, however, the promise does not create an original obligation, and it is collateral, and is merely superadded to the promise of another to pay the debt, he remaining liable, the promisor is not liable, unless there is a writing, and this is true, whether made at the time the debt is created or not. Smithwick v. Shepherd, 49 N. C. 197; Bagley v. Sasser, 55 N. C. 350; Scott v. Bryan, 73 N. C. 582; Rowland v. Barnes, 81 N. C. 239; Haun v. Burrell, 119 N. C. 547, 26 S. E. 111; Williams Co. v. Hamill, 131 N. C. 59, 42 S. E. 448; Sheppard v. Newton, 139 N. C. 535, 52 S. E. 143; and Supply Co. v. Finch, 147 N. C. 106, 60 S. E. 904. In our opinion, this case falls within the last class.

[10] There is no evidence of benefit to the intestate, and, while the jury would have been justified in finding from the evidence that he promised to pay, it is not sufficient to sustain a finding that it was more than a promise to pay the debt of Cook, for which he (Cook) remained liable. The verified account and the evidence of the plaintiff were competent to prove the indebtedness of Cook, as neither involved a transaction or conversation with the deceased, and there would be error in their exclusion, which would entitle the plaintiff to a new trial, if there was evidence of a valid promise of the intestate to pay. It was because his honor thought there was no such evidence that he ruled as he did, and we concur in his opinion. The definition of a promise to answer for the debt of another, which is not enforceable, adopted in our court and applicable here, is: "An undertaking by a person, not before liable, for the purpose of securing or performing the same duty for which the party, for whom the undertaking is made, continues liable." Sheppard v. Newton, supra. Tested by this rule, we think the action cannot be maintained.

[11] The account began on the 22d day of February, 1906, and ended the 27th day of March, 1907. The witness for the plaintiff, Bryant, testified that about the time of the last date (March 27, 1907) the plaintiff told him not to let Cook have any more goods without a written order from Powell, and that Cook had no credit at that time. The inference is that Cook had credit prior to the time, and no goods were afterwards sold to him. It is true that same witness also said that for all goods sold to Cook credit was extended to Powell, and this would be entitled to great weight, if he had stated something said or done by Powell, authorizing the extension of credit. A similar statement was made by a witness in Williams Co. v. Hamill, 131 N. C. 59, 42 S. E. 448, and was held insufficient to charge the promisor. Again he says, in July, 1906, he heard Powell tell the plaintiff to let Cook have goods, and he would see that they were paid for. He does not state whether or not any goods were sold to Cook at that time, and, so far as we can see, the promise related to a single transaction, and there is no evidence that it is embraced in the account sued on. We would not be justified in giving such a promise both a retrospective and prospective construction, to include the part of the account before the promise, and that part made after it.

The evidence of the witnesses Brewer and Bishop does not show liability on the part of the intestate. The most material statement made by either is by Brewer: "That in March, 1906, he was at Powell's house, and saw some one going out the gate, and that he asked Mr. Powell who it was, and he replied that it was Charlie Peele, who had been to see him about Cook's account, and that he told him that it was all right." We will assume that "him," as last used, applies to Peele, although it is not certain, but, if so, it was "Cook's account" that was all right, and there is no suggestion in the evidence that Cook was not liable therefor. Suppose he had said, "Cook owes Peele an account, and I have promised to pay it." No one would contend that this would create a legal liability, and the evidence is not as strong as this.

The action is against the estate of a deceased person. The intestate lived one year and eight months after the last item in the account, and no action was instituted against him during this period. The defendant administrator has no personal knowledge of the transactions, and death has destroyed any opportunity of replying to the evidence of the plaintiff. Under these circumstances, the evidence should be carefully examined, and if it does not conform to the requirements of the law, it should be so declared.

[12] The ledger and daybook of the plaintiff were properly excluded, as they were mere declarations of the plaintiff in his own interest. Bank v. Clark, 8 N. C. 36; Bland v. Warren, 65 N. C. 374; Dyeing Co. v. Hosiery Co., 126 N. C. 294, 35 S. E. 586.

We find no error.

No error.

WALKER, J. (dissenting). It is suggested, in opening the opinion of the court, that there is frequently much difficulty in determining whether a particular promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person falls within the provisions of the statute of frauds. It would not seem so difficult if we did not attempt to apply well-recognized principles, which are clearly stated in the opinion, to disputed facts, and the situation would be much simplified, and the difficulty otherwise encountered would be removed, if, when the facts are not settled, the case should be submitted to the jury, which is invariably done in other cases, to ascertain what the promise or contract was, or what was the intention, understanding, and agreement of the parties. Was it the intention of Peele and Powell that the latter should become the sole and responsible debtor, or, in other words, did he promise for himself to pay the debt, or did he promise as surety or guarantor for Cook? In the former case, the promise would be an original one, not within the statute, and in the latter it would be a superadded one; Cook still remaining liable for the debt.

I have the highest and best authority for saying that this case should have gone to the jury, so that they might find what was the promise. It was so held (Chief Justice Pearson delivering the opinion) in Threadgill v. McLendon, 76 N. C. 24, when there was much less dispute about the facts, or where the facts were much more significant of the true nature of the promise, than are those in this case. In Threadgill's Case, McLendon requested Threadgill to furnish goods and supplies to one Treadaway, who was a cropper of McLendon, such goods and supplies as he might want, and he (McLendon) would see that Threadgill was paid for them, and that upon this request and promise Treadaway obtained credit at Threadgill's store, and received the goods as he wanted them, amounting in value to $156. That of this account $56 was charged to McLendon and $100 to Treadaway. This court, after stating that the trial judge had attached too much importance to the manner of making the entries upon the books, said: "Considering the fact that the defendant was bound to furnish the cropper with necessary supplies, and had a lien upon the crop, it ought to have been left to the jury to say whether the credit was not, in the first instance, given to the defendant, and the entries on the books made simply to discriminate what was for farm purposes, and what for the personal use of the cropper and his family." Ours is a much stronger case than that for a submission to the jury of the vital question, as to the nature of the promise, as understood by the parties. I find abundant evidence in the record which tends most strongly to show that Powell understood and agreed with Peele to become himself the payer, regardless of Cook, and that he was looked to as the sole responsible debtor.

And still weightier, if anything, as an authority, is the opinion of the present Chief Justice in Jenkins v. Holley, 140 N. C. 379, 53 S. E. 237, 111 Am. St. Rep. 848, where it is said: "The evidence offered by plaintiff should have been left to the jury, with any evidence the defendant might offer, upon the issue whether Holley became sole debtor, or was merely responsible, if Wilson did not pay." The facts of that case are substantially like those we find in this record. There was evidence in that case, and there is evidence here, that the plaintiff had "looked to" the defendant as his debtor, and that defendant said it was "all right," and upon this state of facts it was said, in Jenkins v. Holley: "The language was strong, if not, indeed, conclusive, evidence" of a promise, not within the statute, and then follows what is above quoted from the opinion, to the effect that the case should at least have gone to the jury to ascertain the intention of the parties. In Sheppard v. Newton, 139 N. C. 533, 52 S. E. 143, the judge held, as did the lower court in this case, that the promise was within the statute, and ordered a nonsuit. This ruling was reversed by this court upon appeal, and a new trial awarded; Justice Hoke saying, in the course of the opinion: "A statement on the same subject, somewhat more extended and very satisfactory, will be found in Clark on Contracts, p. 67, as follows: 'There must either be a present or a prospective liability of a third person for which the promisor agrees to answer. If the promisor becomes himself primarily and not collaterally liable, the promise is not within the statute, though the benefit from the transaction accrues to a third person. If, for instance, two persons come into a store, and one buys, and the other, to gain him credit, promises the seller, 'if he does not pay you, I will,' this is a collateral undertaking, and must be in writing; but, if he says, 'Let him have the goods, and I will pay,' or, 'I will see you paid,' and credit is given to him alone, he is himself the buyer, and the undertaking is original. In other words, whether the promise in such a case is within the statute depends on how the credit was given. If it was given exclusively to the promisor, his undertaking is original, but it is collateral if any credit was given to the other party.' To like effect are the decisions of our own court. Whitehurst v. Hyman, 90 N. C. 487; White v. Tripp, 125 N. C. 523 [34 S. E. 686]."

It will be observed that the case he puts, where the promisor is liable and cannot hide himself behind the statute, is the very one we have under consideration. "Let him have the goods, and I will pay," or, "I will see you are paid." We will see presently, when I review the evidence, that credit was given to Powell alone. It was not necessary that Powell should say, as intimated in the opinion, that credit should be given to him alone, in order to bind him, or that he should have expressly assented to such a course; but if he requested that the goods be sold on his credit, as he most assuredly did, and Peele, acting upon his request and induced thereby, sold the goods on his credit, and looked to him alone, the promise was binding as an original one. It was, at least, as Chief Justice Clark said, and as Justice Hoke clearly suggests, a question for the jury as to what was meant, and as to "how the credit was given." Sheppard v. Newton, supra. Quoting from that case again its concluding words: "Applying these principles to the foregoing statement of the evidence, the court is of opinion that there was error in directing a nonsuit, and the plaintiff is entitled to have his cause submitted to the jury, on the question whether the defendant is not answerable as the original or present debtor on the plaintiff's demand." This is striking language and worthy of much consideration. It would attract the attention of any one familiar with the evidence in this case, as showing a close similarity between the two.

Let me now notice two other cases decided by this court. In White v. Tripp, 125 N. C. 523, 34 S. E. 686, it appeared that the goods were charged to both the promisor and the person (defendant's son) who received the goods, or for whose benefit they were purchased. The court held that this fact was not controlling, and that the case was one for the jury. Plaintiff testified that he gave sole credit to the father, Joseph Tripp, without there being any evidence that the latter had assented to such an arrangement. It did not occur to the court that such assent was necessary. It was held that the case was one for the jury, as to the intention of the parties, upon the question as to whom was the credit given. The court, with reference to the state of the proof, said: "If the defendant authorized the selling to the son, the plaintiff could recover, although the goods were charged to J. B. Tripp in the manner stated in the case. He also charged the jury on the law of principal and agent, and that if the credit was given to J. B. Tripp, with Joseph Tripp as surety, then the defendant would not be liable. There is nothing in these instructions of which the defendant can justly complain. The promise, as the jury have found it to be under the charge, is not required to be in writing. Neal v. Bellamy, 73 N. C. 384. The liability of the defendant depends upon his agreement with, or promise to, the plaintiff, and not upon the manner in which the plaintiff stated the account on his books. The latter was evidence, properly before the jury, under the circumstances, and for the purpose already stated." As will be seen, the charge was approved and the judgment was affirmed; the court holding that the liability of Joseph Tripp, the promisor, depended upon his agreement with the plaintiff, and not upon the manner in which the goods were charged on the books; it being for the jury to say what was the intention.

Justice Hoke, in Dale v. Lumber Co., 152 N. C. 651, 68 S. E. 134, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 407, states the law clearly, and in principle that case is not unlike this one. He says: "In Emerson v. Slater, 63 U. S. 28-43 [16 L. Ed. 360], a decision on this section of the statute of frauds, the court said: 'But whenever the main purpose and object of the promisor is not to answer for another, but to subserve some pecuniary or business purpose of his own, involving either a benefit to himself or damage to the other contracting party, his promise is not within the statute, although it may be in form a promise to pay the debt of another, and although the performance of it may incidentally have the effect of extinguishing that liability.' This position has been sustained and applied in other cases by the same court, notably in Davis v. Patrick, 141 U. S. 479, 12 Sup. Ct. 58, 35 L. Ed. 826, in which it was held: 'In determining whether an alleged promise is or is not a promise to answer for the debt of another, the following rules may be applied: (1) If the promisor is a stranger to the transaction, without interest in it, the obligations of the statute are to be strictly upheld; (2) but, if he has a personal, immediate, and pecuniary interest in a transaction in which a third party is the original obligor, the courts will give effect to that promise. The real character of a promise does not depend altogether upon form of expression, but largely upon the situation of the parties, and upon whether they understood it to be a collateral or direct promise.'"

Powell had a business purpose, and, too, a pecuniary one, to subserve, as appears in this case, as Cook was his tenant, without credit, and unable to get supplies to make his crop without the credit of Powell at Peele's store. He made the promise to advance his own interests, and no doubt received the full benefit of it in the way of rent, and, perhaps, enough besides to pay for the goods and supplies Peele furnished to his tenant, Cook, at his request, as he had a lien under the statute for both rent and advancements. Therein consists the extreme hardship of the court's ruling, and the facts of the case so strongly appeal to my sense of justice and right, as did the facts in Liverman v. Cahoon, 72 S. E. 327, at this term, where the statute of limitations was pleaded, that I could not, and cannot in this case, refrain from giving my reasons at length for my earnest dissent from the conclusion, as well as the reasoning, of the court. I think that in both cases the defendants were seeking to take an unconscionable advantage of the plaintiffs, and one which the law, according to my understanding of it, did not countenance, much less justify.

The statute of limitations and the statute of frauds are to be considered as good legal defenses, when applicable to the facts; but they were designed, as Chief Justice Pearson said, in Threadgill v. McLendon, supra, "to prevent fraud," and not as a cloak for it.

There is no evidence in this case that the plaintiff ever trusted Cook for a moment, for it appears that he was utterly insolvent and without credit, and for that very reason the promise was made by Powell. Who can doubt, upon the evidence, that the credit of Powell alone entered into the transaction? He knew his tenant had no credit, and that his crop would be lost, unless he should become the debtor to Peele. There is at least evidence of all this, which should have been submitted to the jury. Our judicial duties at this time have been so onerous and exacting that I have little or no time to examine the authorities very closely, but a mere cursory reading of them warrants me in saying that they fully support my conclusion. "An oral promise to pay for goods furnished to a third person, at the request of the promisor and on his sole credit, is an original undertaking, and not within the statute of frauds. The same rule applies in respect of other considerations moving from the promisee and beneficial to a third person, at the request and upon the sole credit of the promisor, such as the advancing of money, the rendering of services, renting premises, bailing goods, or supplying board." 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, 923-930, where the law is fully stated, and authority will be found covering every point in this case, and especially does it sustain the view that the case is at least one for the jury. In Morrison v. Baker, 81 N. C. 76, it was held that, "where goods are furnished to A. upon the unconditional promise of B. to pay for them, it is not an undertaking to pay the debt of another, but the personal debt of B." It is clear to my mind, upon the conceded facts, that the promise of Powell to Peele was, in law, not a collateral, but an original, one; but, if not so, as matter of law, the question as to the nature of the promise should have been submitted to the jury.

Now as to the evidence. Luther Bryant testified: "I was a clerk in plaintiff's store from January 1, 1906, till the end of the year 1908; for all goods sold to J. T. Cook from February 22, 1906, to March 27, 1907, the credit therefor was extended to Edgar Powell; that about the time of the last-mentioned date, Mr. Peele told me not to let Mr. Cook have any more goods without a written order from Mr. Powell. Cook had no credit at that time, and was a tenant of Mr. Powell." It is true he afterwards said that Powell told plaintiff "to let Cook have the goods, and he would see that they were paid for." But how does this affect Powell's liability? It does not exclude the idea that he would be solely responsible to Peele. Identical words were not allowed any such effect in Threadgill v. McLendon, supra. They rather strengthen the other evidence. The court says it does not appear that he let Cook have any goods at that time. Why, Luther Bryant had already said that there was a running account at the store from February 22, 1906, to March 27, 1907; goods having been furnished between those dates by Peele to Cook solely upon Powell's credit.

It is also stated by the court, in the opinion, that Peele told his clerk, Bryant, about March 27, 1907, not to let Cook have any more goods without a written order from Powell, and that Cook had no credit, and it is argued from this that Cook had credit prior to that time, and no goods were afterwards sold to him; but no such inference, I respectfully submit, is at all warranted. Bryant expressly stated that Cook never had any credit between February 22, 1906, and March 27, 1907. It makes no difference whether he got any goods afterwards or not. Besides, the court excluded all evidence as to the account between Peele and Cook, and thus prevented the plaintiff from proving and developing his case. His ruling was wrong, of course, as the transaction between Peele and Cook was no transaction with the deceased party, Powell. The reason why Bryant was instructed not to let Cook have any more goods without an order from Powell was that he was increasing his account to such an extent, and so rapidly, that he thought it right to notify Powell and get his order. Powell himself referred to this afterwards, according to the witness F. L. Bishop.

It also appears from Bishop's and Brewer's testimony that Powell admitted his liability to Peele, and stated that it was "all right." This kind of admission is held to be some evidence of an independent and original promise, in the beginning of the transaction, to pay for the goods himself, as will appear by reference to the Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, above cited. It is not necessary to give the promise "a retrospective and prospective construction to include the part of the account before the promise, and that part made after it," as said in the court's opinion; for there is ample evidence to show a promise, both at the time of the first conversation, before any goods were furnished, and afterwards. And, again, when Powell said, "it was all right," it is plain to my mind, from the context, what he meant, and there is but one interpretation to be placed upon his words. He referred to his liability for the account, for that was what Peele had gone to his home to see him about, and nothing else. In one sense, he was referring to "Cook's account," and that is that Cook had got the goods which Powell had promised to pay for, and he went to see him about it for the purpose of getting his money. But he never intimated, by word or act, that he looked to Cook for the money. Why should he look to an insolvent? "You can't get blood out of a turnip" (ex nihilo nihil fit), to speak figuratively, and Peele knew that Cook would never have any money for him, and for that reason he depended upon Powell alone. The fact that Powell is dead is utterly irrelevant to the question. The statute of frauds does not protect a man because he is dead, any more than it does a living person. They both stand with reference to it on an equality; one has no greater right under it, and is entitled to no greater consideration, than the other.

The case of Garrett-Williams Co. v. Hamill, 131 N. C. 57, 42 S. E. 448, so much relied on by the court, with other cases of a like kind, and which was strenuously urged upon our attention by defendant's counsel as directly in point, does not fit this case by any means. The promise there was by T. A. Hamill to pay, if F. A. Hamill did not. "We went to Whitakers, and T. L. Hamill bought goods, and said ship goods in future to F. A. Hamill whenever he needed them, until he notified us not to ship, and he would see us paid, and to collect from F. A. Hamill when I came around, and if F. A. Hamill failed to pay, he would." That was distinctly a collateral promise—a promise of T. A. Hamill superadded to that of the principal debtor, F. A. Hamill.

It seems to me that the necessity which the court found for explanatory argument upon the facts, in order to show that the statute does not apply, is a cogent reason for sending the case to a jury.

My conclusion is (1) that the plaintiff was deprived of the right to develop his case by erroneous rulings of the court upon the testimony, and (2) that the evidence is such as to require the intervention of a jury, and for either or both reasons the nonsuit should be set aside, and a new trial ordered.

HOKE, J., concurs in the dissenting opinion of WALKER, J.

(157 N. C. 424)

WHITEHURST v. PADGETT et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 13, 1911.)

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 23*)—DEBT OF ANOTHER—"ORIGINAL PROMISE"—"COLLATERAL PROMISE."

A promise made at the time or before a debt is created, and where credit is given solely to the promisor or to both promisors as principals, or a promise based on a new consideration passing between the promisor and the creditor, or a promise for the benefit of the promisor where he has a personal and pecuniary interest in the transaction in which a third party is the original obligor, is an "original promise," which is not within the statute of frauds, but a promise not creating an original obligation and merely superadded to the promise of another who remains liable, to pay such debt, is a collateral promise required by the statute to be in writing and signed, whether made at the time the debt was created or afterwards.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, p. 1252; vol. 6, pp. 5063, 5064.]

2. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 159*)—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where a landlord interested to have his tenant furnished with supplies to make his crop is sought to be charged on his promise for goods furnished the tenant, and the evidence whether the credit was in the first instance given to him as a joint principal, is conflicting, the question is for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. § 378; Dec. Dig. § 159.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1066*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

The admission of evidence in an action against a landlord and his tenant, seeking to recover for goods furnished the tenant, that plaintiff had charged the goods on his books to both the landlord and the tenant is irrelevant, and hence harmless as to the tenant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4220; Dec. Dig. § 1066.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 499*)—SUFFICIENCY OF OBJECTION—RULE OF COURT.

An objection made by one of two defendants without showing which one made it, and which is untenable as to one defendant, must fail in view of Supreme Court rule 27 (140 N. C. 662, 68 S. E. viii) providing that it shall not be ground for exception that evidence, competent for some purposes, but not for all, is admitted, unless appellant asks at the time of admission that its purpose be restricted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 499.*]

5. EVIDENCE (§ 171*)—BEST OR SECONDARY EVIDENCE—COLLATERAL WRITINGS.

In an action against a landlord and his tenant to recover for goods furnished the tenant on an alleged oral promise of the landlord to pay for them, where the plaintiff's book of entry and its contents were only collaterally involved in the issue, parol evidence on the part of plaintiff as to whom he had charged the goods on his books was admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 460, 528; Dec. Dig. § 171.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Ferguson, Judge.

Action by S. C. Whitehurst against E. P. Padgett and M. A. James. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. No error.

Julius Brown, for appellants. F. G. James & Son, for appellee.

WALKER, J. Plaintiff had a store at Grindool, and defendant, Alexander Padgett, lived on the Barnhill land, which he had leased from his codefendant, M. A. James. There was evidence tending to show that Whitehurst, at the request of Padgett and James, furnished Padgett with fertilizers to the amount of $284.31, for use on the Barnhill place, as tenant of James. The material facts, according to the plaintiff's testimony, were these: Padgett applied to Whitehurst for the fertilizer and told him that James would pay for it. Whitehurst saw James afterwards, who said to him, "All right, go ahead and furnish Padgett, and I will see that you get your money." He was afterwards told by Whitehurst that the debt for the fertilizer was due, when he said, "I will see that you get your money, if I do not get a cent." There was evidence for the defendants that no such promise had been made by James, but, on the contrary, that Whitehurst had refused to accept the promise of James to pay for the fertilizer. Defendants also relied upon the statute of frauds. The court charged the jury that Padgett could not bind James by any declaration that the latter had told him to buy the fertilizer on his credit and responsibility, unless they found that James had authorized the purchase by Padgett from Whitehurst, and agreed to become liable for the same; that they would consider all the evidence and find therefrom whether such authority had been given, and that if they should find that the authority was given, their verdict would be for the plaintiff, otherwise for defendants. The jury returned a verdict against defendants, and they appealed.

[1] We see no objection to the charge of the court. At this term, in Peele v. Powell, 73 S. E. 234, we held that a promise is not within the statute of frauds, if it is based upon a consideration and is an original one, and that it is original if made at the time or before the debt is created, and the credit is given solely to the promisor or to both promisors, as principals, or if the promise is based upon a new consideration of benefit or harm passing between the promisor and the creditor, or if the promise is for the benefit of the promisor and he has a personal, immediate, and pecuniary interest in the transaction, in which a third party is the original obligor, but if the promise does not create an original obligation, and is collateral and merely superadded to the promise of another to pay the debt, who remains liable therefor, the statute applies, and the second promisor is not liable upon his promise, unless it was reduced to writing and signed, as required by the statute, and this is true whether his promise was made at the time the debt was created or afterwards. Numerous authorities were cited to support these principles, and, among others, the following: Neal v. Bellamy, 73 N. C. 384; Dale v. Lumber Co., 152 N. C. 653, 68 S. E. 134, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 407; Hospital Ass'n v. Hobbs, 153 N. C. 188, 69 S. E. 79; Morrison v. Baker, 81 N. C. 80; Shepard v. Newton, 139 N. C. 536, 52 S. E. 143; Haun v. Burrell, 119 N. C. 547, 26 S. E. 111; Horne v. Bank, 108 N. C. 119, 12 S. E. 840; Browne on Statute of Frauds, § 197, and the authorities sustain the rules laid down by the court.

[2] Whether the defendant James intended to become a joint principal with Padgett, his tenant, was fairly and correctly submitted to the jury by the court upon all the evidence, and there was more than we have considered it necessary to recite. James had a direct personal and pecuniary interest in the transaction, and made the promise, as the jury finds, at the time the goods were furnished or the debt was contracted, and it is evident, the jury having found the fact as to the promise in favor of plaintiff, that he relied upon it at the time and furnished the fertilizer upon the faith of it. In the case of Threadgill v. McLendon, 76 N. C. 24, were words almost identical, and, at least, substantially the same as those used by James, according to plaintiff's testimony, the court held that it was properly left to the jury to say whether the credit was not in the first instance given to the promisor, who was a landlord, and who, as the court says, was interested to have his tenant or cropper furnished with necessary supplies to make his crop and had a lien upon it. That was the first reason for the decision, and it is applicable to this case. It would not be fair for the defendants to rely upon the statute, under such circumstances, it having been passed to prevent frauds and not to encourage them, as was said by Judge Pearson, for the court, in Threadgill v. McLendon, supra.

[3] The plaintiff was asked by his counsel to whom he had charged the goods on his books, and replied that they were charged to Padgett and James. Defendants objected to the question, but it was irrelevant as to Padgett, and, of course, harmless, and therefore, was not objectionable as to him. It does not appear that James individually objected to it.

[4] If we treat the objection as having been made by one of the defendants, and not by both, it does not appear which one made it, and the objection, being untenable as to Padgett, must fail. Rule 27 (140 N. C. 662, 66 S. E. viii).

[5] But we think the "best or primary rule" does not apply. The book entry and its contents are not directly involved in the issue. The plaintiff was not suing upon the entries, but upon the contract, which was not required to be in writing. McKelvey on Evidence (2d Ed.) pp. 425-428, after stating the old rule, thus refers to the modern rule: "Where the writing is not in issue, but merely collateral to it, it is held that the rule has no application, and parol evidence may be given, even though it covers the contents of the writing. An interesting question arises where the allegations that a book or documents do not contain certain matter. It has been held here that oral testimony of any one who has examined the writing may be given in support of the allegation. In a certain sense the writing itself may certainly be regarded as the best evidence of what it does not contain, as well as what it does contain, yet there may not be the same difficulty in establishing that a certain matter is not contained in a writing as in determining with exactness its actual contents, and there may, therefore, be less reason for the enforcement of the best-evidence rule." He cites the case of Conrod v. Madden, 126 Ind. 197, 25 N. E. 1102, and our case of Ledford v. Emerson, 138 N. C. 502, 51 S. E. 42, which seems to be as extreme an application of the rule of the best evidence as can be supposed. It was there held that "the rule excluding parol evidence as to the contents of a written instrument, applies only in actions between parties to the writing, and when its enforcement is the substantial cause of action, and not where the writing is collateral to the issue."

We have carefully considered the other rulings of the court, to which exceptions were taken, and find no reversible error therein.

No error.

GAINESVILLE & ALACHUA COUNTY HOSPITAL ASS'N v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 20, 1911.)

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 514*)—ACTION—PLEADING—ISSUES AND PROOF.

In an action by a hospital association begun in a justice's court, defendant was summoned to answer the plaintiff corporation for the nonpayment of a sum due by contract, and the answer set up nonliability, the statute of frauds and want of jurisdiction. Held, that the pleadings did not sufficiently raise the issue of plaintiff's corporate existence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 2052-2081; Dec. Dig. § 514.*]

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 34*)—CORPORATE EXISTENCE—ESTOPPEL TO DENY CORPORATE EXISTENCE.

Where defendant has dealt with the plaintiff as if plaintiff had been duly incorporated and had the capacity to enter into the contract, whether express or implied, it is estopped from denying plaintiff's corporate existence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 81-96; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1097*)—SUBSEQUENT APPEALS—FORMER DECISION AS LAW OF CASE.

The decision on a former appeal is the law of the case in a subsequent appeal where the same questions are raised upon evidence not substantially different from that in the former appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4358-4368; Dec. Dig. § 1097.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1097*)—REHEARING --GROUNDS—ERROR ON REVIEW.

5. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 23*)—PROMISE TO ANSWER FOR DEBT OF ANOTHER—ORIGINAL PROMISE.

An original promise to answer for the debt of another is not within the statute of frauds, and hence is not required to be in writing.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sampson County; Cline, Judge.

Action by the Gainesville & Alachua County Hospital Association against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company appeals. No error.

Defendant in this action was summoned to appear in a justice's court "to answer the complaint of the plaintiff corporation for the nonpayment of the sum of $127.75 with interest on the same from the 21st day of July, 1908, due by contract or quasi contract, and demanded by said plaintiff," and made answer to this complaint as follows:

"(1) That it does not owe the plaintiff anything.

"(2) That if the defendant Georgia Hobbs is indebted to the plaintiff, this defendant is not liable therefor; that this defendant cannot be made liable for the debt of Miss Georgia Hobbs, except upon a promise in writing, signed by it or some one legally authorized to make and sign such promise; and this defendant avers that no such promise was ever made, and this defendant pleads specially the statute of frauds.

"(3) That it is informed and believes that the basis of the plaintiff's claim is some matter and things which occurred in the state of Florida, and this court has no jurisdiction.

"(4) That no contract or quasi contract exists or ever has existed pursuant to which this defendant is liable to the plaintiff in any amount."

Junius Davis, for appellant. Faison & Wright, for appellee.

WALKER, J. An examination of the record in this case discloses the fact that every question now raised was presented in the former appeal and then decided by this court. If it was material at the former hearing for the plaintiff to have established its incorporation, the nonsuit should have been sustained, and there is no less evidence of that fact now than there was then.

[1, 2] But we concur with the judge, who presided at the trial, that the question of incorporation is not sufficiently raised by the pleadings, and, besides, if our former decision was correct, the appellant (Railway Company) dealt with the plaintiff as if it had been duly incorporated and had the capacity to enter into the contract, whether express or implied. Banking & Trust Co. v. Duffy, 72 S. E. 96, at this term.

[3, 4] The question as to the statute of frauds, and the remaining one as to the authority of H. O. McArthur to act for the company in the particular matter, were both passed upon when the case was here before. The evidence is not substantially different from what it was in the former appeal. We then held that it was sufficient for submission to the jury, and we must so decide now, as the same question cannot be raised by a second appeal, but it must be done by a petition to rehear the case, and for a reversal of our decision if we were in error. Jones v. Railroad, 131 N. C. 133, 42 S. E. 559; Wright v. Railroad, 128 N. C. 77, 38 S. E. 283; Kramer v. Railway Co., 128 N. C. 269, 38 S. E. 872; Holley v. Smith, 132 N. C. 36, 43 S. E. 501. The motion to nonsuit is governed by the same rule. We do not mean to imply that our former rulings were erroneous, but simply that they cannot be reviewed in this way. There is no practical difference between this case and the one we formerly heard. [5] Assuming that McArthur had sufficient authority to represent defendant, which we formerly decided to exist, the ruling that the promise to pay the plaintiff its charges for medical and other services to Miss Hobbs, as an original one, is not affected by the statute of frauds, and, therefore, is not required to be in writing, finds some support in two cases decided at this term. Peele v. Powell, 73 S. E. 224, and Whitehurst v. Padgett, 73 S. E. 240.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

NAVIGABLE WATERS (§ 26*)—ACTION FOR OB- STRUCTION—PLEADING.

A declaration in an action for damages from the temporary obstruction of a river by a boom company whereby a raft was detained from its destination and lost in a flood, must aver that the owner of the raft requested the boom company to permit the raft to pass.

Error to Circuit Court, Cabell County.

Action by E. E. Adkins and another against the Guyandotte Timber Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Campbell, Brown & Davis, for plaintiff in error. George J. McComas and Daniel Dawson, for defendants in error.

ROBINSON, J. The action is one for the recovery of damages from the loss of a raft of logs. Plaintiffs claim that the loss was caused by defendant, a boom company, in negligently and unlawfully blocking the channel of the river, so that the raft was detained therein until a flood came and swept it away.

The case is similar to that considered in Ironton Lumber Co. v. Guyandotte Timber Co., 68 W. Va. 358, 69 S. E. 815. The decision in that case controls the determination of a material point in the case at hand. There is no averment in the declaration that plaintiffs requested defendant to open the boom and allow their raft to pass through. Demurrer to the declaration was overruled. It should have been sustained.

On the authority of the case cited, we must reverse the judgment, set aside the verdict, sustain the demurrer, and remand the case with leave to amend the declaration.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County.

Bill by the Elkins National Bank against Ella D. B. Reger and others. Decree for complainant, and defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

C. H. Scott and H. G. Kump, for appellants. E. A. Bowers, for appellee.

POFFENBARGER, J. Having become possessed, in the manner hereinafter stated, of a promissory note for the sum of $1,310, executed by Mrs. Ella D. B. Reger and secured upon her property by a vendor's lien, the Elkins National Bank brought this suit to enforce the lien. The note was for part of the purchase money of the property proceeded against and made payable to the vendor, Mrs. Elizabeth B. Tibbetts. The deed for the property was acknowledged August 31, 1904. On the same day Mrs. Tibbetts assigned the note to Shelton L. Reger, the husband of Mrs. Reger. About the same time the husband and wife made and delivered their promissory note to the Elkins National Bank for $1,200, and the former assigned to said bank, as collateral security for said $1,200 note, the note executed by his wife to Mrs. Tibbetts and by her assigned to him. The proceeds of this note were placed to his credit and he checked out the money, but to whom and for what purpose it does not very clearly appear. The $1,200 note reads in part "I promise to pay," but is signed by both parties. At the time of the assignment of the $1,310 note as collateral, Mrs. Reger assigned to the bank, as further security, three promissory notes of $300 each, executed to her by Dora Watson and Creede Watson, and secured by a vendor's lien on property other than that involved here. The $1,200 note was renewed once or twice, and, default having been made in the payment of the last renewal note, the bank sold the collateral notes at public auction, and bought them in through its attorney at the price of $1,590. It then brought this suit to enforce the lien of the $1,310 note on the property of Mrs. Reger. There was a prior vendor's lien on it in favor of Mrs. Grace Davis Lee for purchase money due her from Mrs. Tibbetts, payment of which Mrs. Reger had assumed. At the time of the purchase by Mrs. Reger, this lien amounted to $2,500, evidenced by three promissory notes, one for $834, and two for $833 each. Some time after the purchase by Mrs. Reger, her husband went to the Elkins National Bank, where these last-mentioned notes were held for collection, and paid off the first one, calling for $834. Claiming an assignment of that note, by reason of his having paid it or taken it up with money claimed to have been his own, he assigned it to J. W. Knopsnyder as collateral security for a $500 loan made by said Knopsnyder to Mrs. Reger, and further secured by a deed of trust upon the property here preceeded against in which E. D. Talbott was made trustee. Mrs. Grace Davis Lee, holding her two vendor's lien notes, Ella D. B. Reger, Shelton L. Reger, E. D. Talbott, trustee, and Elizabeth B. Tibbetts, payee in the $1,310 note and promisor in the $834 note and the two $833 notes, were made parties defendant. Knopsnyder is shown by the answers filed, but not by the bill, to have been dead at the time of the institution of this suit, and his executor, the Davis Trust Company, was not made a party. Without referring the cause to a commissioner, the court decreed the debt of Mrs. Lee, then amounting to $2,030, to be the first lien upon the property, that of the bank, amounting to $1,641.43, the second, and that of Knopsnyder the third lien, and ordered the property sold to satisfy these liens in default of payment by Mrs. Tibbetts of the debt due Mrs. Lee, and by Mrs. Reger of the debt due the bank, and appointed a commissioner for the purpose of executing the decree. A sale was made to N. I. Hall for the sum of $4,900, which was paid in cash, and then Shelton L. Reger and others put in an upset bid of $5,200. This bid was accompanied by a petition of Mrs. Reger, praying the court to set aside the sale and resell the property. From this decree, the Regers have appealed.

[1] Of the many assignments of error, the most important one is founded upon the failure to make Knopsnyder's executor a party, after discovery of its possession of the $834 note and the manner and purpose of its acquisition. As the bill did not disclose these facts, the demurrer was no doubt properly overruled; but, if the executor was a necessary party, the disclosure of its interest at any stage of the proceeding, no matter in what way, made it necessary for the plaintiff to amend by making the executor a party. As the bill accords to Mrs. Lee the first lien on the property and claims the place of second lienor for the bank, one of its purposes was, after the disclosure of the alleged assignment of the $834 note to Knopsnyder through S. L. Reger, to assert priority of the bank's lien over Knopsnyder's right, if any, as holder of that note, and such was the effect of the decree. Indeed, the decree allowed nothing to anybody on account of the $834 note. It treated that note as having been paid, although it was shown to be in the hands of the executor of Knopsnyder. But for this claim of priority, Knopsnyder's executor might have been omitted, under the authority of Turk v. Skiles, 38 W. Va. 404, 18 S. E. 561, and Arnold v. Coburn, 32 W. Va. 272, 9 S. E. 21, holding it unnecessary, in a suit of this character, to make a lienor under a deed of trust subsequent to the vendor's lien a party, and sufficient to make the trustee a party, so as to bring the legal title before the court. Turk v. Skiles, however, says it is necessary to make the cestui que trust a party, if there is a controversy as to priority between the vendor's lien and the trust lien, on the theory of a waiver or estoppel on the part of the holder of the former in favor of the holder of the latter. Here the question of priority stands upon a ground higher than that of waiver or estoppel. Mrs. Lee admittedly had the first lien for the $834 note. If she assigned it to Reger, and Reger to Knopsnyder, it is clearly entitled to preference over the lien asserted by the bank. There may not be much merit in this claim of assignment; but it is a claim, and an adjudication against it, in the absence of Knopsnyder's executor, cannot bind it. Hence, the failure to make it a party was an obvious error, which will reverse the decree, unless it can be excused upon some ground.

[2] The presence of the trustee in the deed of trust as a party is relied upon as a sufficient excuse, on the theory of his representation of the Knopsnyder debt, secured by the deed of trust, as well as by the $834 note. The deed of trust was such in form and effect as is ordinarily taken to secure a debt and conferred no authority upon the trustee to collect, wherefore he did not represent it. Bryan v. McCann, 55 W. Va. 372, 47 S. E. 143; George, Trustee, v. Zinn, 57 W. Va. 15, 49 S. E. 904, 110 Am. St. Rep. 721. Hence the trust deed debt was not represented, nor was the holder of the $834 note before the court. Though Talbott seems to have filed it with a deposition, he had no title to it, nor right to collect it otherwise than as attorney or agent. Nor did S. L. Reger represent it, although he claimed an equitable right respecting it. For the purposes of adjudication, it was not before the court at all.

Nor do we think Mrs. Reger released or waived the error by asking the court to set aside the sale and resell the property. In every substantial view, this act was one in resistance of the sale, and not an acceptance of the benefit of the decree complained of.

Though the Knopsnyder estate may not be interested in some of the controversies raised by the assignments of error, it is difficult to say how far that interest extends, and, as the decree must be reversed for lack of a necessary party, we refrain from further consideration of the assignments, in conformity with the general rule.

For the error aforesaid, the decree complained of will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with leave to the plaintiff to make Knopsnyder's executor a party and amend its bill.

2. BOUNDARIES (§ 3*)—DESCRIPTION—RELATIVE IMPORTANCE OF CONFLICTING ELEMENTS.

Error to Circuit Court, Summers County.

Action by C. D. Wiley and others against James E. Hatcher and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant James E. Hatcher brings error. Affirmed.

M. F. Matheny and E. C. Eagle, for plaintiff in error. T. N. Read and Farley, Sutphin & Ward, for defendants in error.

ROBINSON, J. Trial of this action in ejectment was had by jury and resulted in a verdict for plaintiffs. Judgment thereupon followed. Defendant assigns error and seeks a reversal.

The whole controversy turns on the location of the true line between a tract of land long in the possession of plaintiffs and an adjoining tract long in the possession of defendant. The parties seem agreed that the line runs from a particular corner. But each side claims a different corner for the other end of the line. So a triangular parcel belongs to one tract or the other, according to the establishment of the corner in dispute. As we shall see, the location of this disputed corner was a matter for the jury to determine, mostly from parol testimony. Their finding is by no means unsupported by the evidence. Certain it is, the finding is not against a clear preponderance of the evidence. The jury were properly instructed. We cannot disturb their verdict.

Plaintiffs' deed calls for the line of defendant's land. Defendant says that plaintiffs are bound by this call of their deed and can claim only to the line of his land. But the question still remains, where is the proper location of the line in relation to defendant's tract? Defendant has not had an enclosure of the disputed territory, nor has he had possession of it to the exclusion of plaintiffs. The greater portion has lain in the common. Indeed plaintiffs long had possession of a part of the disputed territory until defendant entered shortly prior to the beginning of this suit. Plaintiffs are bound by the true location of the line of defendant's tract, since their deed calls for the line of his land, but they are not bound by any location of the line that defendant sees fit to make. If the line is where plaintiffs claim, the disputed parcel is a part of the tract which has long been in their possession under claim and color of their deed.

Their possession of the tract has extended over this parcel also. If the line is where defendant claims, this disputed parcel has been in his possession as a part of his tract, except as to the portion which plaintiffs have actually occupied. Though plaintiffs' deed calls for defendant's line, plaintiffs are entitled to claim their tract to the true location of that line.

[2] Defendant testifies that "the Syms line" is the true line of his land. Deeds in his chain of title, as well as deeds in plaintiffs' chain of title, plainly show that an old line called "the Syms line" is the division line between these two tracts of land. According to defendant's title papers "the Syms line" extends from the corner well established as one end of the line, and as to which there is practically no dispute, to a corner described as "two white oaks on Cooper's Point," a distance of 360 poles. This call for the line is first found in the deed from Beckley to Syms, made in 1842, conveying the land now owned by defendant, where the direction of the line is given as N. 78 E. The later title papers of defendant call for this same line. It appears that "the Syms line" was once called "McDaniel's line," before Syms owned the land. In plaintiffs' title papers there is a deed from Beckley to Cooper, made in 1835, which calls for this line as "Mr. McDaniel's line on Cooper's Point." Then the deed from Cooper to Meador, conveying the land which plaintiffs now own, calls for the line as "John Simses line on Cooper's Point." Clearly, "the Syms line" is the division line between the land of plaintiffs and the land of defendant. There can be no question as to the location of the corner for one end of the line. The testimony of the county surveyor as to the location of that corner sufficiently establishes it. Indeed defendant accepts the location of that corner, but insists that the line shall run from it to a corner other than the one claimed by plaintiffs. The controversy narrows to a dispute over the location of the end of the line at the corner called for "on Cooper's Point." The testimony establishes a sharp point of the mountain to be Cooper's Point. Old citizens of the vicinity testify that this particular spot has been known by the name for many years. Cooper's Point is found and by the evidence unquestionably established. But the "two white oaks" are not found on it. Nor does the course of the line when run to it fit the direction call in the old Syms deed. It is N. 65—¾ E., whereas with proper variation from the old call it should be N. 82 E. The distance of 360 poles, however, fits exactly. When the line is run N. 82 E. 360 poles, it goes far off from Cooper's Point, but reaches a small marked white oak on a ridge. Defendant contends that this is the proper corner and that the place is Cooper's Point. The parol evidence is clearly against his contention in this particular. Besides, when the line is run to that place it must improperly go far across another division line of plaintiffs' land and must eliminate one of the lines of plaintiffs' survey as well as a clearly marked and well established corner of the same. If the line is run to the place established by the old people as Cooper's Point, it fits with adjoining surveys. When the survey of plaintiffs' tract was made in 1835, Cooper's Point was recognized therein as being far to the left of the place where defendant now contends it should be found. It was then recognized as being to the left of the clearly marked and well established corner which defendant would now eliminate or disregard. All the witnesses well qualified to testify in the particular, old men speaking from the notoriety of early days, locate Cooper's Point where this early survey of plaintiffs' land located it.

Defendant relies on the fact that he has shown a small marked white oak at the end of the line when run on the course for which the old deed calls, while the two white oaks that are called for "on Cooper's Point" are not there. The evidence as to the marks on the small white oak and as to its age is of doubtful consequence. At any rate, that tree is not "on Cooper's Point." It can have no standing as a corner since it is not at the place it should be. The line calls not simply for white oaks. Those white oaks to be recognized as corner trees for the line must be "on Cooper's Point." That place is a natural monument that cannot be disregarded. True, the white oaks are not found "on Cooper's Point," but there is no evidence in the case that they were never there. There has been ample time for them to disappear since 1842. Defendant does not even undertake to prove that the white oaks as called for were never since the date of the deed at the place which the witnesses establish as Cooper's Point. Trees naturally fall, decay and disappear, but the point of a mountain is eternal in its existence.

[1] In locating the boundaries of land, ordinarily course and distance must yield to a call for a natural monument. Chief Justice Marshall said: "All lands are supposed to be actually surveyed, and the intention of the grant is to convey the land according to that actual survey; consequently if marked trees and marked corners be found conformable to the calls of the patent, or mountains or any other natural objects, distances must be lengthened or shortened, and courses varied so as to conform to those objects." McIver v. Walker, 9 Cranch, 173, 3 L. Ed. 694. In the case before us, it is only the course that must yield. The distance fits the call for the natural monument—the sharp point of the mountain. The course can be changed or disregarded, but the fixed location of the point of a mountain cannot be moved to another place. The evidence abundantly establishes the location of each of the corners pertaining to "the Syms line." That line must be drawn between them. The jury most properly so found. The words of Judge Tucker are appropriate here: "If a patent or deed refer to any notorious landmarks, or natural boundaries, which cannot be mistaken, and are not liable to change or decay, as the corners or angles of a plat, such notorious landmarks are to be regarded as termini, from whence straight lines are to be run from one to the other, without regard to the correspondence of either course or distance, which may in such cases be mistaken in the deed." Dogan v. Seekright, 4 Hen. & M. (Va.) 130.

[3] It was not incumbent on plaintiffs to trace their title to the commonwealth. The testimony sufficiently shows that they, and those under whom they hold, have been in the continuous exclusive possession of the tract to which the disputed parcel belongs for a period much longer than the statutory bar. That possession extended to the bounds of their deed. It extended to "the Syms line." They were in possession of the tract claiming to that line. They may recover in ejectment under such circumstances without establishing a chain of paper title running to the commonwealth. Rifle v. Skinner, 67 W. Va. 75, 67 S. E. 1075.

An order will be entered affirming the judgment.

3. RAILROADS (§ 91*)—CROSSINGS—PROCEEDINGS TO TAKE PROPERTY—CONDITIONS PRECEDENT.

Such decree of a court of equity, obtained pursuant to section 11, c. 52, Code 1906, is a prerequisite condition to the exercise of the right of one railroad company to cross, at grade or otherwise, the right of way or tracks of another railroad company given by paragraph 7 of section 50, c. 54, Code 1906, or to institute a suit to condemn such crossing pursuant to section 48 of said chapter. *Approving Railroad Co. v. Appeal from and Error to Circuit Court, Logan County.

Bill in equity by the Island Creek Railroad Company against the Logan & Southern Railway Company. From a decree for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Condemnation proceedings by the Logan & Southern Railway Company against the Island Creek Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Reversed, and petition dismissed, without prejudice.

Vinson & Thompson, for appellant and plaintiff in error. Campbell, Brown & Davis and Brown, Jackson & Knight, for appellee and defendant in error.

MILLER, J. The bill of the Island Creek Railroad Company, which on demurrer was dismissed, for want of equity, sought: First, to enjoin the Logan & Southern Railway Company, from prosecuting its proceeding at law to condemn a crossing at grade over plaintiff's railroad, at two points proposed in its petition: Second, to require the Logan & Southern Company, to construct and maintain an overhead crossing, over its track, in place of the proposed grade crossings: Third, to have the court fix the place, plans and specifications, and the terms upon which such overhead crossing should be made, and thereby waiving right to compensation for the use of its lands taken therefor, and damages to the residue occasioned thereby: And, fourth, general relief.

The Logan & Southern Company, by its petition, professing to be proceeding pursuant to the seventh paragraph of section 50, c. 54, Code 1906, and section 48, of that chapter, as provided by the former, alleging its inability to agree with defendant upon the amount of compensation, or upon the points or manner of crossing, sought to have the court in that proceeding ascertain and determine that petitioner was entitled to cross or intersect the right of way and track of defendant at grade, at the two points, and substantially in the manner shown by exhibits filed with its petition; and to have commissioners appointed, as provided by law, to ascertain a just compensation to defendant for said crossings or intersections, to be made by petitioner, and that upon payment thereof, the title and right to such crossings or intersections, and each of them might be vested in petitioner, and for such further relief as the court might deem proper in the premises.

The points and manner of the proposed crossings, as the petition shows, were those which petitioner, without agreement or consultation with the condemnee, had arbitrarily chosen, and the petition contains no allegation, nor was it claimed or proven on the trial, that before the filing thereof, the points and manner of making the proposed crossings or intersections had been decreed to petitioner by suit in equity, as provided by section 11, c. 52, Code 1906. On the contrary it was conceded that no such decree had been procured.

Among the numerous defenses pleaded by defendant, one is that although petitioner had been requested by it to institute a suit in equity, pursuant to said section 11, of chapter 52, for the purpose of procuring a decree, adjudging, ascertaining and specifying the place, method and manner of making said crossings, in order that justice might be done to both parties, petitioner had failed and refused to do so, and it pleads the want of such decree in bar of said action at law.

On the hearing, upon pleadings and proofs, the court below on July 29, 1910, pronounced the judgment complained of, that the petitioner had lawful right to cross or intersect at grade the right of way and track of the defendant at the two points proposed in its petition, and shown upon the plats or maps exhibited therewith; that said crossings and each of them were necessary for its purposes, and will be used therefor, and that said crossings respectively should be located, constructed, maintained and operated as described in said petition, and shown upon said maps or plats, respectively. By the same judgment commissioners were also appointed to ascertain a just compensation to defendant therefor.

By stipulation of counsel both cases have been conjointly argued and submitted for decision, and both will be disposed of in this opinion.

[1] First we will dispose of the appeal from the decree dismissing the bill of the Island Creek Company. Appellant seeks to support that bill upon two principal grounds, viz.: First, on its alleged right, as a condition precedent, to have the points and manner of the proposed crossings or connections decreed by a court of equity, pursuant to said section 11, of chapter 52; second, on the broad general ground of equity jurisdiction to prevent by injunction, irreparable injury to its plant and property, by the proposed crossings, which it is alleged can not be adequately and justly compensated in damages, and as an overhead crossing is practicable, the proposed grade crossings are wholly unnecessary, unreasonably burdensome, and practically destructive of its property and franchises.

It is contended also, and we are disposed to so hold, in giving proper construction to our particular statutes, that it is a condition precedent to the right of one railroad company desiring to cross at grade or otherwise the right of way and tracks of another railroad company, and before a suit in condemnation will lie, that it should first obtain a decree in equity, fixing the points and manner and the terms and conditions of making such crossing or connection. It follows, therefore, as a necessary corollary, that the absence of such decree and of allegation and proof thereof, constitutes a complete and adequate defense at law, and there being such defense at law there is no jurisdiction in equity to grant the relief prayed for in the bill. This proposition is elementary, and it has been distinctly applied by this court in a case similar to this. Railroad Co. v. Railroad Co., 56 W. Va. 453, 49 S. E. 532. The basis of this holding will be further considered in disposing of the writ of error to the judgment in the condemnation suit.

[2] But has equity jurisdiction, as claimed by counsel, on broader equitable grounds? We have considered all the numerous specifications of fact alleged as constituting irreparable injury, and as a reason for requiring defendant to make an overhead crossing, and to require the crossing to be made differently from those proposed in the petition in condemnation, and so far as we can see all of them entitled to consideration, can be available as a defense, or as advice to the court on bill filed, to determine the character and manner of the crossings that should be made by the condemnor. This being so, and we do not perceive any reason why it should be otherwise, the proper and only place to present all these matters is to the court having jurisdiction to decree the points and manner, and the terms and conditions of making such crossings, for we hold that one railroad company can not condemn a crossing at grade or otherwise, over the right of way or tracks of another company, until it has obtained a decree as the basis of its suit to condemn, and that until such decree has been obtained the defense to any action by it seeking to cross in any manner the tracks of the other company is ample and complete. Our opinion, therefore, is that the bill in this case was properly dismissed and that the decree below should be affirmed.

[3] We have next to dispose of the writ of error to the judgment of condemnation. We have already indicated our opinion that that judgment must be reversed. If as we hold the decree of a court of equity defining the points and manner of crossings and connections, and the terms and conditions on which they may be made, is a prerequisite condition to a suit to condemn the same, authorized by said paragraph 7 of section 50, c. 54 of the Code, the want of such decree, pleaded by defendant, constitutes a complete defense to the petitioner's action, and we need not, and should not further consider the many other grounds of defense alleged; they are substantially the same as those alleged in the bill of the condemnnee company, and as we said of those so we may say of these, they are all the proper subjects of consideration by the court on bill filed pursuant to said section 11, c. 52 of the Code, and should not be prejudged on this writ of error.

Counsel for the Logan and Southern Company, however, earnestly controvert the proposition that a decree in equity was a prerequisite condition to its suit to condemn. It is conceded that such course was open to it, but that it had right of election of remedies, and that having chosen the more speedy and expedient proceeding by petition in condemnation, given by said section 50, c. 54 of the Code, it can not be denied relief in the legal forum, because the equitable remedy was also open to it. His argument in support of his theory of plenary and concurrent remedy at law, is based on the claim that paragraph seven of said section 50 of chapter 54, is a particular provision, applicable alone to securing a crossing by one railroad company over the right of way and tracks of another railroad company, an absolute right, as it is claimed, and of which it can not be denied, given by said section; while the provisions of said section 11 of chapter 52, are general, and applicable to other classes of public service corporations, and that for this reason, and because the former statute is also the later statute, if there is conflict or inconsistency the earlier and more general statute must yield to the later and special law, on the theory of implied repeal or modification by the later statute. The well recognized canons of construction, laid down by Sutherland on Statutory Construction (2d Ed.) §§ 274-276; Winn, Adm'r, etc., v. Jones, 6 Leigh (Va.) 74; Justice v. Commonwealth, 81 Va. 211; For's Adm'r v. Commonwealth, 16 Grat. (Va.) 1; Hogan v. Guilgon, 29 Grat. (Va.) 710; Conley v. Supervisors, 2 W. Va. 416; Shields & Preston v. Bennett, 8 W. Va. 74; and Hawkins v. Bare & Carter, 63 W. Va. 431, 436, 437, 60 S. E. 391—are invoked by counsel in support of his contentions. In our opinion, however, a proper construction of said paragraph seven of said section 50, does not require application of these rules of construction. Section 11 of chapter 52, does not furnish a concurrent remedy. It is simply a provision of the statute for establishing by decree the place and manner of crossings and connections. Resort must then be had to a suit at law to condemn the right to cross or connect as decreed. Said section 11, of chapter 52, constitutes a curb on the arbitrary power of one railroad company to cross at will property already devoted to public use. Equity and justice require such judicial ascertainment. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co. v. C. W. & M. Ry. Co., 116 Ind. 578, 582, 19 N. E. 440.

We can not construe said paragraph 7 as it is construed by counsel for the petitioner, and we think the rules invoked, for the most part, inapplicable. Said paragraph 7 is contained in the chapter relating to "Joint Stock Companies," and for what purposes they may be incorporated, etc. The first section of that chapter is pertinent; it provides: "Joint Stock Companies, incorporated under this chapter, shall be subject to the provisions of the fifty-second and fifty-third chapters of the Code, so far as the same are applicable." The particular provision of that paragraph relied on by counsel, as giving plenary and concurrent remedy is: "If the two corporations cannot agree upon the amount of compensation to be made therefor, or the points and manner of such crossing and connections, the same shall be ascertained and determined in the manner prescribed by section forty-eight of this chapter." When we turn to section 48, however, we do not find there any specific provision for determining the points and manner of making such crossing or connections. The only pertinent provision of that section is: "If any railroad corporation shall be unable to agree with the owner of any real estate for the purchase thereof for its corporate purposes, it may have such real estate condemned for such purposes under the provisions of chapter forty-two of the Code." Chapter 42 is the general statute relating to the taking of land without the owner's consent for public use, but there is no provision of this chapter specifically covering this subject. The provisions of this chapter are general, applying to all cases where land of a private person may be taken for public use. It is not distinctly claimed, however, that under said paragraph 7 the Logan & Southern Company, though in terms given the right thereby "to cross at grade or to cross over or under" the right of way and track of the Island Creek Company, that this right is wholly an arbitrary right; but it is insisted that in so far as it can be controlled as to the points and manner of such crossings and connections, the court on its law side, is empowered, by virtue of said paragraph 7 of section 50 to determine the points and manner of such crossings and connections, and that its rights and those of defendant can be as fully protected in that forum as by a prior decree in equity. Is this a correct interpretation of our statutes? If it is we can see no practical purpose of section 11 of chapter 52; for if a decree in equity pursuant to that section is not a prerequisite condition to the right to condemn a crossing or connection over the right of way of another railroad, the condemnor even after obtaining such decree would not be bound to adopt it, perhaps. Nothing but res judicata, if applicable, could prevent it from disregarding the decree. If said section 48 did in fact make specific provision for determining the points and manner of crossings and connections, there would be force in the position of counsel; but there being no such specific provision, it seems to us necessary in order to give true interpretation to said paragraph 7, and as we are plainly told to do by the first section of the same chapter, to declare it subject to section 11 of chapter 52, for it is clearly applicable, and if we read the provisions of that section into section 48, as it seems to us we must do, the way in which the points and manner of securing such crossings and connections, is clearly indicated, there is harmony and no conflict in these statutes. The proceedings provided by chapter 42, on the law side of the court, limited as the applicant and defendant are by the pleadings in such proceedings, are not sufficiently elastic to vary the points and manner of the crossings and connections sought to be condemned, to conform to the equitable rights of the parties; hence the necessity for the prior decree of a court of equity, enforceable against the parties, and limiting them, in proceedings to condemn, to the provisions and requirements thereof. Railroad Co. v. Traction Co., 56 W. Va. 18, 48 S. E. 746, was a suit in equity filed pursuant to said section 11 of chapter 52, to obtain a decree fixing the point and manner of crossing at grade the railway track of the defendant company, but framed on the theory also that the court had jurisdiction, which was denied, to condemn the property, decreed to be taken. In that case the history of said section 11 is gone into, and it is distinctly decided, with reference to that history, that in case of disagreement, though the right to cross must be obtained by condemnation under the general law, yet that it is a prerequisite condition to the enforcement of that right, that a decree in equity be obtained designating the place at which and the manner in which the crossing desired shall be made. This construction of these statutes was followed approvingly by Dayton, Judge, in Elkins Electric Ry. Co. v. Western Maryland R. Co. (C. C.) 163 Fed. 724. But it is said our later case of Railroad Co. v. Railroad Co., 56 W. Va. 458, 49 S. E. 532, is in conflict with this rule. The first point of the syllabus in that case may be susceptible of that interpretation, but the point was not necessarily involved in that case, and the point ought not be so interpreted. That was a suit, as was the equity suit disposed of in this opinion, by one railroad company against another to enjoin condemnation proceedings at law, and was disposed of in the same way, denying equity jurisdiction by injunction to stay the proceeding at law, on the ground, according to the body of that opinion, of complete remedy at law. Limited as herein, the two points of the syllabus in that case, are correct legal propositions; but we can not approve the interpretation put upon them by counsel for the Logan & Southern Company. The construction given in Railway Company v. Traction Co., supra, and followed in this opinion we regard the true construction of our statutes, and the only one consonant with reason, and the purposes and objects which the Legislature intended in enacting them. In those Code states, with statutes similar to our own, but where law and equity are administered under one form of proceeding, and where commissioners are authorized to go upon the ground, and to determine the points and manner of making crossings and connections, the rule may be different. See Railroad Co. v. Railroad Co., 72 Mich. 206, 40 N. W. 436; In re St. Paul & Northern Pacific Ry. Co., 37 Minn. 164, 33 N. W. 701; In re Minneapolis & St. Louis Ry. Co., 36 Minn. 481, 32 N. W. 556; St. Louis Transfer Ry. Co. v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co., 100 Mo. 419, 13 S. W. 710; In re Lockport & Buffalo R. R. Co., 77 N. Y. 557; and Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. Leavenworth N. & S. Ry. Co. (C. C.) 29 Fed. 728.

Our conclusion is, therefore, to reverse the judgment below, and to dismiss the petition, but to be without prejudice, however, to any new and proper proceedings brought to vindicate the rights of defendant in error.

POLING et al. v. PICKENS et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 12, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 80*)—PLEADING—DECLARATION.

A declaration for slander in charging the plaintiff with swearing a lie, not stating that the plaintiff made the false statement in a legal proceeding, and not stating that she was under oath when making the statement, is not good as a declaration for common-law slander;

but as it avers that the slanderous words according to their usual construction and common acceptation are construed as insults and tend to violence and breach of the peace, it is good as a declaration for insulting words under Code of 1906, c. 103, § 2, and is not subject to demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. §§ 184-186; Dec. Dig. § 80.*]

2. ACTION (§ 38*)—SINGLE CAUSE OF ACTION.

A declaration in an action for slander in the usual form of a declaration for common-law slander, reciting the good character and reputation of the plaintiff, and malicious intent of the defendant to injure the good name and reputation of the plaintiff, and alleging damage to it from the act of the defendant, thus importing to be an action for common-law slander, yet averring that the words spoken, according to their usual construction and common acceptation, are construed as insults, and tend to violence and breach of the peace, thus showing that the action is for statutory slander under Code of 1906, c. 103, § 2, is a declaration for statutory slander, and not open to the charge that it unites in the same count the two kinds of slander. The recital of good character and injury to it is treated as inducement and surplusage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Action, Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

3. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 102*)—TORTS OF WIFE—LIABILITY OF HUSBAND.

A husband is liable for slander by his wife, whether present or not, notwithstanding the married woman's separate estate act.

Error to Circuit Court, Upshur County.

Action by Matilda J. Poling and another against Emma V. Pickens and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

John Bassel and C. O. Higginbotham, for plaintiffs in error. Wm. S. O'Brien and J. M. N. Downes, for defendants in error.

BRANNON, J. Matilda J. Poling and Lewis W. Poling, her husband, sued Emma V. Pickens and Robert Pickens, her husband, in the circuit court of Upshur county for slander of Matilda Poling by Emma Pickens, and there was a verdict for the plaintiffs and judgment thereon. We have a writ of error from that judgment.

[1] The plaintiffs in error assign it as error that the demurrer to the declaration, consisting of one count, was overruled. The declaration avers that the plaintiff Matilda J. Poling was a true and honest citizen, and had always well behaved herself, and until the wrong imputed by the defendant was always reputed, esteemed, and accepted by her neighbors and other good citizens to whom she was known to be a person of good name, fame and credit, and had obtained the good opinion of her neighbors and other good citizens to whom she was known; and that Emma V. Pickens, well knowing the premises, but contriving and maliciously intending to insult Matilda J. Poling and injure her good name, fame and credit, and to bring her into public scandal, infamy, and disgrace, and to cause it to be believed by her neighbors and other citizens that she had been guilty of telling falsehoods, and being otherwise a mean and unworthy citizen, did on the — June, 1907, in the county of Upshur, in the presence and hearing of Lewis W. Poling, her husband, and other good citizens, falsely and maliciously, and with the intention to insult said plaintiff, speak and publish of and concerning Matilda Poling the false, scandalous, malicious, defamatory, and insulting words, which the plaintiff avers to be in their usual construction and common acceptance construed as insults, and tend to violence and breach of the peace—that is to say, "You" (meaning the plaintiff Matilda J. Poling) "go down town and swear another lie on me" (meaning that the said plaintiff Matilda J. Poling had sworn a lie on her, the said Emma V. Pickens)—by means of which the plaintiff was injured, etc. It is said this declaration is not good. It is said it was error to join the husband of Matilda Poling as a plaintiff. This point is not argued. It is well established that at common law the husband may join his wife in an action in tort by her.

[2] The frame of this declaration reads as if the action were for common-law slander injurious to the name, fame and reputation of Matilda Poling, and has words in it treating the words used as actionable under section 2, c. 103, Code 1906, saying that "all words which from their usual construction and common acceptance are construed as insults, and tend to violence and breach of the peace, shall be actionable. No demurrer shall preclude a jury from passing thereon." If I understand the point made against the declaration, it is that it joins common-law slander and statutory slander in the same count. I do not consider this mode of framing a declaration as very good pleading or artistic pleading. Statutory slander, if of a character to insult and produce anger and breach of the peace, gives action, though it may not impute legal crime, or injure fame or reputation, but merely insults, and therefore I would think that the declaration should merely state that the defendant spoke certain words of and concerning the plaintiff maliciously and unlawfully, with an averment that they were such words as from their usual construction and common acceptance are construed as insults and tend to violence and breach of peace. All allegations of the plaintiff's good character and of intent on the part of the defendant to defame it and allegation of injury there-to seem useless and out of place in actions for statutory slander; but eminent writers on pleadings, Minor, Barton, and Hogg give the forms used in this case. Their forms follow the precedents for common-law slander, with the addition of words suggested above, indicating that the action is one for statutory slander. These precedents are based on decisions holding that words of common-law slander, sufficient to sustain action, may still be treated as ground for action under this statute. Under that statute, words of a character to insult and tending to violence and breach of the peace, though not actionable at common law, are so under the statute; but words actionable at common law may also be made the subject of action under that statute if the declaration contain words, as this declaration plainly does, showing that the action is for statutory slander. Sweeney v. Baker, 13 W. Va. 158, point 5, 31 Am. Rep. 757; Payne v. Tancil, 98 Va. 262, 35 S. E. 725; Chaffin v. Lynch, 83 Va. 106, 1 S. E. 808. There it is said that in an action for statutory slander so much of the declaration as follows the common-law form of declaration for slander is mere matter of inducement, and unobjectionable. I would say it is surplusage. It is claimed that from the frame of the declaration above given we must say that this declaration joins both common-law and statutory slander, which is forbidden by decisions. Moseley v. Moss, 6 Grat. (Va.) 534; Hogan v. Wilmoth, 16 Grat. (Va.) 80; Payne v. Tancil, 98 Va. 262, 35 S. E. 725. But this declaration is not open to an objection of blending common-law and purely statutory slander. That rule against blending means where you put into the same count common-law slanderous words and words not such, but only insulting words, not actionable at common law. We have just shown that a declaration going for insulting words under the statute may contain only words constituting common-law slander, and it cannot be in this case that there is a blending of the two kinds of slander. The most that can be said against this declaration is that it declares on the words as if actionable at common law. It contains only the slanderous words above given, no other words of different character of slander. How can it be said to unite two kinds of slander? In an action under the statute for common-law slander your declaration must show that the action is under the statute by averment to the effect that such words from their usual construction and common acceptance are construed as insults and tend to violence and breach of peace, or some averment of that import. Hogan v. Wilmoth, 16 Grat. (Va.) 80. This declaration does so, thus showing that the action is under the statute.

There is another reason against the demurrer. For this reason we need not have considered the demurrer. As stated above this declaration declares on its face that it goes for statutory slander. For that reason we must consider it such. But there is another reason requiring us to consider it so. It does not allege that Matilda Poling was sworn when she made the alleged false statement, or that it was made in a judicial proceeding, or that it was material. As stated in the opinion at its opening in Brooks v. Calloway, 12 Leigh (Va.) 470, it is therefore not a good declaration for common-law slander. Hogan v. Wilmoth, 16 Grat. (Va.) 80. The declaration therefore is to be viewed as one under the statute. This being so, the statute prohibits a demurrer from preventing a jury to pass on the words spoken. This declaration is really for insulting words hurting the feelings, causing anger and violence and breach of the peace. No demurrer lies to this declaration, as would be the case if it were for common-law slander only, without showing that it is filed under the statute, or if it united two kinds of slander in one count. Whether the words spoken are an insult under the statute is to be left to the jury.

[3] Another question. Judgment was rendered against Emma Pickens and her husband for words spoken by the wife. The rule of the common law is that the husband is liable for slander by the wife. It is contended that this is no longer in our time the law, owing to the acts providing for the separate estate of the wife and the rights to sue and be sued and to contract. The authorities conflict on this question, but preponderance of authorities is that the rule of the common law yet prevails. In obiter expressions in Gill v. State, 39 W. Va. 479, 20 S. E. 568, 28 L. R. A. 655, 45 Am. St. Rep. 923, and Withrow v. Smithson, 37 W. Va. 761, 17 S. E. 316, 19 L. R. A. 762. I condemn this rule, but held it yet prevailing in this state. These dicta were given force of law in Kellar v. James, 63 W. Va. 139, 59 S. E. 939, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1003, in which case Judge Poffenbarger carefully discussed the question. We are asked to reconsider the matter. We decline to rediscuss it. The authorities are given in those cases. I cite the case of Henley v. Wilson, 137 Cal. 273, 70 Pac. 21, 58 L. R. A. 941, 92 Am. St. Rep. 160, holding the common-law rule still in force, notwithstanding the married women's act. An elaborate note to that case condemns the rule, but admits it to be law. I refer also to volume 9, p. 1225, of that late valuable work, Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. where we find a full note of cases in many states holding that the old odious rule of the common law making the husband liable for the torts of the wife still prevails, and that action therefore must be brought against both, and judgment rendered against both. In 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) our case of Kellar v. James is elaborately annotated, giving diverse authorities. Our Legislature, in my own opinion, should abrogate the rule that the husband is liable for independent torts of the wife. I have no reference in what is said above to torts by a wife as to her separate property.

We affirm the judgment.

Va. January 14, 1907. This is to certify that Mike Agnic has bargained to buy from H. Broemsen Helra, per L. A. Rolf, agent, their agent, the property known as 2648 Main Street, for the sum of $2300.00 to be paid as follows: $100.00 cash in hand, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, the balance $—— to be paid or arranged for on tender of a good general warranty and safe deed. [Signed] H. Broemsen Heirs [Seal], by L. A. Rolf, Agent. Michael Agnic, [Seal.]"

That defendant made the contract, and that appellees, through their agent or attorney, on or about February —, 1907, tendered to defendant or his authorized agent, a deed for the property purchased, and exhibited or tendered with the bill, dated January 15, 1907, and purporting to convey to him with covenants of general warranty "all their right, title, interest, claim or demand, whatsoever in and to" said lot, and that plaintiff's title is good, are facts alleged in the bill, not specifically denied in the answer, and are fully proven by the evidence. There is evidence that defendant's attorney, after the deed was tendered made some captious objections to the title, but the evidence shows they were without substantial merit.

[1] The decree below is first attacked on the ground of alleged uncertainty of the contract: First, in failing to fix a time for execution of the deed, the tender thereof, to whom to be tendered, and the payment of the purchase money; in other words that the contract was not binding on appellees, and upon the principles of Eclipse Oil Co. v. South Penn Oil Co., 47 W. Va. 84, 34 S. E. 923, was void for want of mutuality, and not binding on appellant. There is nothing in this position, and the case cited is inapt. The rule is that where no time is specified, and unless time is of the essence of the contract, not made so by this contract, a reasonable time is always implied.

[2] Second, it is said the contract is uncertain as to parties, and therefore void, being signed "H. Broemsen Heirs, by L. A. Rolf, Agent," the names of the heirs not being given, and that as it appears H. Broemsen disposed of his property by will, his devisees and not his heirs could sell and convey the same. We see no merit in this point. It is true a contract must be reasonably certain as to parties, as well as to subject matter. Hissam v. Parrish, 41 W. Va. 686, 24 S. E. 600, 56 Am. St. Rep. 892; Pomeroy on Contracts (2d Ed.) §147. But reasonable certainty is all that is required. H. Broemsen's heirs made the contract reasonably certain as to the vendors; besides it was not necessary that the contract should be signed by the principals, it being signed by an agent authorized to make it on their behalf. Armstrong v. Coal Co., 67 W. Va. 589, 598, 39 S. E. 195, and authorities cited. The fact that the contract was made on behalf of "H. Broemsen Heirs," when it appears the property had been devised by H. Broemsen to his wife, Georgine Broemsen, and that though heirs of both, the vendors had derived the property directly from their mother and not from the father will not relieve defendant from performance of his contract. Blaisdell v. Morse, 73 Me. 542; David v. Williams- burgh City Fire Ins. Co., 83 N. Y. 265, 38 Am. Rep. 418. The erroneous description by which parties undertake to sell, or convey land makes no difference, if as individuals they have the right and title to sell and convey. Williams v. Hardie (Tex. Civ. App.) 21 S. W. 267.

[3] Another point of attack is that appellees were guilty of laches, and therefore not entitled to specific performance of the contract. It is claimed they failed to show themselves ready, desirous, prompt and eager to perform the contract on their part. We see no merit in this contention. The bill and evidence shows reasonable promptness in making and tendering a deed. While the deed may have been technically objectionable, the vendors appear to have been ready, able and eager to make a good deed, if the one tendered was not satisfactory in form. The evidence satisfies us that appellant did not intend to execute the contract on his part, and that a deed in any form would not have been accepted. Plaintiffs brought the suit within a reasonable time after defendant's refusal to perform the contract on his part. There is nothing in the delay to sue or in the facts and circumstances pleaded or relied on in defense to show any intent to abandon the contract, or excuse the performance of the contract by defendant, so as to bring the case within the rule of Harrison v. Harrison, 36 W. Va. 558, 15 S. E. 87; Bluestone Coal Co. v. Bell, 38 W. Va. 297, 18 S. E. 493; or Gish's Ex'r v. Jamison, 96 Va. 312, 31 S. E. 521, relied on by defendant's counsel.

[4] Lastly it is objected to the decree that a good deed such as the contract called for, was not tendered before suit, or with the bill. Defendant had declined to perform the contract before suit on other grounds than the objectionable form of the deed, which we think were not well founded. The rule is, that if before decree a vendor is able to tender a good and sufficient deed this will suffice for a decree of specific performance. Armstrong v. Coal Co., supra; Tavener v. Barrett, 21 W. Va. 656; Vaught v. Cain, 31 W. Va. 424, 7 S. E. 9. A writ of certiorari awarded here has brought up as a part of the record, a deed identified by the endorsement of the clerk of the circuit court as the deed tendered at the time of the final decree appealed from. This deed we think good in form and in strict compliance with the contract. No objection to it for want of form or substance is pointed out on the hearing here. Appellant was thereby given choice of the two deeds, the one tendered before suit, and with the bill, or the one tendered at the date of the decree.

We have found no substantial error therein, for which the decree appealed from should be reversed, and our conclusion is that it should be affirmed.

ELLISON v. STATE.

{Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 13, 1911.}

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 107*)—JUSTIFICATION—REASONABLE FEAR.

The doctrine of reasonable fears as a defense does not apply to any case of homicide where the danger apprehended is not urgent and pressing, or apparently so, at the time of the killing. Jackson v. State, 91 Ga. 271, 18 S. E. 298, 44 Am. St. Rep. 22; Williams v. State, 120 Ga. 870, 873, 48 S. E. 368.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 137; Dec. Dig. § 107.*]

2. HOMICIDE (§ 146*)—PRESUMPTIONS AND BURDEN OF PROOF—MALICE.

The law relating to the presumption of malice arising from proof of a voluntary homicide, where the evidence adduced to establish the homicide does not negative the existence of malice, and relating to the burden of proof to show circumstances of alleviation or justification, unless they appear from the evidence adduced against the accused, is settled by the decision in Mann v. State, 124 Ga. 760, 53 S. E. 324, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 934, and cases following it. Delk v. State, 135 Ga. 312, 69 S. E. 541.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 265-271; Dec. Dig. § 146.*]

3. HOMICIDE (§ 185*)—INSTRUCTIONS—JUSTIFICATION.

Where one indicted for murder relied on the defense of acting under the fears of a reasonable man, under Pen. Code 1910, § 71, which declares that "a bare fear of any of those offenses, to prevent which the homicide is alleged to have been committed shall not be sufficient to justify the killing, but the circumstances must be such as to excite the fears of a reasonable man," there was no error in giving in charge section 70, defining justifiable homicide in defense against one who manifestly intends or endeavors, by violence or surprise to commit a felony upon the person of the slayer, in order that the jury might understand the reference to "a bare fear of any of those offenses," in the section first cited.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 185.*]

4. HOMICIDE (§ 101*)—JUSTIFICATION—PROVOCATION.

While a husband may be justified in killing another man, if necessary to prevent the latter from committing rape on the wife of the former, he will not be justified at a later day in killing the other person in revenge for a previous attempt to commit rape upon his wife. Hill v. State, 64 Ga. 453; Futch v. State, 90 Ga. 472, 480, 16 S. E. 102; O'Shields v. State, 125 Ga. 310, 54 S. E. 120; Mize v. State, 135 Ga. 291, 297, 69 S. E. 173.

(a) The facts in Biggs v. State, 29 Ga. 723, 76 Am. Dec. 630, and the points actually decided, were different from a case involving killing merely in revenge for a past offense. The language used in the discussion in that case has been considered, and held not to conflict with later rulings, so as to override them. Wilkinson v. State, 91 Ga. 729, 733, 17 S. E. 990, 44 Am. St. Rep. 63; Gossett v. State, 123 Ga. 431, 435, 51 S. E. 394.

(b) The charge of the court on this subject was quite as favorable as the plaintiff could have asked, if not more favorable to him than he was entitled to have given.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 101.*]

5. HOMICIDE (§ 45*)—MANSLAUGHTER—PROVOCATION.

In determining whether a homicide shall be reduced from murder to voluntary manslaughter, on the ground that the slayer acted without malice and under the excitement of passion justified by the circumstances, provocation by words, threats, menaces, or contemptuous gestures, will not be sufficient to reduce the homicide to manslaughter. Pen. Code 1910, § 65.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 69; Dec. Dig. § 45.*]

6. HOMICIDE (§ 309*)—INSTRUCTIONS—JUSTIFICATION.

Where the judge charged the law in reference to justification if the slayer acted under the fears of a reasonable man in accordance with Pen. Code 1910, § 71, and also charged the law touching voluntary manslaughter and the reduction of the homicide from murder to manslaughter in accordance with Pen. Code 1910, § 65, it furnishes no ground for reversal that he failed, in connection with the latter charge, to specifically instruct the jury as to what consideration might be given to threats and menaces in connection with the doctrine of reasonable fears. Futch v. State (Nov. 14, 1911) 137 Ga. —, 72 S. E. 911.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 309.*]

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 824*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS.

A failure to charge in regard to the consideration to be given by the jury to evidence of good character of the defendant, in the absence of a request for such a charge, will not require a reversal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1996-2004; Dec. Dig. § 824.*]

8. NO ERROR.

While some of the rulings of which complaint was made were to some degree subject to criticism in the light of the evidence and of the entire charge, none of them were such as to require a reversal.

WILLIAMS v. MAYOR AND COUNCIL OF CITY OF BRUNSWICK.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 13, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PURPOSE OF ACTION—RECOVERY OF DAMAGES.

This was an action for damages, in which the only recovery sought was for the loss of rents which plaintiff's property would have earned had the conduct of the municipality, of which complaint was made, not occurred, and for attorney's fees in prosecuting an injunction suit to prevent the conduct alleged to be unlawful.

2. TRESPASS (§ 16*)—NATURE OF ACTION.

The petition cannot be properly construed as one setting forth a cause of action for trespass. Fulton Grocery Co. v. Maddox, 111 Ga. 260 (2), 36 S. E. 647.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trespass, Dec. Dig. § 16.*]

3. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§§ 49, 50*)—PROCESS (§ 168*)—ABUSE OF PROCESS—SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION.

The action was founded on either a malicious use of legal process, or the malicious abuse of such process, or both. Under either construction the petition was fatally defective, because: (a) As an action for the malicious use of process, there was no allegation that the process or legal proceedings on behalf of the municipality which caused the damage to the plaintiff was maliciously and without probable cause employed by the defendant. (b) As a suit for the malicious abuse of process, it was not alleged that the process or legal proceedings employed by the defendant, with the alleged damaging result to plaintiff, were employed for any specified unlawful object, and not for the purposes which they were designed by law to accomplish. For discussions relative to actions for malicious "use" and malicious "abuse" of legal process, see Brantley v. Rhodes-Haverty Furniture Co., 131 Ga. 276 (1-2), 62 S. E. 222, and citations.

4. DISMISSAL OF PETITION.

The judge did not err in dismissing the petition on general demurrer.

Error from Superior Court, Glynn County; C. B. Conyers, Judge.

Action by William Williams against the Mayor and Council of the City of Brunswick. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

William Williams, instituted suit against the mayor and council of the city of Brunswick. The petition alleged that plaintiff was the owner of certain real estate in the city of Brunswick, and was engaged in constructing a building thereon. The municipality by its chief of police early in December entered upon the premises, and ordered petitioner and his employes to desist at the peril of prosecution and punishment in the police court. To prevent such interference, petitioner on December 16th instituted proceedings for injunction, and obtained a restraining order against the city. Subsequently the city applied to the judge for an order to preserve the status, and on December 20th an order was passed enjoining the petitioner also. At the trial, on the 4th day of April, next ensuing, the judge granted an ad interim injunction against the city, but refused to enjoin petitioner. The city sued out a writ of error and gave a supersedeas bond, and subsequently the judgment of the lower court enjoining the city was affirmed by the Supreme Court, and the judgment of the latter court was by appropriate order made the judgment of the superior court, thus terminating the injunction case in favor of petitioner. The effect of the interference by the chief of police and the order of the judge preserving the status was to delay petitioner in the construction of his building. Except for such interference the building would have been completed and rented about December 20th, and continued to be rented at a stated monthly rental. In order to enforce his rights in the premises, it was necessary for petitioner to employ counsel, which he did at reasonable cost. The prayer was for the recovery of damages covering the value of rents which would have been earned from the date of the order of the judge in the injunction case preserving the status, and also for the amount paid out as attorney's fees.

F. H. Harris, for plaintiff in error. J. T. Colson, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. The case presented by the record is controlled by the rulings announced in the headnotes. The questions of law decided are fully discussed in the authorities cited in the headnotes and in other decisions of this court cited in the authorities mentioned. Under these circumstances, elaboration would be unprofitable.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

STONEGA COKE & COAL CO. v. ADDINGTON.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Nov. 18, 1911. Rehearing Denied Jan. 18, 1912.)

1. DAMAGES (§ 62*) — CONTRACTS — MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

Where an owner of coal mines, who employed a contractor to drive entries into the mines, to do all the temporary timbering, and to remove the slate and refuse in the entries, etc., failed to furnish, as required by the contract, pumps, pipes, and wrenches, which could be purchased for a very small sum, the contractor was required to purchase the same, and where he failed to do so he could not recover the value of any labor done by reason of the owner's failure to furnish the articles, since the rule that a party cannot recover for avoidable consequences is applicable to contracts, as well as torts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 124-131; Dec. Dig. § 62.*]

2. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 109*)—CONTRACTS — BREACH—WAIVER.

An owner of a coal mine, employing a contractor to drive entries into the mine, failed to furnish the contractor pumps, pipes, and wrenches for pumping the water out of the mine, as required by the contract. The contractor continued to work for several months after such failure, and informed the owner that he would bail the water out. Held, that the contractor waived his rights under the contract, especially where he could have furnished the articles at a trifling cost.

The Supreme Court of Appeals, reversing a case for errors in instructions, will not consider the motion to set aside the verdict as contrary to the evidence.

Error to Circuit Court, Wise County.

Action by C. M. Addington against the Stonega Coke & Coal Company. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

Bullitt & Chalkley, for plaintiff in error.
Bond & Bruce, for defendant in error.

KEITH, P. C. M. Addington brought an action of assumpsit in the circuit court of Wise county against the Stonega Coke & Coal Company, in which he states that, at the request of the defendant, he had agreed to drive two entries into its mines in the county of Wise for a distance of 1,700 feet, to mine out all the "break-throughs," and to do all the temporary timbering, and to remove and clean up all the slate, dirt, and refuse in said entries and "break-throughs," except when there was a fall of slate more than 12 inches in thickness; to drive the headings of the usual width, and take out all of the coal therein to the roof, unless the entry could be driven 6 feet in height, and leave a roof or top of coal at least 12 inches thick, and in that event the entry was to be left 6 feet in height; and to load into mine cars all of the coal taken out of said entries and "break-throughs" in driving the same as aforesaid; and the defendant then and there undertook and agreed with the plaintiff to furnish and provide at the drift mouth of said entries all props, cross-beams, and other timbers necessary to support the roof of said mine, and all ties, spikes, partings, and switches and other material and appliances necessary to make the said track, and all pumps, pipes, and wrenches, and tools and appliances necessary to pump or siphon the water out of said mine, and to furnish all cars necessary to load the coal and other material taken from said entries, and to haul all ties, props, rails, and timber into said entries, and haul out all loaded cars as fast as the same were loaded, and to pay the plaintiff $4 per lineal yard for each yard of entry and "break-throughs" driven by him as aforesaid, and to pay to him on its regular pay day in each month all amounts due to him for the work done under and in pursuance of said agreement for the preceding month. The plaintiff avers that he always, from the time of making the agreement, performed all things on his part to be performed; that he purchased and provided himself with tools, materials, and supplies necessary to do said work, and did mine and drive a considerable portion of said entries and "break-throughs," or the most difficult and expensive part thereof, and did bail and haul out of said mine large quantities of water; and that he has always been ready, able, willing, and anxious to perform and complete the whole of said work in pursuance of his agreement; that the defendant, not regarding its promise, but intending to injure the plaintiff, did not perform the agreement on its part, but failed and refused to furnish and provide the plaintiff with props, cross-beams, and other timbers necessary to support the roof of said mine, and ties, rails, spikes, partings, switches, and other material and appliances necessary to make the said track, and pumps, pipes, wrenches, tools, and appliances necessary to pump or siphon the water out of said entries and "break-throughs," and to furnish cars necessary to load said coal and other material taken from said mine, and to haul the timbers, props, rails, and ties into the said mine, and to haul out the loaded cars; and that in November, 1908, the defendant would not permit or suffer the plaintiff to complete his work, and then and there hindered and prevented him from doing so, and discharged the plaintiff from any further performance or completion of his said agreement, to the damage of the plaintiff $2,000.

The plaintiff's bill of particulars is for damage by reason of the failure of the defendant to furnish pipes, wrenches, and pumps ($200), and for profit on contract ($1,800). The defendant filed a bill of particulars, which is nothing more than an amplification of the plea of nonassumpsit.

The case was submitted to a jury, which found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $800, upon which the court entered judgment, and the case is before us upon a writ of error awarded the defendant.

The first error assigned is that the court erred in giving to the jury a certain instruction asked for by the plaintiff, which is as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that, if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff and defendant made the agreement as alleged in the declaration, and that the plaintiff has complied with all the requirements of the contract on his part to be performed, and that there was a material breach of the contract by the defendant, then they must find for the plaintiff.

"The court further tells the jury that if they find for the plaintiff they shall assess such damages as in their opinion he has sustained, and in assessing the damages they shall take into consideration the value of any labor which the plaintiff has done by reason of the failure of the defendant to furnish pipes, wrenches, and pumps, if they believe that defendant was to furnish same, and they shall allow him, also, any profit which, in their opinion, the plaintiff would have made, if he had been permitted to complete the contract."

The defendant, in lieu of this instruction, asked the court to tell the jury that, "although they believe from the evidence that the defendant agreed to furnish the plaintiff with pumps, pipes, and wrenches for the purpose of syphoning the water out of the mine, and did not furnish the same, or did not furnish pumps and pipes which would properly do the work, yet, if the plaintiff continued to work for several months after the defendant had failed to furnish the said appliances, and stated to the company that he would bail the water out, he cannot now claim that the said failure to furnish the said pumps, pipes, and wrenches was a violation of the contract on defendant's part, and cannot recover damages on account thereof."

The court refused to give this instruction as asked, and modified the same by inserting therein, after the words "bail the water out," the following words, viz., "and waived his right to have said appliances furnished him, then," and gave said instruction as so modified. To all of which the defendant excepted.

[1] The giving of the first instruction, considered in connection with the facts in this case, presents an interesting question of law. It is shown by the plaintiff's own evidence that, conceding that the defendant was bound to furnish pumps, pipes, and wrenches, and that it failed to comply with its agreement in this respect, they could have been purchased for a very small sum; and the contention of the defendant is that the cost to the plaintiff of such appliances is the true measure of the damages to which he is entitled by reason of the failure of the defendant to furnish them in accordance with its contract, and not the "value of any labor which the plaintiff has done by reason of the failure of the defendant to furnish pipes, wrenches, and pumps." In other words, the defendant invokes the familiar doctrine, that the plaintiff cannot recover for avoidable consequences.

This subject is treated at large in Sedgwick on Damages (8th Ed.) §§ 201, 202, and 205, and numerous cases are cited which illustrate the doctrine.

In Miller v. Mariner's Church, 7 Me. 51, 20 Am. Dec. 341, it is said that: "The delinquent party is held to make good the loss occasioned by its delinquency. But his liability is limited to direct damages, which, according to the nature of the subject, may be contemplated or presumed to result from his failure. * * * If the party entitled to the benefit of a contract can protect himself from a loss arising from a breach, at a trifling expense or with reasonable exertions, he fails in social duty if he omits to do so. For example, a party contracts for a quantity of bricks to build a house, to be delivered at a given time, and engages masons and carpenters to go on with the work. The bricks are not delivered. If other bricks, of an equal quality and for the stipulated price, can be at once purchased on the spot, it would be unreasonable, by neglecting to make the purchase, to claim and receive of the delinquent party damages for the workmen, and the amount of rent which might be obtained for the house if it had been built."

"So in trespass in Massachusetts, it appearing that the defendant had broken down the plaintiff's fence in November, but that the plaintiff did not repair the breach till May, in consequence of which cattle got in and destroyed the crop of the next year, and the claim being for the loss of the subsequent year's crop, as well as the expense of repairing the fence, the Supreme Court said:

"In assessing damages, the direct and immediate consequences of the injurious act are to be regarded, and not remote, speculative, and contingent consequences, which the party injured might easily have avoided by his own act. Suppose a man should enter his neighbor's field unlawfully, and leave the gate open; if, before the owner knows it, cattle enter and destroy the crop, the trespasser is responsible. But if the owner sees the gate open, and passes it frequently, and willfully and obstinately, or through gross negligence, leaves it open all summer, and cattle get in, it is his own folly. So, if one throw a stone and break a window, the cost of repairing the window is the ordinary measure of damage. But, if the owner suffers the window to remain without repairing a great length of time after notice of the fact, and his furniture, or pictures, or other valuable articles, sustain damage, or the rain beats in and rots the window, this damage would be too remote."

And in section 205 (Sedgwick, supra), it is said that "the rule applies both in contract and tort, and illustrations may be drawn from every branch of the law."

See, also, 13 Cyc. p. 71: "Where an injured party finds that a wrong has been perpetrated on him, he should use all reasonable means to arrest the loss. He cannot stand idly by and permit the loss to increase, and then hold the wrongdoer liable for the loss which he might have prevented. It is only incumbent upon him, however, to use reasonable exertion and reasonable expense, and the question in such cases is always whether the act was a reasonable one, having regard to all the circumstances of the particular case." See Factors' & Traders' Ins. Co. v. Werlein, 42 La. Ann. 1046, 8 South. 435, 11 L. R. A. 361; 1 Sutherland on Damages, 152.

In Warren v. Stoddart, 105 U. S. 224, 26 L. Ed. 1117, the rule is thus stated: "Where a party is entitled to the benefit of a contract, and can save himself from a loss arising from a breach of it at a trifling expense or with reasonable exertions, it is his duty to do it, and he can charge the delinquent with such damages only as with reasonable endeavors and expense he could not prevent."

Authorities upon this subject might have been multiplied to an almost unlimited extent, but those we have cited are deemed sufficient.

The testimony shows that the pump worked well at first; that it afterwards got stopped up with coal, by reason of not having a nozzle attached to it. One of the witnesses for the plaintiff was asked:

"Q. How much did a nozzle cost? A. Don't know how much it would have cost. Man could have took a tin can and made one.

"Q. You just preferred to work it along and let it get stopped up with coal? A. We was working by the day, and had to work according to Mr. Addington's orders."

And then, with reference to the wrench, the witness was asked:

"Q. How much would it have cost to have gotten a wrench? A. Not a great deal.

"Q. How much would a pipe wrench have cost? A. A large one maybe $1.50 or $1.75; something like that."

Another complaint was that the cylinder of the pump was not properly packed. The question was asked the witness:

"Q. That you could have taken out and packed very easily? A. Yes, sir; a mechanic could have taken it out and packed it.

"Q. How long would it have taken to have done that? A. Oh, a couple of hours."

We think these facts clearly bring the case within the operation of the principle we have discussed, and that it was error to give the instruction asked for by the plaintiff.

[2] The instruction asked for by the plaintiff in error, defendant in the court below, which was refused as asked for and given with an amendment, is predicated upon the theory that the defendant agreed to furnish the plaintiff with pumps, pipes, and wrenches for the purpose of syphoning the water out of the mine; that it did not furnish the same, and did not furnish appliances which would properly do the work; but that plaintiff continued to work for several months after such failure upon the part of the defendant, and stated to the company that he would bail the water out. Then the instruction, as originally prepared, told the jury that the plaintiff could not afterwards claim damages for a violation of the contract on the part of the defendant to furnish pumps, pipes, and wrenches.

Plaintiff could have furnished pumps, pipes, and wrenches at a trifling cost, or, if that could not be done, he might have insisted upon a compliance by the defendant with its contract to furnish them; but having done neither of these things, and having informed the company that he would bail the water out, if the jury believed that such was the fact, he must be taken to have waived his right under the contract; for non constat plaintiff in error, without this statement on the part of defendant in error, would itself have furnished the needed appliances. If the facts stated in this instruction constitute a waiver, then plainly it was error, after the words "he would bail the water out," to add the words "and waived his right to have said appliances furnished him, then," for that was equivalent to telling the jury that the facts stated did not constitute a waiver.

[3] As the case has to be reversed for error in instructions, we shall not consider the motion to set aside the verdict as contrary to the evidence.

The judgment is reversed, the verdict set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial to be had not in conflict with the views herein expressed.

Reversed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County.

Bill by James Cooper against A. J. Bennett and others. Decree for defendants, and complainant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

J. W. Harman, for appellant. W. E. Baker and W. B. Maxwell, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, J. Desiring an injunction to vindicate his alleged right to a private way over the lands of A. J. Bennett, Robert Bazzle and Marcus Bazzle, James Cooper, on the 7th day of February, 1910, gave said parties a written notice, accompanied by a copy of his bill in equity, of his intention to present the bill to the circuit court of Randolph county, on the 17th day of February, 1910, and then and there ask for an injunction upon the same, in accordance with the prayer thereof, compelling them to remove certain obstructions to the road and enjoining them from further obstructing the same, and also of his intention to take depositions to sustain the allegations of his bill on the 10th day of February, 1910. Pursuant to this notice, he took the depositions of his witnesses on said 10th day of February, and, on the 28th day of that month, filed his bill in court, accompanied by the depositions so taken. The defendants appeared and excepted to the depositions, because taken before the cause had reached a stage authorizing such action. On the filing of the bill and depositions, the defendants appeared and entered their demurrer and filed their joint and separate answers, and the court gave time to mature the cause for hearing. No summons was issued in the cause until March 29, 1910. At April rules, what is called a general and special replication to the answer was filed, and on the 17th day of August, 1910, the court entered a decree dismissing the bill, from which the plaintiff has appealed.

The decree appealed from says the cause came on that day to be finally heard upon the bill, exhibits, affidavits filed therewith, exceptions to said affidavits, answer of the defendants, and replication thereto. The depositions taken and filed were thus described and evidently treated as affidavits, and, instead of expressly passing upon the exceptions thereto, the court dismissed the bill as upon the merits. It is said this, in effect, overruled the demurrer and the exceptions, and treated the depositions, though described as affidavits, as having been properly taken, and, as the decree was favorable to the defendants, they make no complaint of the overruling of the demurrer and exceptions, if such is the legal result. Insisting upon the sufficiency of the depositions in form and substance and the propriety of overruling the exceptions, the plaintiff seeks reversal of the decree of the court below and a decree here giving him the relief sought.

[1, 2] The exceptions should have been sustained. Technically, there was no suit pending when the depositions were taken. No summons was issued, no bill had been filed, and there had been no appearance. For the purposes of a preliminary injunction, affidavits may be filed in support of the allegations of the bill, and depositions taken as these were might be treated as affidavits. But, offered here as the basis of a final decree, they are insufficient. Hager v. Melton, 66 W. Va. 62, 66 S. E. 13. For the purposes of a preliminary injunction, a notice and presentation of the bill to the judge or court are sufficient, but they cannot be substituted for the summons or appearance and the filing of a bill, in the acquisition of an ordinary decree. For such a decree, or final relief, a bill must be matured and proceeded with regularly, even though the relief desired is only an injunction by way of final decree or the perpetuation of a provisional injunction. We know of no statutory or other authority for the taking of depositions before the formal commencement of a suit. "The cause must have been set for hearing before the depositions are taken, and the person to be affected by them must be then a party to the suit." Barton's Ch. Pr. p. 785. The rule thus stated may be too strict, and it may be, and probably is, permissible to take depositions after the filing of the bill; but there must necessarily be a pending suit within the meaning of the law relating to regular proceedings. A preliminary injunction is an extraordinary proceeding in which the statute dispenses with some things indispensable in regular proceedings. Section 3 of chapter 133 of the Code, relied upon here to sustain the depositions, applies to provisional injunctions only.

As the depositions taken indicate the existence of evidence strongly tending to sustain the allegations of the bill, and the cause was submitted, without having had the exceptions first passed upon by an express ruling, we think the case falls within the principle of Hager v. Melton, cited, calling for a reversal of the decree and a remand of the cause, with leave to the plaintiff to take the proof he appears to have. For other applications of the principle, see Love v. Tinsley, 32 W. Va. 25, 9 S. E. 44; Holt v. Taylor, 43 W. Va. 153, 27 S. E. 320; Hylton v. Hylton, 1 Gr. (Va.) 161; Cropper v. Burton, 5 Leigh (Va.) 428; Duff v. Duff, 3 Leigh (Va.) 523; Miller v. Argyle's Ex'rs, 5 Leigh (Va.) 460; and Sitlington v. Brown, 7 Leigh (Va.) 271.

[3] Dismissal under the circumstances here shown operated as a surprise upon the plaintiff and subordinated substance to shadow. The action of the court compelled him to hazard his whole case on his judgment as to the sufficiency of his proof in point of form only. Besides the decree is equivocal. The exceptions may be appealed to in support of it or in condemnation thereof, according to the interest of the party. From one point of view it is a decree upon the merits, and, from another, it is not. Hence the losing party is unable to say with certainty upon what ground he lost his case.

For these reasons, the decree will be reversed, the exceptions to the depositions sustained, and the cause remanded, with leave to the plaintiff to take evidence to sustain his bill.

COAL & COKE RY. CO. v. MARPLE et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 12, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

TAXATION (§ 677*)—SALE FOR TAXES—COMBINATION BETWEEN BIDDERS.

An agreement between two or more persons, not general partners, who are competitive bidders at delinquent tax sales, that they will become partners in all lands that may be thereafter purchased by either of them, contravenes public policy, and will render void a tax deed acquired pursuant to such agreement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 1357; Dec. Dig. § 677.*]

Brannon and Poffenbarger, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Braxton County.

Action by the Coal & Coke Railway Company against John M. Marple and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants Marple and John I. Bender appeal. Affirmed.

Morrison & Rider, for appellants. Haymond & Fox, for appellee.

WILLIAMS, P. Plaintiff brought its suit in equity against John M. Marple and John I. Bender and others to cancel a tax deed for 66½ acres of land, made by the clerk of the county court of Braxton county to said Marple and Bender, and obtained a decree in its favor, on the 12th day of December, 1907. From that decree Marple and Bender have appealed.

The land was owned by M. A. Stump, and on the 28th of December, 1900, he and his wife conveyed it to Henry G. Davis. In September, 1901, said Davis and wife conveyed it to the Washington Coal & Coke Company, and it, in turn, conveyed it to plaintiff in February, 1904. The deed from Stump and wife to Henry G. Davis was not recorded until April 15, 1901, and hence too late to be transferred on the land book and charged with taxes in the name of said grantee. It was therefore properly returned delinquent in the name of said Stump for nonpayment of taxes for the year 1901.

The learned circuit judge who heard the cause prepared a very elaborate and able written opinion which, on motion of plaintiff, was made a part of the record. That opinion has been of much service to us in our effort to reach a just conclusion. Many facts were averred in the bill as constituting sufficient grounds for avoiding the tax deed. But it is necessary for us to consider only one of them, because all the others relate to matters which this court has heretofore held, in similar cases, to be either unimportant, or to be such defects in the proceedings as are expressly cured by statute.

The ground on which the court set aside the tax deed is that an agreement had been entered into between said Marple and Bender, in 1902 or 1903, to become partners in all lands that might thereafter be sold for taxes and purchased by either of them at tax sales. This, we think, was sufficient ground to avoid the deed. Marple and Bender filed their joint answer, in which they aver: "That said tract of land was purchased at said tax sale by them at a risk; that they, nor neither of them, knew whether or not there was any land there; that said land was simply purchased by them because it was cheap; that they did not know of said tract of land when they attended said tax sale, nor did they know said tract of land belonged to plaintiff." They deny, however, that there was any arrangement or agreement between them before said sale, or at the sale, or at any other time, "as to this tract of land." Defendants do not deny that there was a partnership agreement, previously made, which related to and embraced all lands that either of them might thereafter purchase at a tax sale. Their qualified denial is a virtual admission that such partnership existed, which embraced any and all lands that either of them might thereafter purchase. Moreover, Marple testified as follows: "In 1902 and 1903, we made arrangements. Bender and I were both buying land at sheriff's tax sales, and I suggested to him that we go in partners, and we agreed to do so." The land in question was sold in January, 1904, after the partnership arrangement was made, and the whole tract was purchased by Marple at the price of $5.54. The testimony above quoted proves that the agreement to become partners was made to prevent competitive bidding, at tax sales, between Marple and Bender. They had been competing bidders, and, in order to prevent competition between themselves, they agreed to become partners. The partnership embraced a matter concerning which the two parties had theretofore been competitors—nothing else. The real purpose was to prevent competition. Such a partnership would not be created between noncompetitors, and, when entered into by competing bidders, it is equivalent, in law, to an agreement not to compete with each other, which is against public policy.

The collection of taxes by the sale of land, simply upon notice posted and published in a newspaper, without judicial process, is purely a statutory proceeding, and is a very drastic remedy. The constitutionality of such proceeding was, for a long time, seriously doubted by many men learned in the law, and, while the question may now be regarded as fairly well settled in favor of the state's right to collect its revenue by that method, still it has always been the uniform policy of the law to protect the rights of the delinquent landowner with every reasonable safeguard, consistent with the right of the state to collect its revenues without unreasonable delay. One of these safeguards is the statutory provision that no more of the delinquent owner's land shall be sold for the taxes due thereon than is necessary. Another is that the sale shall be at public auction, at a certain place, and on certain days, and after due publication in a manner particularly set out in the statute. Still another safeguard is the one embedded in the general policy of the law, which is that the bidding shall not be stifled, or competition discouraged. It cannot be said that a delinquent taxpayer deserves no consideration at the hands of the state because he has failed to perform one of the most important duties which she has enjoined upon him. The statute is not penal, but remedial. The state seeks only to get her revenue by this means, not to punish the delinquent taxpayer. The right of property is involved which, in the eyes of the law, has been a sacred right from time immemorial. The right of the state to its revenue, only, is superior to that of the owner. The remedy was not designed for the benefit of land speculators. The rights of the delinquent landowner stand next to those of the state. He has a right to demand that competition at the sale shall be unfettered by any arrangement, or agreement, between prospective bidders, which has for its object the acquisition of the greatest amount of his land for the taxes due on it. Such an agreement between competitive bidders, or prospective bidders, is a fraud upon the law. The agreement between Marple and Bender, who were not general partners, to become partners in all lands thereafter sold for tax, and purchased by either of them, is purely a speculative contract. It is, in effect, an agreement not to bid against each other, and is therefore against public policy. That the agreement does not relate to any particular piece, or tract, of land, but comprehends all lands that may be thereafter sold for taxes, regardless of quantity, locality, or ownership, renders the agreement all the more objectionable, as showing more clearly the purpose to stifle competition. If such an arrangement between two competitive bidders could be considered lawful, then it would follow that the same arrangement between any number of persons would likewise be lawful, because there is no limit upon the number of persons that may form a partnership, and that would lead to the destruction of competition altogether. But such an agreement is against public policy and is ground for avoiding the tax sale and deed. The authorities are not harmonious on the question here discussed; but we think the weight of reason, if not the greater number of adjudicated cases, supports our conclusion.

The land in the present case is worth over $6,000, and was purchased for $5.54, the amount of tax due on it. If Marple and Bender had competed for the purchase of it, it is more than likely that not more than one acre of it would have been sold for the tax. Is it not more consonant with justice, and far the better policy, to hold such speculative contracts, which tend to destroy competition, unlawful, than it would be to uphold them? We think so. The purchasers lose nothing but their bargain. They get their money back with large interest. But, if the contract should be held lawful, plaintiff would lose its land. A purchaser who buys at a tax sale, knowing the land to exist, takes no risk. He has all to gain and nothing to lose. Justice, in the present case, is clearly on the side of the landowner.

The following authorities will be found to support this opinion, viz.: Dudley v. Little, 2 Ohio, 504, 15 Am. Dec. 576; Slater v. Maxwell, 6 Wall. 268, 18 L. Ed. 796; Kerwer v.

Allen, 31 Iowa, 578; Easton v. Mawkinney, 37 Iowa, 601; 1 Blackwell on Tax Titles, § 559; 2 Cooley on Taxation (3d Ed.) p. 943.

We affirm the decree of the lower court.

BRANNON, J. (dissenting). I cannot see that an agreement between two persons to buy jointly at a tax sale is unlawful; there being no combination to prevent competition. It is a sale under state authority. Two may purchase at a judicial sale. Henderson v. Henrie, 61 W. Va. 183, 56 S. E. 369. What difference? "No combination to prevent competition at a tax sale is to be implied from the mere fact of a joint purchase by two persons of tracts of land struck off at such sale." Kerr v. Kipp, 37 Minn. 25, 33 N. W. 116. "It being lawful to buy at tax sales, a partnership to acquire lands at such sales is legal." Dawson v. Ward, 71 Tex. 72, 9 S. W. 106. "Two persons or more may unite in bidding off property, if their purpose is not to prevent competition among bidders, but for their mutual convenience, as with the view of enabling them to become joint owners, or in case each desires to purchase a part only of certain property offered entire, or for any other reasonable or proper purpose." Blackwell on Tax Titles, § 559. Black on Tax Titles, § 246, says it is clear that two or more persons may agree to bid jointly, if they do so to protect their own interest and not to prevent competition. I cite, also, 27 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 840, and 37 Cyc. 1360, and Cooley on Taxation, 944. The cases cited by Judge WILLIAMS will not sustain him. They are cases of rings or agreements not to bid against each other, or where the purchaser had declared the owner would redeem, and the like. Even in the Ohio case (Dudley v. Little, 2 Ohio, 504, 15 Am. Dec. 575) there was combination. The opinion says it was not meant to hold that partners cannot purchase at a tax sale for convenience of business. Judge Poffenbarger, in Lohr v. George, 65 W. Va. 241, 64 S. E. 609, refers to this subject. There he suggests that the agreement must relate to the particular land. That is not the case in this instance. He cites authority for the proposition. Who is hurt by the agreement in this case?

POFFENBARGER, J., also dissents, and concurs in this note.

WORLEY v. RALEIGH LUMBER CO.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 12, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 101, 102*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—APPLIANCES—CARE REQUIRED.

A master does not owe to his servant engaged in using appliances furnished by the master in building a sawmill the same degree of care in furnishing safe appliances as he would owe in case of a completed and operating mill.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 101, 102*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—APPLIANCES—CARE REQUIRED.

The rule of law is not that a master must furnish to his servant reasonably safe machinery, appliances, or instrumentalities for work; but it is that the master must exercise reasonable care and diligence to furnish reasonably safe machinery, appliances, and instrumentalities.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 265*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—APPLIANCES—CARE REQUIRED—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action by a servant against a master for injury from a defect in an appliance, machine, or instrumentality furnished by the master, it is incumbent on the servant to show such defect, and that the injury comes from it. If it might have come from one or another cause, for one of which the master is not liable, there can be no recovery. Recovery cannot rest on mere surmise or conjecture as to the cause or source of the injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 894-908; Dec. Dig. § 265.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Raleigh County.

Action by George W. Worley against the Raleigh Lumber Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed, judgment set aside, and new trial granted.

Vinson & Thompson, James J. Divine, and McGinnis & Hatcher, for plaintiff in error. Farley, Sutphin & Ward, for defendant in error.

BRANNON, J. Raleigh Lumber Company had about completed a new mill. It was engaged in putting in its place a pipe of considerable length running from the boiler to some part of the sawmill for the conveyance of steam, and was adjusting and testing the pipe. Steam was turned on into this pipe, and it disclosed a leak between two sections of the pipe. Steam was turned off, and George W. Worley, a workman who had been employed in the construction of the mill, was engaged at the point of leakage in tightening up a flange coupling which was leaking, when an ell burst at his feet, and a large quantity of steam, which had been turned on again, escaped and badly burned Worley. In an action brought by him against the lumber company he recovered verdict and judgment for $3,000, from which the lumber company has sued out a writ of error.

Much argument is made to sustain a demurrer to the declaration overruled by the court. We think the declaration is good.

It involves nothing necessary to be here stated.

[1] Instruction No. 1 for the plaintiff is excepted to. It reads as follows: "The court instructs the jury that the duties of the master to provide a reasonably safe and suitable machinery and appliances for the business and to furnish a safe place in which his servant is to work are duties which the master can either perform personally or delegate their performance to some one else; but if both the master and the person to whom such duties are delegated fall in the performance of any of said duties, and injury results to the servant by reason of said failure, the master is liable for such injury." This mill was yet incomplete. It was not yet in actual operation. The piping that was being put down was indispensable for the operation of the mill. Worley was helping to put that pipe in place. The objection to this instruction is that it sets up a standard of duty of the employer applicable to a complete operating mill. It demands of the employer the same degree of duty as to machinery exacted of an owner of a running mill. The principle governing the trial seems to be wrong. The trial was upon an erroneous theory, that of a running mill. You cannot exact of a mill builder that high degree of care as to good machinery or appliances, when they are being put up and tested, as if completed and running. You cannot demand the same degree of duty as to a new and untried pipe, when being put down and tested, as you could in the case of a steam pipe in a finished and operating mill. Labatt on Master and Servant, § 29, says: "It is well settled that, where the instrumentality which caused the injury was still incomplete at the time of the accident, and the injured servant was engaged in the work of bringing it to completion, the question whether the master was in the exercise of due care is determined with reference to a lower standard than that which is applied in the case of instrumentalities which have been put in a finished condition and are in regular use in the normal course of the business. A similar qualification of the master's liability is admitted where the injured servant was hired for the express purpose of assisting in the repair, demolition, or alteration of some instrumentality, and the unsafe conditions from which the injury resulted arose from or were incidental to the work thus undertaken by him." In Armour v. Hahn, 111 U. S. 313, 4 Sup. Ct. 433, 28 L. Ed. 440, it was held: "The obligation of a master to provide reasonably safe places and structures for his servants to work upon does not oblige him to keep a building, which they are employed in erecting, in a safe condition at every moment of their work, so far as its safety depends on the due performance of that work by them and their fellow servants."

[2] There is another objection to that instruction. It says that the master must provide "a reasonably safe and suitable machinery and appliances for the business." This makes the master guarantee the safety of the pipe. The law is that it is the duty of the master to use reasonable care and diligence to furnish suitable machinery and appliances. In Osner v. Zadek, 120 Ill. App. 444, an instruction like this one was given. The court said: "Under the instruction the jury may have found for the plaintiff, if they believed from the evidence that the machinery was not reasonably safe, even though the appellant used the utmost diligence to procure a safe machine, and even though there was no defect discoverable by the exercise of ordinary diligence. This is not the law. The master's obligation is not to supply the servants with absolutely safe machinery or any particular kind of machinery; but his obligation is to use ordinary and reasonable care not to subject the servant to extraordinary and unreasonable danger. The law imposes upon the company the obligation to use reasonable care and diligence in providing suitable and safe machinery." In Belleville Pump Works v. Bender, 69 Ill. App. 189, the court says: "The second instruction given for the plaintiff was erroneous. It told the jury that it was the duty of the master to furnish his servants with tools and appliances that were reasonably safe. The law is that he is only required to use reasonable and ordinary care and diligence in providing suitable and safe machinery. Camp Point Co. v. Ballou, 71 Ill. 421." In Wonder v. B. & O., 32 Md. 411, 3 Am. Rep. 143, it is stated that: "All that can be required of the master is that he should use due and reasonable diligence in providing safe and sound machinery." In Southern Ry. Co. v. Mauzy, 98 Va. 692, 37 S. E. 285, it is held that: "It is error to charge in an action by an employe for injuries received that one of the personal duties of the master is to furnish safe and sound machinery for the use of the servants, since it is his duty to use only ordinary care and diligence to provide reasonably safe and suitable machinery." Much law sustains this position. Atlantic & D. Ry. Co. v. West, 101 Va. 13, 42 S. E. 914; Parlett v. Dunn, 102 Va. 459, 46 S. E. 467. The rule is so stated in 9 Encyclopedia Digest of Va. & W. Va. R. 674.

Another objection to instruction No. 1 is that it requires the defendant to furnish a safe place for work. The plaintiff had been, and at the time of the injury was, working in the construction of this new mill. Could he expect a safe place to work in when the mill was in process of construction?

But that is not all as to this feature of the instruction. There was no evidence as to the unsafety of the place, or of that being the cause of the misfortune. If the evidence tends to show anything as the cause of the accident it is the want of drain holes in the ell of the pipe. That only is alleged by the plaintiff as such cause. This instruction makes the safety of the place of work an element to be passed on by the jury. It tended to mislead the jury. This instruction told the jury that the master must furnish a safe place for work when he was only bound to use care to do so, as in the case of suitable machinery. And this instruction did not suit the case of an incomplete mill. It strikes me that this instruction is also wanting in failing to put to the jury the question whether the master knew or should have known of the alleged defects in the pipes. Hoffman v. Dickinson, 31 W. Va. 142, 6 S. E. 53, point 11. These terrible accidents will happen in such operations as that in this case. Negligence must be established. The master does not guarantee the safety of the servants. His duty is reasonable care having relation to the parties, the business on hand and in view of the situation of the parties under the circumstances. Oliver v. Ohio River Co., 42 W. Va. 703, 26 S. E. 444; Fulton v. Crosby Co., 57 W. Va. 91, 49 S. E. 1012. Remember that this was not an operating mill, but still in process of construction, especially so as to this piping. Worley was engaged in constructive work.

Instruction No. 3 is bad for reasons above stated. "The court instructs the jury that it is the direct personal and absolute obligation of the master to provide a reasonably safe and suitable machinery and appliance for the business. This includes the exercise of reasonable care in furnishing such appliances. The master must furnish a reasonably safe place in which his servant is to work. And the jury are further instructed that a master is liable for any injury due to the neglect or failure of the master to provide such reasonably safe and suitable machinery and appliances for the business, or to exercise such reasonable care in furnishing such appliances or to furnish his servants a reasonably safe place in which to work." This instruction seems to introduce the rule of reasonable care in furnishing appliances. Instruction No. 1 does not do so. If instruction 3 is to be construed as stating that all that is required of the master is that he use care in furnishing appliances, it is inconsistent with No. 1, which declares that the master must provide reasonably safe appliances and machinery and safe place to work in. Which instruction would the jury follow? But does instruction 3 say that all that is required is that the master use care in furnishing good appliances? It opens by saying that it is the "direct personal and absolute obligation of the master to provide a reasonably safe and suitable machinery and appliances." It then says that this includes reasonable care in furnishing such appliances. Which standard of duty are we to take as spoken by this instruction? It is unclear and uncertain, and liable to mislead the jury in addition to reasons given above rendering it bad. It does not properly and clearly state the duty of the master.

We do not think instruction 4 is bad.

[3] On consideration of the evidence of the plaintiff alone we have come to the conclusion that it does not sustain the action, because it does not clearly show and identify the cause of the injury to the plaintiff. This is an action based on negligence, which the plaintiff must prove. He must show the cause of the injury and also the defendant's negligence responsible for it. The plaintiff's evidence is aimed to show that there were no traps or drain holes in the steam pipes, and that from condensation of steam there was a water deposit in the pipe, and that when the steam would be turned on it would break the pipe because of the presence of this water producing what is called "water hammer," which broke the pipe. It is not shown that the want of drain holes caused the pipe to burst by producing water hammer which would break the pipe. It is claimed that water in the pipe when steam is turned on will produce water hammer which may break the steel pipe. It is not established that water hammer will break the pipe. Water hammer makes a loud noise. Nobody heard it. No evidence at all proves it.

The evidence is indefinite to show that the want of drain holes caused the accident. It may have come from latent defect in the pipe, a theory more plausible than that a little water in the pipe would burst it. The law requires definite evidence fixing the cause of disaster. "The doctrine stated in the last section involves the corollary that a servant cannot recover where it is merely a matter of conjecture, surmise, speculation, or supposition, whether the injury was or was not due to the negligence of the master or of an employé for whose acts and omissions he is responsible." Labatt, Master & Servant, § 837. In Patton v. Texas R. R. Co., 179 U. S. 658, 21 Sup. Ct. 275, 45 L. Ed. 361, the Supreme Court said: "It is not sufficient for the employé to show that the employer may have been guilty of negligence; the evidence must point to the fact that he was. And where the testimony leaves the matter uncertain, and shows that any one of a half dozen things may have brought about the injury for some of which the employer is responsible, and for some of which he is not, it is not for the jury to guess between these half dozen causes and find that the negligence of the employer was the real cause, when there is no satisfactory foundation in the testimony for that conclusion." For this plain proposition abundant law will be found in Green v. R. R. Co., 72 S. C. 398, 52 S. E. 45, 5 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 165, and note. The evidence of three of the plaintiff's witnesses tends to show that the want of these drain holes was the source of the accident; but one of them, perhaps two, say that they could not say with any certainty what caused the accident. They seem to surmise that such was the cause—give that as their opinion. Their evidence to that effect is given with hesitancy. They do not assert it with any confidence, but manifest uncertainty of opinion. On the other hand, nine witnesses for the defense, experienced millwrights and mechanics who had erected mills of this type, declared that drain holes or steam traps were for the purpose of draining the pipes to prevent freezing or to protect the engine or cylinder, and not to secure safety or to prevent bursting of the pipes. Two other witnesses declared that drain holes were not necessary for safety. The witnesses for the plaintiff had only worked about mills some, but were not machinists, mechanical engineers, or millwrights. The plaintiff did not sustain his case.

Again, if the pipe burst from want of drain holes, who is responsible? Who should have put them in? The millwright, his negligence, if any, is negligence of a fellow servant. But the case does not establish any negligence.

We think that the plaintiff's instruction 7, directing the jury to find for the defendant, should have been given. Under these principles we are led to reverse the judgment, set aside the verdict, grant a new trial and remand the cause.

SCHOONOVER v. BALTIMORE & O. R. CO.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Oct. 24, 1911. Rehearing Denied
Jan. 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 273*)—ENTRY NUNC PRO TUNC.

A final judgment, rendered but not entered by reason of inadvertency of the clerk, may be entered by a nunc pro tunc order at a term of the court subsequent to the one at which it was rendered, provided the evidence of the rendition thereof is sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 525-541; Dec. Dig. § 273.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 134*)—RECORD—CORRECTION.

A writ of error to such a judgment awarded and perfected before entry thereof may be sustained by the filing of a supplemental record in the appellate court, showing amendment by such nunc pro tunc order.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 898; Dec. Dig. § 134.*]

3. RAILROADS (§ 325*)—INJURIES TO MINORS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

In an action by an infant between 11 and 12 years old against a railroad company to recover damages for an injury sustained by the former on a highway crossing, or one treated as such, by the negligence of the latter, the trial court may hold the plaintiff barred by his contributory negligence, upon a proper application for such ruling, if the facts and circumstances of the case warrant it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1029-1036; Dec. Dig. § 325.*]

4. RAILROADS (§ 325*)—INJURIES—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—CHILDREN.

In the use of highways, children must exercise such reasonable care, caution, and prudence for their safety as may be expected from them, in view of their immaturity. The standard or measure of duty in each case is determinable by the capacity ordinarily possessed and exercised by children of the age and development of the class to which the individual belongs.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1029-1036; Dec. Dig. § 325.*]

5. RAILROADS (§ 300*)—OPERATION—INJURIES AT CROSSING—DUTY OF RAILROAD.

In passing its train over a crossing provided by itself for public use, though not legally a public crossing, a railroad company must comply with the common-law requirements, imposed for the safety of persons using public crossings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 955; Dec. Dig. § 300.*]

6. RAILROADS (§ 338*)—OPERATION—INJURIES AT CROSSING—INJURY AVOIDABLE NOTWITHSTANDING CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Though a person injured on such a crossing by a train was himself in fault, his negligence does not preclude recovery for the injury, if the servants of the railway company in charge of the train could have discovered the danger and prevented the injury by keeping a lookout on the crossing and checking or stopping the train. In such case, their failure of duty is the latest negligence and the proximate cause of the injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1096-1099; Dec. Dig. § 338.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Cabell County.

Action by Clifford Schoonover against the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Williams, Scott & Lovett, for plaintiff in error. Vinson & Thompson, for defendant in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. In an action of trespass on the case, brought by Clifford Schoonover against the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, in the circuit court of Cabell county, for the recovery of damages for a personal injury, alleged to have been wrought by the negligence of the defendant, there was a demurrer to the evidence of the plaintiff, which the court sustained, after a conditional verdict had been found by the jury, assessing the damages at the sum of $3,000. Agreeably to the finding of the court upon the law of the case, an order was entered, sustaining the demurrer and giving the defendant a judgment for costs, but not dismissing the action. However, a writ of error was awarded, and the case submitted to the court as upon a final judgment. That this was not a final judgment in appellate law appears from Epstein v. Totten, 63 W. Va. 602, 60 S. E. 614; De Armit v. Whitmer, 63 W. Va. 301, 60 S. E. 136; Ritchie County Bank v. Bee, 60 W. Va. 386, 55 S. E. 380; Corley v. Corley, 53 W. Va. 142, 44 S. E. 132, 47 S. E.

145; Hannah v. Bank, 53 W. Va. 82, 44 S. E. 152.

After submission of the case in this court, however, the circuit court entered an order, reciting rendition of judgment of nil capiat at the time of the entry of the order above described and clerical omission to include it in that order, and entering the judgment nunc pro tunc. This raises the question of power in the trial court to amend its record, after perfection of a writ of error and submission in the appellate court.

[1] Legally the inquiry divides into two parts, the first of which is whether a final judgment can be entered nunc pro tunc; and the other whether an amendment so made will sustain the writ of error. Such an amendment may be made. Vance v. Railway Co., 53 W. Va. 338, 44 S. E. 461; Ninde v. Clarke, 4 Am. St. Rep. 832, note, pp. 828-830. In this valuable note, we find the following proposition, sustained by numerous decisions: "A court which has ordered a judgment which the clerk has failed or neglected to enter in the record has power, even after the term at which it was rendered has passed, to order the judgment so rendered to be entered nunc pro tunc, provided there be satisfactory evidence that the judgment was rendered as alleged, and of the nature and extent of the relief granted by it." Sufficiency of the evidence upon which the amendment was made is not questioned.

[2] That an amendment of the record of a case in the trial court, pending a writ of error, may be carried into the record in the appellate court and made effective there is also affirmed by authority. After such an amendment, carried up as aforesaid, the appellate court will act upon the record as corrected. Wells v. Smith, 49 W. Va. 78, 38 S. E. 547; Gauley Coal Land Ass'n v. Spies, 61 W. Va. 19, 55 S. E. 903; Hopkins v. Railroad Co., 42 W. Va. 535, 26 S. E. 187; 18 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 958. We find no authority inconsistent with this view. Hastily read, Tatum v. Snidow, 2 Hen. & M. (Va.) 542, may seem to be so, but it is not. Though the subsequent order therein entered recited omission of entry of the judgment by the clerk, the judgment was not entered nunc pro tunc and virtually dated back, as in this case, so as to work an amendment.

Reason and justice, as well as authority, sustain our conclusion. The defect resulted from mere inadvertence and was purely technical. Until the hearing on the writ of error, both parties proceeded under the impression that the judgment was technically, as well as substantially, final. Discovery of the defect then was matter of surprise to them, as, no doubt, it was to the trial court on the application for amendment. Correction thereof by amendment saves time and expense and facilitates disposition of business, without working injury in any respect.

The plaintiff, a boy about 11½ years old, was so badly injured on the track of the defendant company that one of his legs had to be amputated below the knee. The injury occurred at a point used as a crossing, but the status of that crossing is an element in the case. It would be in the line of Seventeenth street, of the city of Huntington, if extended northward so as to cross the railroad, but had never been established by the city as a street or public crossing. The general direction of the railroad at that point is east and west. On the south side thereof and west of Seventeenth street, running to the railroad at right angles, there was a park, boarded up along the railroad on one side, and along said street on another, in which a game of baseball was played on the day of the injury. The grandstand, occupied by spectators, was in the angle. Occasionally, foul balls would go over the fence, and boys on the outside recovered and returned them, in consideration of which they were admitted into the park. The plaintiff and a number of other persons were on the outside; some watching the game through cracks in the fence, and others looking over the fence from the tops of box cars, standing on a switch on the opposite side of the railroad track. A foul ball having gone over the fence and diagonally across the railroad in a northeasterly direction, and stopped a short distance beyond, from 15 to 30 feet, the plaintiff ran after it, and having obtained it ran back on the track, whence he threw it into the park, halting momentarily, some of the witnesses say. At this time, a train, consisting of an engine and two cars, drawn by the engine running backwards, was approaching from the east at the rate of 10 to 15 miles per hour. When the boy threw the ball, in apparent ignorance of its approach, the engine was not more than 60 or 70 feet distant. The train was going west, and he diagonally across the track in a southwesterly direction. Hence his face was turned from the train, but he went on the track without looking for an approaching train or engine. Wholly absorbed in what he was doing, he was oblivious of the train. Some witnesses testify that they and others, seeing the danger, called to him, but are unable to say he heard them, as there was much noise and confusion, both inside and outside of the park. As he left the track, the train, rushing on, caught his right foot and leg. Some distance east of the place of the injury there was a cattle pen, near which some witnesses say there were two long blasts of the whistle of the approaching engine, one east and the other west. Others say they never heard them. There is no evidence that any bell was rung as the train approached the crossing, and all the witnesses agree that just about the time the boy was struck two or three short sharp blasts from the whistle were heard. There was nobody on the tender of the backing engine, nor does it appear that anybody on the engine kept a lookout upon the crossing.

That the train was running at a higher rate of speed than the city ordinance permitted seems not to be controverted. At any rate, it could have been inferred from the evidence. That a lower rate of speed would have avoided the injury is another inference justified by it, since the boy was almost out of danger when the train struck him. Therefore we may safely assume negligence on the part of the defendant company.

[3] Whether the conduct of the plaintiff amounted to contributory negligence is an important inquiry in the case. Had he been an adult, his contributory negligence in going upon the railroad track directly in front of the approaching train, plainly in view, without looking in either direction along the track, or in any way exercising his powers of observation for his own safety, would be clearly manifest. Riedel v. Traction Co., 63 W. Va. 522, 61 S. E. 821, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1123. But this boy was only about 11 years and 5 months old. He testified, in January, 1906, that he had attained his thirteenth year in the preceding November. The action was brought at October rules, 1904, and the declaration avers that he was hurt on the 23d day of April, 1904. As to whether a person of that age is sui juris within the law of negligence, and how the fact is to be determined, there is some conflict among the authorities. In some jurisdictions, the courts hold that, between the ages of 7 and 14, there is a presumption of a lack of prudence, foresight, caution, and comprehension of danger which carries every case to the jury, and denies to the court the power to say there was contributory negligence as matter of law. Trumbo's Adm'r v. Street Car Co., 89 Va. 780, 17 S. E. 124; Railway Co. v. Quayle, 95 Va. 741, 30 S. E. 391; City of Roanoke v. Shull, 97 Va. 419, 34 S. E. 34, 75 Am. St. Rep. 791. Other cases, proceeding upon the same theory, will be found cited in the note to Barnes v. Railroad Co., 49 Am. St. Rep. 400, 410. See, also, 3 Elliott on Railroads, § 1261, note 122. But this rule is by no means generally accepted. Numerous decisions declare that in cases of injury occurring upon highways and railroads failure of a child to exercise such care, caution, and foresight as is ordinarily possessed and exercised by children of his age will bar recovery for an injury thereby occasioned.

[4] In these cases, the measure or standard of care required is not that of adults, but of the class of persons to which the injured party belongs, and seems to rest upon the view that, in using a highway, provided for all classes of persons who are accustomed to go abroad without guardians or protectors, the traveler is bound to use, in the exercise of that right, such judgment and prudence as are usually and ordinarily possessed by persons of the class to which he belongs; and that failure to exercise the same constitutes negligence, whether he be above or below the age of 14. This proposition is sustained by a decided weight of authority in all actions by infants for personal injuries, except those between master and servant. Railway Co. v. McDonnell, 43 Md. 534; Railroad Co. v. Hanlon, 53 Ala. 70; Railroad Co. v. Murray, 71 Ill. 601; Swift v. Railroad Co., 123 N. Y. 645, 25 N. E. 378; Hayes v. Norcross, 162 Mass. 546, 39 N. Small*, 188 Mass. 4, 73 N. E. 1019, 108 Am. St. Rep. 457.

Practically all courts hold infants between the ages of 7 and 14 capable of contributory negligence. Those in which the view here announced does not prevail submit to the jury, upon the facts and circumstances, the inquiry whether there has been contributory negligence. The mere submission of the question asserts capacity of the infant negligently to contribute to his injury, within the meaning of the law, under certain circumstances. The difference or conflict respects a rule of practice, not principle; some courts saying the question is always one for the jury, and others that it is for jury determination only when the evidence makes it a jury question, under the rules of practice applicable to other questions. If the act of an infant plaintiff is so obviously dangerous that no reasonable man can truthfully say children of his age do not ordinarily know it to be dangerous and voluntarily abstain from it, there is no more reason for submitting the question of contributory negligence to the jury than in the case of an adult plainly guilty of such negligence, and there is the same reason why it should not do so. Prudence and capacity to comprehend danger are not the only elements involved. These may be clear beyond doubt, as in the case of an adult. The defensive issue raised is negligence, in which the age, intelligence, and characteristics of the plaintiff are only factors. Hence it is fallacious to say that, because these are inferior to those of an adult, the issue must be submitted to a jury. Though inferior in that sense, they may be amply and indisputably such as to hold the plaintiff to responsibility for his acts, under the circumstances of the case. Inferiority to an adult in these respects does not absolve him from responsibility. If it did, the case could not even go to the jury on the question of contributory negligence. That defense could not be made. But practically all courts admit it, except in the cases of very young children, deemed incapable of appreciating common or ordinary danger. The standard or measure of responsibility is lower than that for adults, but, if an infant plaintiff comes clearly up to it, there is no occasion for submitting his capacity to the jury as a doubtful question; and if the danger encountered by him was so plainly obvious that one of his years must have appreciated it, or the duty omitted by him so clear and natural that he must be deemed to have been cognizant of it, the court should declare his contributory negligence, upon a proper application, as in other cases.

The basis of the conflict in authority seems, therefore, to arise from failure or refusal on the part of those courts which insist upon making the question of negligence on the part of an infant between the ages of 7 and 14 years always one for the jury to recognize any standard or measure of responsibility in children. That they have some intelligence cannot be denied. Nor is it possible to say they do not have enough to enable them to appreciate or comprehend certain forms of obvious danger, or to know how to avoid it, or to feel a sense of duty under certain circumstances. If the court can say, and it does, as matter of judicial knowledge, that an adult ought to know certain things and be able to take adequate precaution for his own safety, why has it not the same power to say, as a matter of judicial knowledge, that children of certain ages are able to comprehend and avoid certain kinds of danger? The adoption of the theory or view that a child must exercise such care, caution, prudence, and foresight as children of his age ordinarily possess and exercise makes the question of contributory negligence in the case of a child, treated as one of law for determination by the court, just as easy of solution as in the case of an adult, and the conclusion is reached by exactly the same process of reasoning.

That contributory negligence in cases of this class is frequently declared to be generally a question for the jury is not inconsistent with the conclusion here stated, for that is said of all cases involving this defense, and it is true. More cases of each class go to the juries than are decided by the courts. The expression means only that determination by the jury is the general rule, and by the court the exception thereto.

This conclusion does not necessarily conflict with the principle declared in Bare v. Coal Co., 61 W. Va. 28, 55 S. E. 907, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 284, 123 Am. St. Rep 966, and Wilkinson v. Coal Co., 64 W. Va. 93, 61 S. E. 875, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 331, and other cases arising between master and servant, and vastly different in many respects from this. As between master and servant, there is a contractual relation. There is none here. These parties were strangers, standing substantially upon an equal footing in respect to the use of a highway. The difference between the reciprocal rights of the plaintiff and defendant here and those between an adult and such a defendant, in a similar situation, is the requirement of more care on the part of the latter in its relations with the former, in view of his immaturity, lowering the standard of responsibility. Highway and railroad risks, dangers, and reciprocal rights are matters of daily cognizance and experience with boys as with men. No presumption of their ignorance thereof can be indulged or supposed. They are not brought into or kept in contact with them by the compulsion of restraint of the railroad companies or other persons using the highways. Boys employed in mills, factories, and mines are held by their contracts to duties which necessitate unaccustomed precautions against danger, and constantly expose them to hazards dangerous and unfamiliar. Frequent recurrence of these exposures and precautionary duties, incident to the performance of the work, requires vigilance, constancy, and singleness and steadiness of purpose—characteristic of adults, rather than children. That such ability, natural or acquired, is necessary to the protection of themselves and their fellow servants in such situations seems to be reasonably clear. Hence there is cogent reason for a higher standard or measure of capacity on the part of the infant in cases arising between master and servant. In service the boy is charged with novel duties and exposed to unaccustomed hazards, and charged with responsibilities like or very similar to those imposed upon adults. He has not grown up with them, as he has with the hazards of the street, the playground, and mere casual contact with men, structures, machines, animals, vehicles, and other means of injury. Without noting it or giving any reason for it, the courts seem to make this distinction. In cases between master and servant, in which the plaintiff is an infant under 14 years of age, contributory negligence is seldom declared as matter of law. In other cases, this result is of frequent occurrence, as will appear from an examination of the long list of decisions herein cited.

We have no doubt the plaintiff knew the danger of going upon a railroad track without looking for trains. His home was in Clay county, on the line of a railroad, and he was in Huntington, at the time of the injury, attending the spring term of school at Marshall College. His situation and engagement at the time indicate possession of the intelligence and discretion of boys of his age, thousands of whom daily cross railroads, trolley lines, and highways, exercising discretion and prudence requisite to their safety. Hence the trial court properly held him guilty of negligence as matter of law.

[5, 6] But, if the servants of the railway company in charge of the train omitted a duty, performance of which would have avoided the injury, such omission must be deemed the proximate cause thereof, and the defendant is liable, notwithstanding the plaintiff's negligence. Though not established by the city as a public one, the crossing on which the boy was hurt was a way provided by the defendant company itself for travel across its tracks. It was at the end of a city street regularly established and maintained, and planked between the rails and on the outside thereof by the defendant, and a post with cross-arms, bearing the warning: "Look out for the locomotive. Railroad Crossing"—stood near it. Under principles declared in Ray v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 57 W. Va. 333, 50 S. E. 413, this may have been such a crossing as required the statutory signals. Be that as it may, persons coming upon the track at that point were there by invitation, and the company owed them the common-law duty imposed in favor of persons on a public crossing, since they were neither trespassers nor bare licensees. Elliott on Railroads, § 1154, sustained by ample authorities cited. Such common-law duty includes maintenance of a lookout or other adequate means of avoiding collision at crossings, and failure to do so is negligence, constituting proximate cause of injury, even though the plaintiff himself was negligent in going upon the track, if the performance of such duty would have prevented injury. 2 Thomp. Neg. §§ 1596, 1597; Elliott, Railroads, § 1175. The principle has been recognized and applied in a crossing case, as well as others, by this court. Riedel v. Traction Co., 71 S. E. 174; Washington v. Railroad Co., 17 W. Va. 190; Downey v. Railway Co., 28 W. Va. 732; Vance v. Railway Co., 53 W. Va. 338, 44 S. E. 461; McKelvey v. Railway Co., 35 W. Va. 500, 14 S. E. 261; Layne v. Railroad Co., 35 W. Va. 438, 14 S. E. 123; Raines v. Railway Co., 39 W. Va. 50, 19 S. E. 565, 24 L. R. A. 226. Opinions of witnesses vary as to the distance of the train when the boy came upon the track, as well as the rate of speed; but the jury could have found the distance to be 50 or 60 feet, and the rate of speed 12 miles per hour, and also that injury would have been avoided by a checking of the speed of the train. Uncontradicted testimony was adduced, showing the engineer could have checked the speed almost instantaneously, had he seen the boy when he came on the track, and adopted emergency precautions. It was also competent for them to infer that the engineer would have seen him when he came on the track, or even earlier, and apparently intending to come upon it, if he had performed the duty incumbent upon him in running his train over a crossing. Opposing this is evidence tending to prove the boy was struck almost as soon as he got on the track, and that the train was so close no assistance could be rendered him; but this is not conclusive. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the case should have been permitted to go to the jury, and that the trial court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the evidence.

The judgment will be reversed, the demurrer to the evidence overruled, and judgment rendered for the damages assessed by the jury and costs, both in this court, and the court below.

Reversed.

BRANNON and MILLER, JJ., concur. WILLIAMS, P., and ROBINSON, J., concur only in result and syllabus; WILLIAMS, P., reserving right to file concurring note.

WILLIAMS, P. (concurring). I concur in the judgment, but not in the correctness of all the principles asserted in the opinion. I do not believe it accords with the weight of authority, and I know it does not with our own previous decisions, to say that the court can determine, as matter of law, whether or not an infant under the age of 14 is guilty of negligence. Nor do I acquiesce in the view that the relation of master and servant can have any effect to vary the rules of evidence respecting negligence. Such relation may, and often does, determine relative duties. But once they are determined, it must be ascertained what is negligence in any given case, independent of any contractual relation. The law of negligence rests upon relative duties. The policy of the law forbids any one to contract against negligence. Every one is bound to exercise reasonable care for his own safety and for the safety of others. He may by contract enlarge his duties, but he cannot lessen them, whether he be employer or employé. The degree of care required must be commensurate with the danger attending the business the party is engaged in, if he is employer; or commensurate with the amount of risk he has assumed, if he is employé. Negligence which causes injury is a wrong, and the remedy therefor is by an action in tort. The duty to exercise care, both for one's own safety and the safety of others, exists, independent of contractual relations, and I can see no sufficient reason for applying one rule of evidence to prove what is negligence in one case, and a different rule to prove it in another. Of course, contractual relation may have the effect to create duties which did not before exist, but once the new duties are determined, the rules respecting the kind and quantity of evidence necessary to prove whether a party has failed in the performance of his duty, or not, are the same. In other words, an infant under 14 years of age is no more capable of caring for his safety when he is unemployed than when he is employed.

According to the weight of authorities, and according to our own decisions, the question of negligence in an infant under 14 years of age cannot be determined, as matter of law, by the court, but must be left to the jury to decide, under proper instructions by the court as to the principles of law to be applied in determining a fact. Negligence of an infant under 14 depends largely upon his capacity, knowledge of danger, and the degree of caution which a child of his temperament will exercise, even in the presence of a known danger. There are such variable quantities in children between 7 and 14 years of age that the law provides no fixed standard by which to measure the negligence of all children between those ages. The same act which would constitute negligence in one child might not amount to negligence in another of the same age. By a unanimous opinion, we held, in Ewing v. Lanark Fuel Co., 65 W. Va. 726, 65 S. E. 200, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 487, that an infant under 14 years of age is not presumed to have sufficient capacity to avoid danger; and that his capacity had to be proven, in order to make out the defense of his contributory negligence. Now, if there is no presumption in favor of capacity, and the capacity is a question of fact essential to be proven, in order to determine whether or not the child has been guilty of negligence, how can it be properly said that the court can determine the question of negligence as matter of law?

CRIM et al. v. O'BRIEN et al.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 19*)—
MISTAKE IN DEED.

Before equity will reform a deed on the ground of a mistake, it must be established by clear proof that the mistake was mutual between grantor and grantee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reformation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. §§ 74-78; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

2. DEEDS (§ 112*)—CONSTRUCTION—DESCRIPTION OF LAND.

If a grantor describe the land intended to be conveyed by his deed only in general terms, and then make reference to another deed of conveyance for the same land which contains a more certain description of it by boundary lines and corners, for the purpose of a more definite description, he thereby adopts such lines and corners as a part of the description of the land which he conveys.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 323, 324; Dec. Dig. § 112.*]

3. DEEDS (§ 111*)—CONSTRUCTION—DESCRIPTION OF LAND.

If two inconsistent descriptions of land intended to be conveyed are contained in a deed of conveyance, one general and indefinite as to boundaries, and the other specific as to boundary lines and corners, the latter description will prevail over the former.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. § 315; Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Barbour County.

Bill by Edward H. Crim and Cora M. Peck against Daniel O'Brien and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

W. T. Ice, Jr., for appellants. Wm. T. George, for appellees.

WILLIAMS, P. E. H. Crim and Cora M. Peck, devisees of J. N. B. Crim, deceased, brought a suit in equity in the circuit court of Barbour county against Daniel O'Brien and others, for the purpose of correcting what is alleged to be a mistake in the description of a certain tract of land intended to be conveyed by them as the devisees and heirs of J. N. B. Crim to said O'Brien, on the ground that the mistake was a mutual one. On the 29th of September, 1908, the court heard the cause upon the pleadings and evidence, and denied plaintiffs relief and dismissed their bill, and they have appealed.

The deed sought to be corrected is dated May 3, 1906, and describes the land conveyed in the following language, to wit: "All that certain tract or parcel of 645 acres of land, more or less, situate on the west side of the Tygarts Valley river, in Valley district of Barbour county, West Virginia, owned by the said J. N. B. Crim and devised to said devisees, parties of the first part, by his last will and testament, which is duly probated in the office of the clerk of the county court of said county in Will Book No. 2, and the same land theretofore conveyed to the said J. N. B. Crim by Melville Peck, special commissioner, in the chancery cause of J. N. B. Crim v. Melville N. O'Brien and others, lately pending in the circuit court of Barbour county, by deed which is duly recorded in said county clerk's office in Deed Book No. 47, at page 405, and being the same tract of land theretofore conveyed to said Melville N. O'Brien by Benjamin Rich and others, by deed dated November 12th, 1883, which is recorded in said county clerk's office, in Deed Book No. 23, at page 354, and therein described as containing 795 acres, except 150 acres thereof, now owned by Daniel O'Brien, which was devised to him by the last will and testament of one Hannah O'Brien, deceased, to all of which said several deeds, reference is here made for a more particular description of the said tract of 645 acres of land, more or less, hereby conveyed as aforesaid, but this is a conveyance in gross, not by the acre." The 150 acres excepted is not involved.

A brief history of the title to this and other adjoining tracts of land is essential to a clear understanding of the question here involved. The 645-acre tract is a part of a tract of 795 acres, surveyed and entered by Daniel O'Brien and Enoch Hall in 1858. They did not obtain a grant for it, but, on discovering that it lay within the boundary of a tract of 100,000 acres owned by Benjamin Rich and others, Melville N. O'Brien, the son of Daniel O'Brien, procured a conveyance thereof from them to himself, on the 12th of November, 1883. That deed described the 795 acres by metes and bounds, and as "being the same land embraced in a survey made for Enoch Hall and Daniel O'Brien, dated the 29th of April, 1858." In 1858, Daniel O'Brien conveyed to Bridget McGinnis, by metes and bounds, 243¼ acres, a part of which lies within the bounds of the Rich deed to M. N. O'Brien. That Daniel O'Brien did not then have title is not material, inasmuch as the controversy relates only to the question of identification by description. In 1883 Bridget McGinnis divided the 243-acre tract, and conveyed 147 acres to Patrick McGinnis, and the balance to Bridget Caughlin. These two tracts are known in the suit as the Caughlin and the McGinnis tracts. The former is not claimed by any of the parties to the suit. But the boundary lines of the Rich deed to Melville N. O'Brien include 13.8 acres of the McGinnis tract. The 13.8 acres is the bone of contention; plaintiffs contending that it was included within the description of the boundaries of their deed to Daniel O'Brien for the 645 acres by mistake; and O'Brien denying that there was such mistake.

At the time they made the deed to O'Brien, plaintiffs were the owners of both the 645 acres and the McGinnis 147-acre tract, having acquired title to the latter tract by judicial sale and a commissioner's deed, made in a suit against Patrick McGinnis by his lien creditors, and title to the former by a judicial sale and commissioner's deed, made at a later time, in a suit against M. N. O'Brien by his lien creditors. Melville Peck was the commissioner to make deed in the latter suit, and in 1901 did make deed to J. N. B. Crim, the purchaser of the 645 acres. Said commissioner, in his deed, did not describe the land by metes and bounds, but only generally, as "being the land described in the deed of Benjamin Rich, etc., to said O'Brien, dated Nov. 12, 1883, and of record in the proper office in Deed Book 23, page 354, except 150 acres thereof now owned by said Hannah O'Brien, containing 645 acres, more or less, being the home place of M. N. O'Brien and Daniel O'Brien."

By the testimony of Alva Wolverton, who surveyed the lines of the Rich tract, and also the lines of the McGinnis and the Caughlin tracts, and made plats thereof, which are parts of the record, it appears that the Rich tract includes 13.8 acres of the McGinnis tract, and also a considerable portion of the Caughlin tract, but how much of the latter tract is included does not appear, nor is it material. The 13.8 acres is therefore a part of both the Patrick McGinnis tract and the 645-acre tract, to both of which tracts plaintiffs had title at the time of making the deed to Daniel O'Brien for the 645 acres.

At the time plaintiffs sold this tract to Daniel O'Brien, a number of suits were pending, in which the Crims and O'Briens were interested; one suit, styled Nancy O'Brien v. J. N. B. Crim and others, the object of which was to cancel certain judgments recovered by said Crim against Melville O'Brien, Hannah O'Brien, and Wm. S. O'Brien; another suit, brought by M. N. O'Brien against J. N. B. Crim and others, the object of which was to establish a trust between M. N. O'Brien and said Crim, in relation to the 645 acres of land; and still another suit, styled State of West Virginia v. W. F. S. Auvil and others, one object of which was to sell the 645 acres, as forfeited to the state for nonpayment of taxes. It was for the purpose of compromising and settling these suits that the sale and conveyance of the 645 acres was made by the plaintiffs to Daniel O'Brien. J. N. B. Crim had died testate, devising the land to plaintiffs. On the 30th of April, 1906, the executors and devisees of J. N. B. Crim, deceased, and Daniel O'Brien and M. N. O'Brien, acting by their attorney in fact, Samuel V. Woods, made a written contract, which recites that Daniel O'Brien and J. N. B. Crim had both filed petitions in the suit last above named, each claiming the right to redeem the 645 acres of land; that it was agreed that the title to the 645 acres should be redeemed by the devisees of J. N. B. Crim; and that it should then be by them conveyed to Daniel O'Brien in consideration of $10,000. The $10,000 was paid, and the land was conveyed to Daniel O'Brien, pursuant to that written agreement which describes the land as follows: "All their [plaintiffs'] right, title and interest, whether now owned or hereafter acquired in said redemption proceedings, in said suit as aforesaid or in any other suits or proceedings, touching the same, in and to the said tract of 645 acres of land, which is situate in Valley district, of said county, on the Tygarts Valley and Middle Fork rivers, which is the same land heretofore conveyed by Melville Peck, special commissioner, in the chancery cause of Crim v. Melville N. O'Brien, etc., lately pending in said circuit court to said J. N. B. Crim, deceased, by deed which is duly recorded in the county clerk's office of Barbour county."

[2, 3] The bill does not aver that there is any mistake in the description in the contract; neither does it aver fraud. Hence the written contract is the best evidence of what the grantors intended to convey by the deed to be made in consummation thereof; and parol evidence is not admissible to vary it. The description of the land in the deed is substantially the same as in the contract; they vary a little in verbiage, but they both describe the same identical tract of land. Both descriptions are general, it is true; but they both refer to the Melville Peck commissioner's deed to Crim, for description, and, by reference to that deed, we find that it contains a reference to the Benjamin Rich deed to M. N. O'Brien, for description, and reading that deed we find it describes the land by metes and bounds, by lines and corners. The deed which the bill prays to have reformed describes the land by direct reference to both the Peck commissioner's deed and the Benjamin Rich deed, for the express purpose of "a more particular description of the said tract of 645 acres of land." Thus, by reference to the Rich deed, the grantors have given a description of the land by metes and bounds. It is the only deed in the chain of title which does give courses and distances, and plaintiffs have adopted the particular description given in that deed by referring to it for description. And Wolverton's survey and map, read in connection with his testimony, locates the boundary lines, and shows them to contain 13.8 acres of the McGinnis tract. Therefore, plaintiffs cannot now be heard to say that it was not their intention to include that portion of the McGinnis tract in their deed to Daniel O'Brien. General description must yield to particular description, when there is discrepancy. Hence such general description of the land as "the home place of M. N. O'Brien and Daniel O'Brien" must yield to the description by boundary lines found in the Rich deed. South Penn Oil Co. v. Knox, 68 W. Va. 362, 69 S. E. 1020; 13 Cyc. 631; Tiedeman's Real Prop. § 592. But the description, "the home place of M. N. O'Brien and Daniel O'Brien," is not found in plaintiffs' deed to Daniel O'Brien. That description is found only in the deed from Melville Peck, commissioner, to J. N. B. Crim, and the fact that grantors did not use those words of general description in their deed to Daniel O'Brien is a circumstance which would seem to indicate that they did not mean to so limit the quantity of land, which they were conveying, because they owned both the O'Brien home place and the McGinnis tract adjoining it. When reference is made in a deed, containing only a general description of land, to another deed or plat, which contains description by metes and bounds, for the purpose of describing the land intended to be conveyed, it has the same effect as if such particular description in the deed or plat referred to were incorporated in the deed. 13 Cyc. 632; Tiedeman's Real Prop. § 605; Snooks v. Wingfield, 52 W. Va. 441, 44 S. E. 277; Bank v. Stewart, 93 Va. 447, 25 S. E. 543.

O'Brien denies that there was a mistake, and plaintiffs have not only failed to prove that O'Brien knew there was a mistake when he took the deed, but, in view of the written contract of sale, the correctness of which they have not assailed, they have failed to establish that a mistake occurred on their own part.

[1] The only ground of relief is an alleged mistake in the description in the deed of the land intended to be conveyed, and before equity will correct such mistake, unaccompanied with fraud, it must be clearly proven, and must be a mutual one. To correct a mistake, not mutual between the parties, would be in effect to make a contract for them. Robinson v. Braidon, 44 W. Va. 183, 28 S. E. 798; Ferrell v. Ferrell, 53 W. Va. 515, 44 S. E. 187; Pusey v. Gardner, 21 W. Va. 469. See, also, Diman v. Providence, etc., R. R. Co., 5 R. I. 130. Before a deed will be reformed for mistake, the evidence to establish it must be clear and convincing. Koen v. Kerna, 47 W. Va. 575, 35 S. E. 902.

The testimony of witnesses as to the impressions or opinions Byrer may have had concerning the particular land intended to be conveyed is hearsay, and altogether improper. He acted only as scrivener in drawing up the deed, which was evidently prepared according to the written contract of compromise and sale. Plaintiffs themselves did not know the land and its surroundings; they had never been on it, and, of course, were not familiar with its boundaries. Therefore it clearly appears that they are resting their case upon proof of facts and conditions which, although they existed at the time, have become known to them since they made their deed to O'Brien. This makes their case very much weaker than it might otherwise have been, because, not knowing the land, how could they have been mistaken as to its boundary lines? The inference is that they described it by referring to another deed with metes and bounds, because that was the surest way of describing it then known to them.

That a public road separates the 13.8 acres from the other portion of the 645 acres, and that, on the day after the deed was made to O'Brien, he sold the coal underlying all the land, except the 13.8 acres, are facts relied on by plaintiffs to prove that O'Brien knew that it was not plaintiffs' intention to include in the deed any part of the McGinnis tract. But these are only circumstances tending to prove a fact; they are not inconsistent with O'Brien's claim that he knew the deed conveyed to him a part of the McGinnis tract; he had a right to sell any, or all, of his coal. These facts are not sufficient to overcome the presumption that it was the grantors' intention to convey all the land in the bounds of the Rich deed, except the 150 acres not in dispute.

O'Brien has strung a wire fence around the McGinnis tract, and apparently claims the whole of it, by virtue of his deed from plaintiffs, but the decision of this case affects 13.8 acres only of the McGinnis tract; it being that part of it included within the boundary lines of the deed from Benjamin Rich to Melville N. O'Brien. Title to said 13.8 acres passed from plaintiffs to O'Brien, by virtue of their deed.

Bridget Caughlin is not a party to the bill, and, of course, her rights are not affected; no party to the suit seems to be claiming any part of her land, notwithstanding a part of it, also, is included within the boundary lines of the Rich deed.

It appears from the evidence that no part of any of the smaller tracts of land which Daniel O'Brien, after receiving his deed, conveyed to Joseph O'Brien, Lucy O'Brien, Maggie J. O'Brien Booth, and George Booth, and to Melville N. O'Brien, lies within the McGinnis tract, and none of the coal conveyed to Lewis underlies any part of it; and hence none of those parties was a proper party to the suit.

For the reasons herein stated, the decree of the lower court will be affirmed.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1097*)—SECOND APPEAL—LAW OF THE CASE.

This is a review of this case on writ of error to a judgment rendered in a second trial. There was also a review by this court of the first trial, reported in 61 W. Va. 9, 55 S. E. 899. The law governing this review of the case will be found in the syllabus to the former review.

Error to Circuit Court, Randolph County.

Action by E. Clark Ice against W. B. Maxwell and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

C. H. Scott and H. G. Kump, for plaintiffs in error. James A. Bent and Samuel T. Spears, for defendant in error.

WILLIAMS, P. Plaintiff recovered a judgment for $500 against W. B. Maxwell, L. P. Loudin, William Flint, and J. A. Cunningham, and they have obtained this writ of error. This case was reviewed upon a former writ of error, and will be found reported in 61 W. Va. 9, 55 S. E. 899.

Plaintiff's suit is for services rendered in procuring a purchaser for a tract of timber land in Randolph county controlled, and later owned, by defendants, pursuant to an alleged oral agreement that for such services he should be paid $500. That he did procure a purchaser and introduce him to defendants, and that defendants thereupon began negotiations with him, which in a short time thereafter ended in their selling the land to him, are undisputed facts. In relation to a number of facts, however, the testimony of the plaintiff and of the defendants is irreconcilably in conflict. But as to the credibility of witnesses, the weight of this testimony, the jury were the judges. We cannot disturb the verdict when it rests upon conflicting testimony of witnesses.

At the time plaintiff was employed to find a purchaser defendants were not the owners of the land in question, but Mr. Cunningham had an option contract with the owners to purchase it at a certain price. That option expired on the 28th day of February, 1903. It was on the 11th of March following that plaintiff introduced to defendants the man who purchased from them. On the day before the option expired, the land was taken over by defendants. It was then conveyed by the owners to L. P. Loudin, trustee, who held it in trust for himself and the others in the following proportions, viz.: Flint and Maxwell each a fourth, Loudin one-eighth, and Cunningham three-eighths. On the same day a written declaration of trust was signed by all four of the defendants, showing the several interests as above stated. Prior to that time Mr. Maxwell had become jointly interested with Mr. Cunningham in the option, and, not finding a purchaser and seeing the option about to expire, they decided to purchase the land themselves, and did so, by interesting the two other defendants, Loudin and Flint, as partners. They bought the land for the purpose of speculation, and were as anxious to find a purchaser after the 28th of February as before. The cause for limiting plaintiff to the 28th of February as the time in which he could find a purchaser was removed by their taking over the land themselves, and by their continuing desire to sell, and they never notified plaintiff of their own purchase of the land, but apparently permitted him to continue his efforts to find a purchaser, without any new agreement or understanding. Being now the owners, they had the power to extend plaintiff's time, as well as the opportunity to receive the benefit of his services. Whether or not the time was extended was a fact, which the jury might have inferred from the facts and the conduct of the parties.

Plaintiff testifies that, on the day the purchaser with whom he had been in correspondence arrived in the city of Elkins, he went to Mr. Maxwell and asked him if the land was still for sale, and told him, if it was, he would bring the man to his office and introduce him to him, and that Mr. Maxwell replied that the land was still on the market, and that the man had come just at the right time, because Mr. Cunningham was in town, and could show him the timber thoroughly, and would more probably make a sale than anybody else. He says Mr. Maxwell told him to bring the party around, and that he did so, and introduced him to Mr. Maxwell and Mr. Cunningham. He also says that, before introducing the purchaser, he asked Mr. Maxwell what figures he should price the land to him, and that Mr. Maxwell replied that he had better price it at $31 per acre, and give them a chance to drop a little on it. The land was sold to this purchaser at $27 per acre. After the sale was consummated, and the consideration, or a portion of it paid, $100 was left in the hands of Mr. Maxwell to pay plaintiff for his services; defendants admitting that he was entitled to something, but claiming that, as the land had not been sold before the 28th of February, and was sold for less than $30 an acre, plaintiff was not entitled to $500, as per the original agreement. But, if plaintiff's testimony is true, it tends to prove a waiver of the time limit in the contract of employment, or an extension, rather, of the original agreement. Defendants accepted the benefit of plaintiff's services, after the 28th of February, and at a time when his services seem to be just as beneficial to them as if they had been rendered before the 28th of February. Point 5 of the syllabus, declared by this court on the former hearing, is binding on both this court and the litigants. It is the law of this case, whether it correctly states the law or not. Pennington v. Gillaspie, 66 W. Va. 643, 66 S. E. 1009. By that law, if plaintiff's testimony is true, defendants are liable for the sum fixed by the agreement.

Seven instructions were given on behalf of plaintiff. It is useless to review them seriatim, as they involve no novel legal proposition. It suffices to say that we have carefully considered them, and find that they conform to the law as announced on the former hearing.

Five instructions asked for by defendants were refused. As an abstract proposition of law, No. 1 is correct; but, if applied to the facts of this case, it would be misleading, because it ignores the question of any implied extension of time beyond the 28th of February for plaintiff to find a purchaser. Nos. 2 and 4 are bad, because they are confusing and misleading. They would lead the jury to believe that the purchase of the land by defendants themselves would defeat recovery, unless there was a new contract of service made thereafter, or an express extension of the old one. This, we have already said, is not the law to apply to this case. Defendants' purchase under the option, and the conveyance of the land to Loudin, trustee for all the defendants, does not defeat plaintiff's right to recover on the original contract of service, because it is admitted that he furnished a purchaser to whom defendants afterwards sold. That the purchaser was introduced after the 28th of February, and the sale made to him at a price under $30 per acre, does not defeat recovery, in view of the law of this case, above referred to. By accepting plaintiff's services, by selling to the purchaser whom he found and introduced to them, defendants became liable under the original agreement.

No. 3 is objectionable, and was properly refused, because there is no evidence whatever that plaintiff's services were to be gratuitous. And No. 5 is bad because it introduces the element of a new, or additional, contract concerning which there is no evidence offered, by either party.

But for the special contract, plaintiff might have recovered a judgment two or three times as large, on a quantum meruit, under the common assumpsit counts. His evidence tends to prove that such service as he rendered was reasonably worth much more than he had agreed to accept.

We find no error calling for a reversal, and will affirm the judgment.

CARR v. COFFMAN.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. SALES (§ 126*)—RESCISSION—UNREASONABLE DELAY.

Delay for 30 days by the buyer to rescind the purchase of a sow, bought for breeding purposes, under a guaranty that she is pregnant, and giving him the right to rescind the sale if she should afterwards prove not to be pregnant, is not unreasonable delay.

2. SALES (§ 121*)—PROPOSITIONS OF SETTLEMENT—ACQUIESCENCE BY BUYER.

Mere silence and failure to reply to a written proposition, when there is no legal duty to reply, does not amount to acquiescence therein, so as to constitute an agreement between parties.

Error to Circuit Court, Mercer County.

Action by W. W. Carr against W. H. Coffman. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Ritz & Ritz, for plaintiff in error. Hale & Pendleton and Longley & Jordan, for defendant in error.

WILLIAMS, P. This suit is to recover the price of a sow, known as Lady Premier the III, of Willowdale, which W. H. Coffman sold to W. W. Carr on the 2d of February, 1907, at the price of $425, under the following guaranty, viz.: "Every sow sold in pig is guaranteed to be safe in pig, or will be kept at our risk and expense until safely over two periods. If by chance a sow should come in again after shipping we will satisfy the buyers either by refunding his money and shipping charges and taking sow back, or, if he prefers, we will substitute another sow in pig and equally good, or else he can breed the sow himself and we will refund him a reasonable amount for loss of time."

The sow was shipped to plaintiff on June 20th, and he was notified that she was due to farrow the latter part of July, or first of August. She did not farrow at that time, and plaintiff wrote defendant on the 27th of August that she had not farrowed, and that there was no indication that she was with pig, and that on the 30th of August he would ship her back. In the letter he says: "I paid you $190 cash and gave you note for $500 for six hogs (5 sows and boar) ('tis five) after returning Lady Premier 3rd of Willowdale I will have only Danesfield Majesty 2nd, $75 and Premier Lad, $55, making a total of $130. Please let me know what the express has been on hogs both ways, so that I may know just how we stand. * * * I do not like to take the sows, but if you can't get them to breed with all of your facilities, they don't look promising for me off here by myself. Judging from your last sale you can resell them at much higher prices than I bought them, and I certainly hope so and wish you all success in future sales." Pursuant to this notice, plaintiff shipped the sow on the 30th of August.

On the 29th of August, 1907, defendant wrote plaintiff as follows: "Replying to your letter of August 27th, will say that we are almost grieved that Lady Premier 3rd of Willowdale did not prove to be safe. We felt sure that she was safe before we shipped her. She should have been safe to farrow long about the first of August. I am sorry that you allowed so much time to elapse in case you want us to breed her again. We will look out for this sow and do the best we can for her." On August 30th defendant again wrote as follows: "Lady Premier arrived. I will send her over to a lot in the woods. I will have to keep her in quarantine before I can let her come in contact with my hogs. In the crate she looks pretty good. I think we can fix her up for you, especially when the weather gets a little cooler. Lady Premier is in excellent condition at this time. We felt sure that this sow was safe before we shipped her. Possibly she had some accident." To this letter plaintiff made no reply, but on the 10th of October following he again wrote defendant, demanding a return of the money paid for the sow, and threatening to sue if the money was not refunded. On the 12th of October defendant wrote a lengthy reply to this letter, in which he complained because plaintiff had kept the sow 30 or 40 days after her time to farrow had passed, without making complaint, and says: "There was that much time lost. When she was returned to us to be bred, we stated that we could not breed her until she passed through quarantine. * * * We think it is too soon for you to kick, and more especially when we have had one of your hogs ready to ship for some time. You must consider that we have kept this hog for you and she has been no expense to you. This has been helping us to keep our guarantee." In this letter he also denies the right of plaintiff to demand a refunding of the price.

The facts are that when the sow was returned defendant placed her in quarantine and kept her there about two months, that he then put her in what he called the detention lot, and after she had been in there for a week or ten days she became lame, and never recovered from the lameness, and he never allowed his boar to go to her after her return. The sow died on the 27th or 28th of January, 1908, of pneumonia, having been sick with this disease only about three days. The suit was begun on the 17th of January, 1908.

Coffman defends the suit on two grounds: (1) He insists that plaintiff waived his right to "rescind" the contract of sale by his failure to act promptly after discovering that the sow was not in pig; and (2) that plaintiff's failure to reply to defendant's letter of August 30th amounted to an acquiescence in the proposition therein contained to re-breed the sow for plaintiff.

What were plaintiff's rights under the contract of warranty, when he discovered that the sow was not in pig? Clearly he could elect to do any one of three things, all of which are expressly stipulated in the written guaranty. (1) He could return the sow, and demand that the price be refunded; (2) he could return her, and demand another, safe in pig, equally as good; or (3) he could keep her and breed her himself, and demand a reasonable sum for the loss of time in breeding. His letter of August 27th, above quoted from, indicates very clearly that plaintiff had elected to take the benefit of the first of said provisions. We do not see how his letter and his conduct, in view of the contract, could have been otherwise interpreted by defendant. He did not intimate that he was returning the sow to have her bred. But, on the contrary, he suggests to defendant that he can resell the sow at a better price than plaintiff had paid for her.

[1] It is insisted that plaintiff did not exercise his right to "rescind" the contract within a reasonable time. But this is not a case involving the right of rescission, where no such right is reserved in the contract.

Here the right to rescind is a part of the express agreement, and in rescinding the sale plaintiff is only exercising a contractual right. He is not breaking the contract, but he is complying with its very terms. Rescission of the sale is one of the three means stipulated in the contract of sale whereby, according to plaintiff's election, defendant can make good his guaranty. No doubt plaintiff would have to exercise his choice of rights within a reasonable time, but we do not understand that he is held to such strict diligence in exercising such a contractual right as he would be if he were seeking to rescind a contract of sale for fraud. But he should, at least, be reasonably diligent; and we think plaintiff has shown such diligence. He explains why he did not ship the sow back as soon as he learned that she was not in pig, and, in view of the facts in this case, we do not think the delay was unreasonable. He testified that another sow that he bought of defendant had gone two weeks over the time when he was advised she would farrow, and that he wanted to give Lady Premier a fair test, and be sure she was not in pig before returning her; and, furthermore, that at the time he became satisfied she was not in pig he knew defendant was in Illinois, and he wanted to reship the sow when defendant was at home, and waited for his return. Moreover, it appears from defendant's own evidence that the delay was no disadvantage to him. He states in his letter that he would "fix her up" when the weather got cooler, meaning he would have her bred to his boar. It was then the last of August. Plaintiff had kept the sow through the hot month of August, a time when defendant would not have bred her, if he had had her.

[2] This case is not controlled by Ford v. Friedman, 40 W. Va. 177, 20 S. E. 930, as counsel for defendant insist. The goods, in that case, were not sold upon a guaranty, as was the sow in the present case. In that case the buyer refused to receive the goods because they were shipped too late for the spring sales, for which they had been bought. The seller wrote the buyer, recognizing his right to return the goods, and proposed that, if he would accept them, he would extend the time of payment. To the letter the buyer made no reply, and did not return the goods. The court properly held in that case that fair dealing required that the buyer should either have replied to the seller's letter, or re-marked the goods for return, and mailed to seller the bill of lading; and that, not having done either, his silence and his refusal to act amounted to acquiescence in the seller's proposition to keep the goods in consideration of an extension of the time of payment. But in the present case the sow was returned in a reasonable time, pursuant to express agreement that she might be returned and the price refunded, if she proved not to be in pig, and was received by the seller "in excellent condition," as he himself states. The buyer then owed the seller no further duty. He had done all that the seller had any right to require, or to expect, of him under their agreement. The seller then had both the sow and her purchase price. The contract of sale did not provide that the buyer might return the sow to have her rebred; and therefore the seller had no right to interpret the buyer's letter, or his action in returning the sow, to mean that he wished her to be rebred. In view of the terms of the agreement, the return of the sow could have meant nothing more or less than a rescission of the sale.

But, suppose defendant did interpret plaintiff's refusal to reply to his letter of August 30th to be an acceptance of the proposition therein contained, his own evidence clearly proves that he was not thereby misled to his injury. He did not attempt to rebreed the sow, notwithstanding he had her in his possession from August 30th to some time in November, during nearly all of which time she appears to have been doing well. He does not explain why he did not let his boar to her on some cool morning in October, after she had been in quarantine for more than a month. He has not shown reasonable diligence to comply with his own proposition, to which he now seeks to hold plaintiff bound, as if it had been accepted. He first complains that plaintiff did not return the sow soon enough, but, after receiving her "in excellent condition," as he states, he placed her in quarantine and kept her there for two months, and then transferred her to the detention lot and kept her there for a week or 10 days before she became lame; and all this time he did not let his boar to her, and the only explanation given is that there was danger of losing his boar by allowing him to go to a sow when the temperature of the weather was above 70 degrees.

As to the second point of defense, that plaintiff's failure to reply to defendant's letter of August 30th should be construed to be an acquiescence in the proposition to rebreed the sow, it may be said that that was a thing wholly different from anything stipulated in the agreement. It was a proposition which required acceptance before becoming an agreement. Mere silence and refusal to accept a proposition will not be construed into acquiescence, when there is no duty to reply. Carr's failure to reply to Coffman's letter was not an acquiescence in the proposition submitted to rebreed the sow. There is no evidence that their minds ever met on that proposition. True, plaintiff testifies that he had not fully made up his mind not to keep the sow until about the 10th of October, but his indecision was never communicated to defendant; and therefore he could not have been misled by plaintiff's silence. He may have been all that time deciding whether or not he would accept defendant's proposition.

Such proposition, being a departure from the original contract of sale, could not become binding upon plaintiff until it was accepted, and it never was accepted.

The judgment of the lower court will be affirmed.

CASSIDAY FORK BOOM & LUMBER CO.
v. TERRY et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 19, 1911. Rehearing Denied
Jan. 18, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 229*)—CONSTRUCTIVE TRUST IN LAND—NOTICE OF EQUITABLE TITLE IN THIRD PERSON.

In a suit in equity, the object of which is to establish a constructive trust in land, founded upon an alleged fraudulent conveyance, made by a corporation, the fact that the deed of the corporation was delivered in consideration of money paid to, or a debt due from, the president of the corporation, without proof of want of consideration moving from the president to the corporation, is not notice of an equitable title to the land so conveyed in a third party.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 477-494; Dec. Dig. § 229.*]

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 429*)—FRAUD OF AGENT—NOTICE.

That one of two deeds contemporaneously delivered to the same grantee subsequently turned out to have been forged, and was canceled as a forged deed, is not alone evidence of fraud on the part of the grantee in the acceptance of the other deed, or of knowledge on his part of fraudulent intent on the part of the grantor or his agent in executing and delivering the same.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1720-1723; Dec. Dig. § 429.*]

3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 242*)—BONA FIDE PURCHASER FOR VALUE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

When a claim to protection as a bona fide purchaser for value and without notice is involved, the burden is on the party denying the validity of the purchase to prove notice of his equity, and upon the other party to prove good faith and payment of an adequate consideration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 603-605; Dec. Dig. § 242.*]

4. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 236*)—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—CONSIDERATION.

If the property in question in such case has been purchased along with numerous other pieces of property for a lump sum, the purchaser is not denied protection because he is unable to show that a specific price was fixed upon the property in controversy, if he proves payment of an adequate consideration for all the property included in the purchase.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 570; Dec. Dig. § 236.*]

5. DEPOSITIONS (§ 111*)—EXAMINATION OF PARTY BEFORE TRIAL—REFUSAL TO ANSWER QUESTION—NECESSITY FOR RULING.

A decree pronounced upon the pleadings and evidence as made up and filed in the court below will not be reversed for failure of a defendant, examined as a witness in another state, to answer questions propounded to him, if it appears that he has submitted to an examination, answered many of the questions substantially covering the case, but declined to answer others, claiming he is not bound to do so, and no ruling of the court below, respecting his duty to answer, has been asked for or taken, and he has had no opportunity to answer them after an adverse ruling on his objections thereto. By submitting the case without having made an attempt to obtain answers to the questions, the plaintiff is deemed to have waived any rights he may have had respecting them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Depositions, Cent. Dig. §§ 329-339; Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

6. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 177*)—NOTICE TO AGENT BINDING UPON PRINCIPAL.

The principle of law making notice to an agent bind his principal applies in the case of a purchase of property through an agent, in violation of an equitable title thereto, or right respecting it, in a third party; and, if the agent with such notice purchases the property for his principal, the latter holds the title in trust for such third person.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. §§ 670-679; Dec. Dig. § 177.*]

7. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 14*)—EXISTENCE OF RELATION—NECESSITY FOR EXPRESS CONTRACT.

Proof of an express contract of agency is not essential to the establishment of the relation. It may be inferred from facts and circumstances, including conduct.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. §§ 26-33; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

8. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 70*)—AGENCY FOR BOTH PARTIES TO A CONTRACT.

The law does not inhibit agency for both parties to a contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. § 146; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

9. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 189*)—SUIT TO ESTABLISH—SUFFICIENCY OF BILL.

A bill against a purchaser of land who has acquired it by an agent on the theory of a purchase, in violation of an equitable right in the plaintiff, known to the agent at the time of the purchase, need not aver notice to the principal by or through the agent. It suffices to charge notice of the right generally.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Dec. Dig. § 189.*]

Robinson and Brannon, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County.

Bill by the Cassiday Fork Boom & Lumber Company against Henry C. Terry, Trustee, and others. Decree of dismissal, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Van Winkle & Ambler, for appellant. W. B. Maxwell, W. E. Baker, and E. A. Bowers, for appellees Henry C. Terry, E. J. Berwind and H. C. Davis.

POFFENBARGER, P. From a decree of the circuit court of Randolph county dismissing its bill against Henry C. Terry, trustee, the Middle Fork Coal & Lumber Company, the Roaring Creek Coal & Ooke Company, and Samuel B. Diller, praying relief against them in respect to two tracts of land, containing, in the aggregate, 1,788½ acres, the Cassiday Fork Boom & Lumber Company has appealed.

The appellant is a corporation to which on the 2d day of November, 1891, said land, known as lots No. 16 and 17, of a certain tract, containing, respectively, 916 acres and 872½ acres, had been conveyed by one O. C. Womelsdorf and wife. On the 16th day of August, 1893, said corporation conveyed the same to the Roaring Creek Coal & Coke Company for and in consideration of $9,000 of the bonds of the Roaring Creek & Charleston Railroad Company and $131 in cash. At the time there was a lien on the land for $2,500 of the original purchase money in favor of J. N. B. Crim and G. B. Harvey which sum the Roaring Creek Coal & Coke Company agreed to pay. By deed bearing date March 30, 1894, and admitted to record in the clerk's office of the county court of Randolph county on April 6, 1894, said two tracts of land were conveyed by the Roaring Creek Coal & Coke Company to the Middle Fork Coal & Lumber Company, another corporation. On the 22d day of May, 1894, an order was made by the directors of the Cassiday Fork Boom & Lumber Company instructing its treasurer to give to S. B. Diller for the repurchase of said two tracts of land from the Roaring Creek Coal & Coke Company said railroad company bonds and $131 in cash, and $500 to pay to the Roaring Creek Coal & Coke Company on account of the unpaid purchase money, which it had then paid, or was supposed to have paid, to Crim and Harvey, and to arrange for the payment of the remaining $2,000 later. Diller was the president of the Middle Fork Coal & Lumber Company, and it was understood and agreed that he was to take the bonds and cash to the office of the Roaring Creek Coal & Coke Company in New York, and have a deed made conveying these tracts to the plaintiff company. As we have seen, the Roaring Creek Coal & Coke Company had already conveyed the land to the Middle Fork Coal & Lumber Company, and on the 21st day of September, 1894, a deed was made by that company, through its president S. B. Diller, conveying the timber on the land back to the Roaring Creek Coal & Coke Company, and on the 11th day of June, 1895, said company, by Diller, its president, conveyed said two tracts of land to the defendant Henry C. Terry, trustee. The plaintiff alleges its ignorance until a short time before the institution of this suit, July 21, 1898, of the conveyances made by the Roaring Creek Coal & Coke Company to the Middle Fork Coal & Lumber Company, and by that company back to the Roaring Creek Coal & Coke Company and Terry, trustee, and fraud on the part of Diller and notice thereof and participation therein on the part of Terry, trustee, the Roaring Creek Coal & Coke Company, and the Middle Fork Coal & Lumber Company. It further charges that the Middle Fork Coal & Lumber Company, though in form a corporation, consisted of the defendant S. B. Diller, and never had any legal board of directors, and never authorized any conveyance by Diller to Terry, and never paid anything either to the Roaring Creek Coal & Coke Company or the plaintiff for said land.

An amended and supplemental bill was filed making Edward J. Berwind a party defendant, and containing the following additional allegations of fact: That the defendant Henry C. Terry represented said Berwind in a large number of transactions relating to real estate and other property in Randolph county, including the two tracts of land in controversy, and acted as his trustee in respect thereto; that Berwind had entered into a contract with Henry G. Davis, dated February 15, 1902, by which he had sold all of said property, including said two tracts of land, to said Davis; that said contract made specific reference to the claim of the Cassiday Fork Boom & Lumber Company to said two tracts of land, wherefore Davis had notice thereof; that, although the deed made by the Roaring Creek Coal & Coke Company, bearing date March 30, 1894, conveying said two tracts of land to the Middle Fork Company, antedates the meeting of the Cassiday Fork Company, at which the money and securities were turned over to Diller with instructions to repurchase said two tracts of land, negotiations had been pending for the repurchase thereof through Diller long before said meeting was held, and the Roaring Creek Company had agreed to reconvey the same in consideration of the railroad bonds and cash aforesaid, and it was then understood and believed that the title to said tract of land still stood in the name of said company; that the plaintiff did not at that time know the same had been conveyed to the Middle Fork Company; that Diller was president of the Middle Fork Company, and fully aware of the right of the plaintiff to have the legal title to the land which the Roaring Creek Company had conveyed to said Middle Fork Company; that it had also been discovered, shortly before the institution of this suit, that the Middle Fork Company, holding the title to said land with full notice of the plaintiff's right thereto in equity, had attempted to convey the same to said Terry; that about the date of the deed in question here Diller had forged a deed purporting to convey from the plaintiff to said Terry, trustee, 5,000 acres of land, which deed had, before the institution of this suit, been declared a forgery and set aside in another suit brought by the plaintiff against Terry and others in the circuit court of Randolph county; that Terry's participation in that fraudulent transaction, contemporaneous with the transactions complained of in this suit, and the intimate business relations existing between him and Diller since about the 1st day of January, 1895, and the fact that the railroad bonds mentioned had in some way passed into the hands of Terry, trustee, all taken together, established Terry's fraudulent participation in the transaction now in question; that no money or other thing of value was given by Terry, trustee, or any person claiming by, through, or under him for said land; that as plaintiff is informed and believes Berwind, or Terry, trustee, had about the middle of April, 1896, advanced to Diller, on account of the purchase of certain lands and property, about $448,872.09, in consideration of which Diller, on demand for additional security therefor, undertook to transfer and convey said $5,000 acres and 2,000 acres of plaintiff's lands; that these conveyances were made in fraud of the rights of the plaintiff, and accepted with notice of the fraudulent intent; that, if said lands were conveyed as security, Berwind had sold the same, together with other property of Diller's for a sum largely in advance of the indebtedness, to wit, $875,000, and, besides, Berwind had received large returns from the property as proceeds of coal and timber taken therefrom; and that Davis in the purchase of said lands and other property did not estimate said two tracts of land as having any value to him, in view of the claim of the plaintiff thereto, and did not pay anything therefor.

Berwind answered the amended bill, denying all allegations of fraud on his part, and on the part of his trustee, and knowledge of any fraudulent intent on the part of Diller. His answer avers that all the property sold to Davis was sold for a lump sum, and that the respondent is unable to say how much of the purchase money was treated or regarded as applicable to said two tracts of land. It further avers that the respondent in the latter part of December, 1894, upon representations made to him by Diller, which afterwards proved untrue, had invested a large sum of money in the mortgage bonds of the Roaring Creek & Charleston Railroad Company, and, in order to save the money so invested, was compelled to acquire further interests in the railroad property, and also large quantities of timber and coal lands in the section of country in which the road was located; that his purchases of all this property were made in the name of Terry, his trustee; that he was informed and believed full and fair consideration in money had been paid for all of said property, including the two lots in question; that some of the lands so purchased were lands which Diller claimed to own or control, and which he had, at the time, proposed to give respondent as security for a proposed loan and as a bonus for such loan; that none of said property was in fact taken as security, it having been ascertained that Diller did not own the same, but that, on the contrary, they were purchased from the owners thereof, or those who appeared by the records to be the owners thereof and were believed so to be; that he had allowed Diller, at his request, to attempt to find a market for the property, or make sale thereof, under an arrangement by which Diller would have profited, had such disposition been made, but not under any agreement or understanding which imposed upon the respondent any legal or moral obligation to make sale thereof; that neither respondent nor his trustee ever held said properties or any of them as security for advances to Diller; and that neither Diller nor his representative, nor any other person, has, or ever had, any rightful claim to any settlement of account in respect to the acquisition or disposition of said properties or any of them. The answer of Terry, trustee, to the bill and amended bill, is equally as broad, direct, and specific as to all allegations of fraud and notice thereof as that of Berwind, and makes substantially the same averments of fact, but goes more into the details thereof giving dates, particulars, and circumstances not stated in the answer of Berwind, but all subsidiary in character, and tending to the same legal effect as those stated more generally in the answer of Berwind. The answer of Henry G. Davis admits knowledge of the claim of the plaintiff, and sets up no rights or equities superior to those of Berwind and Terry, trustee. In substance and effect it is the same as those of Terry and Berwind. It denies fraud and notice thereof on their part, avers good title in them, and therefore in himself.

The evidence consists principally of the depositions of W. F. Diller, O. C. Womelsdorf, and Henry C. Terry, and a large number of documents, brought into the record as exhibits and otherwise, principally copies of records in other suits, both in this state and in Pennsylvania, relating to the transactions between Diller on the one side, and Terry and Berwind on the other. W. F. Diller was president and treasurer of the plaintiff company. He proves the sale of the two tracts of land to the Roaring Creek Coal & Coke Company in 1893, and the delivery to S. B. Diller of the bonds and cash, hereinbefore mentioned, for the repurchase thereof, and says his company never intended to part with the title to said lots permanently, and that a repurchase thereof was understood between the two companies from the date of the sale thereof. He says there was a verbal understanding and agreement from the date of the conveyance that this property was to be repurchased. He further says he made repeated demands upon his brother for the deed from the Roaring Creek Coal & Coke Company to the plaintiff company for said two tracts of land, and was assured by him that it had been made and sent to West Virginia for recordation, and later that he, said S. B. Diller, had the same in his safe in his office in the city of Philadelphia. He testifies further that, after the discovery of the forged deed for the 5,000 acres, his company examined the records as to the title to their other lands, and found that lots 16 and 17 had been conveyed first to the Middle Fork Company, and then to Terry, trustee, and denies that any authority or direction had ever been given to make such conveyances. He further says that in 1899 Terry informed him that he would probably be able to arrange for a sale of all the West Virginia properties to a Mr. Steck, of Pittsburgh, and suggested the advisability of a conveyance of lots 16 and 17 from him to the Cassiday Fork Company, and then a deed from that company to the purchaser, and said he could convey said lots with a recital that they had been misconveyed to him. Womelsdorf testified that in 1899 he, under instructions given to him by Diller, pursuant to a conversation had between Diller and Terry at the office of the latter in Philadelphia, went to Beverley, W. Va., and had a deed prepared for the conveyance, by Terry, of lots 16 and 17 to the Cassiday Fork Company. Just what the conversation between Diller and Terry was he did not know, since he had not heard all of it. This is evidently the occasion and conversation spoken of by W. F. Diller in his testimony.

It further appears from the testimony of Womelsdorf that he was the general manager of the Cassiday Fork Company in 1893, and for some time thereafter, charged with the duty of taking care of its lands and paying the taxes thereon, and that probably in the year 1893 S. B. Diller came there in company with one Slaymaker, of the firm of Witmer & Sons, and a man by the name of Savage, and executed, on behalf of the Middle Fork Company, a contract with Witmer & Sons for the cutting of timber on lots 16 and 17, which contract Womelsdorf witnessed, but, assuming that Diller, who had been prominent, conspicuous, and influential in respect to the affairs of the company, was doing nothing more than he had authority to do and was proper, he did not inform the Cassiday Fork Company of the transaction. He was not only general manager of said company, but a stockholder and director. Terry's deposition is very lengthy. Deeming a great many questions irrelevant and immaterial, he declined to answer them, sometimes of his own volition, and, at other times, by direction of his counsel. He admits that he was trustee for Berwind, and, as such, handled and disbursed for him in the purchase of various properties in West Virginia many thousands of dollars. How much was paid for each of the several properties he does not disclose, and he repeatedly refused to state the exact amount paid for the two tracts of land in question, but persisted in the statement that they were included among the purchases made, and had cost his principal a large amount of money.

He says lots 16 and 17 were conveyed to him by virtue of a written agreement between Berwind and S. B. Diller, which is not produced, and which he says cannot be found.

He supplements this with the following additional statement: "The original conveyance to me as trustee by the Middle Fork Company was an absolute one for a full consideration, so far as I can now state. There was no specific sum that I can fix in my mind which made up that consideration; but the deed, as I recall it, not having looked at it for some time, was an absolute one, and was a part of the transaction which involved the payment of a very large sum of money by Mr. Berwind through me, in excess, I believe, of what the value of these lots was." Being asked what the amount advanced was, he said: "I cannot recall the exact amount accurately, but it was approximately more than $400,000." The conveyance was made, it will be remembered, by the Middle Fork Company, and Mr. Terry says, in response to a question: "I do not think any consideration was paid to the Middle Fork Coal & Lumber Company, but full consideration was paid to Mr. Samuel B. Diller individually, to the best of my knowledge, although I cannot state in dollars and cents how much; but it was a part of the general advances made by me." He says further: "I do not not recall the payment of any specific sum; but I was making advances on behalf of Mr. Berwind to Mr. Diller almost continuously, and on the day that the deed was delivered, which day I do not recollect, I may or may not have paid Mr. Diller money. But I certainly paid to him at some time or other, in some way, moneys which covered the consideration for the conveyance of this property, but I cannot now recall what the value of the property in question was fixed at." Being asked as to the amount paid for the 5,000 acres and lots 16 and 17, he replied that he could not tell the specific amount paid for said lots or any other lots embraced in the question, and said he did not think a reference to any books or accounts kept by him would disclose such information. He says he thinks the deed for the 5,000-acre tract and for lots 16 and 17 were delivered to him at the same time. As to whether the advancements made and charged to Diller before the deed for lots 16 and 17 was delivered included moneys that had been paid in the acquirement of the stock of the Roaring Creek & Charleston Railroad Company, he declined to answer. He also declined to say whether the property which had cost him over $400,000 included $100,000 of the bonds of the Roaring Creek & Charleston Railroad Company, and also to say what property he had bought with said $400,000 other than the land in question; but he did say the amount charged against Diller was for moneys advanced to him in a general way, and was represented in property which Diller had secured to be conveyed to him as trustee, and that these properties included lots 16 and 17. He says all these advancements were made to Diller personally, and not to the corporations represented by him, and that he understood that Diller owned a majority of the stock of the Middle Fork Company, substantially all of it, as he believed at the time. The minute book of the Middle Fork Company was demanded of him, and he said he was unable to produce it. This important book was not produced by anybody, and its contents are not disclosed by any part of the record.

A matter deemed important by counsel for the appellant is a disclosure made by Terry of a transaction between him and Diller in April, 1896. On the 17th day of April, 1896, Diller made a written proposition to purchase numerous tracts of land, including the 5,000-acre tract and lots 16 and 17 and a vast amount of personal property, for the sum of $748,672, payable in 60 days from that date, for which sum he gave his collateral note, pledging for the payment thereof all of the property named in the instrument, and, in addition thereto, a large amount of other property. This note, dated April 18, 1896, recited the delivery of the property to Terry, trustee, as collateral, authorized sale thereof in case of default, and gave authority to said Terry, as attorney at law, or to any other attorney of any court of record in Pennsylvania, or any other state, to appear for the maker thereof and confess a judgment against him for the amount thereof, with attorney's fees and costs. Default having been made, Terry sold the property at auction in his own office in Philadelphia, and purchased the same for the sum of $100, which amount he credited on the note, and at the June term of court, 1896, took a judgment against Diller for the sum of $748,672.09, and had execution issued thereon, which was returned nulla bona. This transaction occurred about two years after the conveyance of lots 16 and 17 to the Middle Fork Company, the deed from the Roaring Creek Coal & Coke Company to it having been made March 30, 1894; but it may have been contemporaneous with the recordation in Randolph county of the deed from the Middle Fork Company to Terry, which, however, appears to have been executed in June, 1895. But if Diller was virtually the owner of the Middle Fork Company, and had been paid for this land in the manner in which Terry says he was paid, and could, as such virtual owner of the Middle Fork Company, convey the lands to Terry in compliance with his alleged agreement, or had authority from the board of directors to do so, the consideration, if any, had no doubt been paid prior to the date of the deed as well as to the recordation thereof. Mr. Terry says the transaction of April 17 and 18, 1896, was regarded by them as in the nature of an option, since the property belonged to him as trustee, and he had made a sort of an agreement of sale to Diller to enable the latter to make disposition of the property, if he could, and, he having failed to do so, the sale of the property by him, as collateral security for the note, only passed such interest as Diller had—an option to purchase—which was really of no value, and that the sale was nothing more than a mere formal extinction of that right. Terry still held the legal title, and the sale extinguished whatever contractual interest Diller had. Being further examined as to the properties mentioned in Diller's memorandum of purchase, he says he had paid for all of them prior to that time, and there was no property mentioned in that proposition which he had not theretofore purchased and paid for with moneys of Berwind. On cross-examination he testified that prior to the time he received the deed for lots 16 and 17 he had paid for them, and that he was not treating money paid for other properties as having been paid for these lots, and says he had overpaid Diller at the time of the delivery of the deed, and that he had not at the time of the conveyance of said lots to him any notice or knowledge of any authority vested in Diller by the Cassiday Fork Company to repurchase or secure a reconveyance to it of said lots. Admitting the possession of the railroad bonds delivered by the Cassiday Fork Company to Diller for the repurchase of lots 16 and 17, he says he had no notice or knowledge of the terms or conditions on which Diller had acquired possession of said bonds, and that he had no knowledge, at or before the time of the conveyance of said lots, of any fraud on the part of Diller in procuring the land to be conveyed to the Middle Fork Company. He denied, also, that at the time he received the conveyance of lots 16 and 17, or prior thereto, he had any notice or knowledge of the forgery by Diller of the deed conveying the 5,000-acre tract. He further denies that at the time of said conveyance he had any notice or knowledge, directly or indirectly, of the claim of the Cassiday Fork Company to said lots or any part thereof.

According to the testimony of William F. Diller, the Roaring Creek Coal & Coke Company took title to the two tracts of land and held the same temporarily for a special purpose, on the accomplishment of which it was to be reconveyed, on repayment of the purchase money. He says that, in order to aid the building of the Roaring Creek & Charleston Railroad, the land was conveyed to the Roaring Creek Coal & Coke Company, with the understanding that it should be reconveyed as soon as the Roaring Creek Coal & Coke Company should obtain some other coal lands, and that this was verbally agreed upon from the time the original conveyance was made in August, 1893.

Whether this is sufficient evidence to justify the view that the Middle Fork Company held the equitable title as vendee under an executory contract of sale might be questionable, since the deed of conveyance was absolute, and there was to be no reconveyance, according to this testimony, until the Roaring Creek Coal & Coke Company should have obtained some other coal lands. It might be regarded as having been a conditional sale which placed both legal and equitable title in the grantee, subject to be defeated by a subsequent contingency. However, conceding, for the purposes of this inquiry, that the plaintiff held the equitable title, it cannot have relief, unless it appears that Terry acted in bad faith, or had notice of the fraud of Diller, or of the equitable title of the plaintiff company, or did not pay full and fair consideration for the property. A more accurate statement would be that, in view of the equitable title in the plaintiff company, the burden is upon Terry to prove that he purchased in good faith, paid full and fair consideration, and had no notice of the equitable title of the plaintiff company. However, as regards notice, the rule seems to require no more than a denial, and then the plaintiff must overcome it by proof; but a purchase in good faith and payment of an adequate price are affirmative matters which the defendant must aver and prove.

[1] The conveyance of the land by the Middle Fork Company, a corporation, to Terry, for a consideration passing to Diller, the president of that corporation, who executed the deed on behalf thereof, is relied upon as a circumstance proving notice of a misappropriation of the property of the Middle Fork Company by its agent, and also as proof of bad faith on the part of Terry. It is urged that this circumstance brought home to Terry notice of the equitable claim of the Cassiday Fork Company to the land in question. This seems to be an attempt to carry that fact beyond what it naturally and fairly imports. If it can be said to prove a misappropriation on the part of Diller, abuse of his power as president, or a turning over of the property of that company in satisfaction of his own personal debt, we do not see how it can go further and fix upon Terry notice of transactions, contractual relations, or equities subsisting between the Middle Fork Company and a third party, the Roaring Creek Coal & Coke Company. The acquisition of the plaintiff's equitable claim had no apparent connection with the conveyance to Terry. They were separate and distinct acts, not only in nature, but in time, place, circumstances, and parties. Nor does it necessarily, logically, or probably result differently when we add the circumstance that Terry or Berwind obtained from Diller the railroad bonds placed in his hands for delivery to the Roaring Creek Coal & Coke Company to obtain a re-conveyance of the land; for there is nothing in the record that indicates any knowledge or information on the part of either Berwind or Terry as to how those bonds came into the possession of Diller. For all that appears here, they may have been taken from him in absolute ignorance of the means by which, the source from which, or the purpose for which, he had obtained them. The authorities invoked for the proposition that property taken by deed from a corporation upon a consideration moving to the president thereof in his individual capacity is to be treated and regarded in equity as having been misappropriated by the officer, and fraudulently acquired by the grantee, are not applicable here. The corporation is not asking any relief against the act of its president. The plaintiff is a third party, attempting to rely upon this fact as proving notice, not only of misappropriation of the corporate property, but of the additional, remote, and disconnected fact that it, the plaintiff, was equitably entitled to the property, by virtue of an oral agreement, knowledge of which, on the part of the grantee, is not shown in any way.

[2] The acceptance by Terry of a forged deed at the time he accepted the deed in question is relied upon and urged as a circumstance proving his participation in a fraudulent contemporaneous transaction, and therefore as evidence of his fraudulent intent and bad faith in the acceptance of the deed here involved. The adjudication of the fact of forgery of a deed contemporaneously accepted does not imply or argue any knowledge of the forgery on the part of Terry. It is not pretended that he forged the deed, and the cancellation thereof as having been forged by Diller destroyed his title independently of any knowledge or motive on his part in accepting the same. It being a forged deed, he acquired no title under it, and could have acquired none, although he accepted it in good faith, without any notice of the forgery, and paid full and adequate consideration for the property. Had it been set aside as having been fraudulently obtained, the adjudication would necessarily have implied guilty participation in the fraud by the grantee. There is no evidence here tending to prove knowledge on Terry's part of the forgery at the time he accepted the deed.

The fault found with the evidence offered by the defendant Terry to prove payment of the value of the land is his failure to show the value at which the land was taken by him, or, in other words, the price agreed upon between him and Diller at which it was credited on the large advancements made to the latter. That Terry, for and on account of Berwind, made large advancements to Diller, amounting to more than $400,000, does not seem to be questioned, and the circumstances and transactions disclosed by the record leave no doubt of the fact. The witness swears that these advancements were not only equal to, but greatly in excess of, all the property conveyed to him by Diller and others in consideration thereof. He further states his inability to say just what part of the money so advanced was apportioned or applied to the purchase of these two tracts of land, and says none of the books, papers, or memoranda kept by him will disclose such fact. His statement amounts to this: That Diller was in debt to him for these advancements largely in excess of all the property he had conveyed to him, including these two tracts and the 5,000-acre tract, which indebtedness was acknowledged and admitted by Diller at the time, and the conveyances made without any such apportionment. It is not difficult to conceive a situation of that kind. Instances of the kind often occur in the course of large business transactions, resulting disastrously to the parties. It appears that Diller's operations in Randolph county were far beyond his financial means and ability, and resulted in his insolvency. It is true that Berwind did not meet a like fate; but he appears to have been a wealthy man, able to bear misfortune and adversities by making additional investments, and combining properties advantageously so as to put them upon the market in an attractive form and retrieve his losses. Terry's failure to specify or fix the value put upon these two tracts of land does not amount to an obstinate refusal to answer in that respect. It is accompanied by his statement of inability to do so by way of explanation and excuse; and, for all that we can see his statement is true, and the truth thereof is made highly probable by the circumstances revealed by the record. An attempt is made to cast doubt upon the truth of his statement, as well as upon his good faith, by the taking of the judgment note of April 18, 1896, the sale of the properties pledged for the payment thereof, after default had been made in respect thereto, and the judgment obtained for the amount due thereon. These transactions were, according to the testimony of the witnesses, long subsequent to the execution of the deed here involved and appear to have been independent thereof. The proposal of purchase made by Diller to Terry treated these lands as then held by Terry. Just why Diller should have obligated himself in the manner in which he did for about $300,000 it may be difficult to conceive. On the showing here made, he evidently expected to sell the properties for more than $750,000. He took them at a valuation of about $748,000 from Terry. Apparently this would have given Terry a profit of something like $300,000, and, to have obtained any additional profit, it would have been necessary for Diller to have sold for more than that amount. At this time he was insolvent. Being so, he could afford to be liberal in his undertakings and desperate in his adventures, having all to gain and nothing to lose. What prospects he had for effecting such a sale and meeting his obligations within 60 days is not disclosed by the evidence. Loose and improvident as this arrangement appears to have been, it did not relate directly to these two tracts of land; and nothing in its terms or the proceedings relating thereto tends to show that Terry at that time had any knowledge of the equitable claim of the Cassiday Fork Company or specific intention to defeat the same. He and Berwind had had extensive dealings with Diller out of which many controversies might have arisen, and this arrangement seems to have been made largely with a view to a final settlement between them and an extinction of any claims that Diller might otherwise thereafter have set up against them. At the same time Diller executed an instrument under seal, releasing Berwind, his heirs, executors, and administrators from all manner of actions and causes of action, suits, debts, dues, accounts, bonds, covenants, contracts, agreements, judgments, claims and demands whatsoever, in law or equity, which he then had against said Berwind, or ever had had, or which his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns or any of them might have, for or by reason of any cause, matter or thing whatsoever. No doubt Diller at this time had numerous creditors who, it was supposed by Berwind, might attempt to set up claims against him on the theory of indebtedness to Diller, and the apparent object of all these transactions was to forestall and provide against the assertion of any such claim; and, in the absence of evidence tending to show a secret agreement or arrangement to cover up assets of Diller in the hands of Berwind, to the detriment or prejudice of the creditors of the former, the taking of this release and the judgment note and the judgment on the note could be regarded as nothing more than mere precautionary transactions, unobjectionable in any view, except that of creditors, on an attempt by Terry to set up to their prejudice, the large judgment, founded on the note of April 18, 1896. The plaintiff here has not that status. It comes claiming certain specific property as the equitable owner thereof, not as a creditor, demanding participation in the distribution of the assets of an insolvent estate.

Much argument to sustain the bill is predicated upon the repeated declinations of Terry to answer questions propounded to him. His obstinacy or failure to disclose matters within his knowledge or power does not prove the plaintiff's case, or relieve it from the duty to sustain the burden of proof, put upon it by direct and positive denial of the allegations of fraud.

[10] It is only when a prima facie case is made by one party, and doubt is cast upon it by the rebuttal evidence of the opposite party, or otherwise, that suppression or withholding of evidence raises an inference against the party failing to produce evidence which it is in his power to produce, and determines the point in favor of the other party. Stout v. Sands, 56 W. Va. 663, 49 S. E. 428.

[5] If we could assume that under the statutes authorizing the taking of the testimony of opposite parties, and the taking of depositions out of the state, the courts of this state have the powers and remedies for compelling specific and full answers to questions conferred by statutes, providing for the propounding of interrogatories, the plaintiff has neglected to invoke the exercise of such powers and the application of such remedies. Instead of making application to the court below, as it may have had the right to do, for rulings upon the refusal of the defendant to answer questions, and direction from the court as to whether he was bound to answer them, or whether he had sufficiently answered so as to give him an opportunity to make further answers in case the court ruled against him, the plaintiff submitted its case on the evidence as it appears here. There was not a total failure to answer, and the answers, in some form and to some extent, covered all the questions propounded. In such a state of the case neither a judgment of nonsuit against a plaintiff nor of default against a defendant can be rendered in those jurisdictions in which statutory powers to do so in proper cases are conferred upon the courts. A party who has answered is entitled to a ruling upon the sufficiency of the answers made, and the propriety of the questions propounded, before such judgment can be rendered against him. By submitting its case, without requiring further answers, the plaintiff waived its right to a decree pro confesso, if any it had, and is bound by the evidence as it stands. Fels v. Raymond, 139 Mass. 100, 28 N. E. 691; Harding v. Morrill, 136 Mass. 291; Wetherbee v. Winchester, 128 Mass. 293; Townsend v. Gibbs, 11 Cush. (Mass.) 159; Amherst, etc., Ry. Co. v. Watson, 8 Gray (Mass.) 529; Cooper v. Central Railroad, 44 Iowa, 134; Hogaboom v. Price, 53 Iowa, 703, 6 N. W. 43; Garvin v. Cannon, 53 Iowa, 716, 6 N. W. 122; McNamara v. Ellis, 14 Ind. 516; Cleveland v. Hughes, 12 Ind. 512.

[6] The issue here is whether Terry is a purchaser for value and without notice. Thus far, we have treated him and Diller as strangers, dealing at arm's length, and, if that was the relation subsisting between them, we have no doubt of the correctness of the conclusions stated. But, if the circumstances, taken as a whole, establish a relationship of principal and agent between them, Terry cannot be regarded as a bona fide purchaser, even though he had no actual knowledge of the fraud of his agent.

[7] That a principal cannot retain the benefit of the fraudulent or unauthorized act of his agent is a proposition universally recognized and acted upon by the courts. In seeking to hold the property he adopts the fraudulent act, and thus destroys his own title in one aspect of the case, and ratifies it and binds himself in the other, according to the nature of the demand made upon him by the injured party. This is undoubtedly the rule applicable between the immediate parties to the contract. Is the principle operative in the case of a purchase through an agent, in violation of the equitable rights of a stranger, with notice to the agent? The authorities uniformly answer this in the affirmative. Le Neve v. Le Neve, Amb. 436; 2 White & Tud. L. Cas. Eq. (4th Am. Ed.) t. p. 109, m. p. 35; Clark v. Fuller, 39 Conn. 238; White v. King, 53 Ala. 182. On this principle notice to a trustee is notice to his cestui que trust. Insurance Co. v. Railroad Co., 32 W. Va. 244, 9 S. E. 180; Mining Co. v. Coal Co., 8 W. Va. 406; Beverley v. Brooke, 2 Leigh (Va.) 425; French v. Loyal Co., 5 Leigh (Va.) 627; Wickham v. Lewis, 13 Grat. (Va.) 427; Chapman v. Chapman, 91 Va. 397, 21 S. E. 813, 50 Am. St. Rep. 846. In these Virginia and West Virginia cases, the trustee is regarded as a purchaser, and not as a mere agent, but the other cases cited involved nothing more than simple agency. The case falls clearly within the general principles of notice. Wade on Notice, § 672, says the rule may be tersely expressed thus: "Notice to an agent is notice to the principal." This author further says it is either actual notice or the equivalent thereof. The rule is subject to some limitations, but none, so far as we have observed, that forbids its application in the class of cases under discussion.

The defense of a bona fide purchase for value is affirmative in character, though ordinarily the burden of proof as to notice is on the plaintiff. The rules and principles of equity, not only make it affirmative in the ordinary sense of the term, but impose an additional burden. They require the purchaser not only to prove his purchase, but also that in equity and good conscience he ought to be permitted to retain the property. The existence of an equity in violation of which he obtained the property constitutes ground of appeal to his conscience, demanding a full disclosure of all material facts and circumstances. He must deny notice, even though it is not alleged and both plead and prove payment of an adequate consideration. Lohr v. George, 65 W. Va. 241, 64 S. E. 609.

Enough has been said of defendant's testimony to show uncertainty and indefiniteness as to the character of his transactions in general. He repeatedly says he advanced to Diller large sums of money and took these lands an account of the advancements. He stubbornly refuses to give any price agreed upon between him and Diller for them, protesting his inability to do so, since they were taken in part satisfaction of large sums of money advanced. It is hardly probable that the lands and other properties, such as the bonds intrusted to Diller, to be exchanged for the lands in question, were paid for in advance. Circumstances disclosed by the record make it equally improbable that these large sums of money were loaned to Diller. Then upon what basis were they advanced? They could have been advanced to him as agent, if at all.

[4] It appears from the separate answers of Terry and Berwind that about December, 1894, Diller, having been associated with his brothers and other parties in the promotion of various land deals and mining and railroad enterprises in Randolph county, applied to Berwind for financial assistance in the form of purchases of bonds of corporations he was interested in and loans on the faith of some of these properties. Relying upon Diller's representations, Berwind purchased a large amount of the bonds of the Roaring Creek & Charleston Railroad Company. Berwind says in an answer in another suit made a part of this record that a written agreement was entered into between him and Diller on the faith of the representations of the latter, by which he agreed to render such aid, and was to have, in addition to ample security, a certain interest in some of the property as a bonus or reward. He subsequently ascertained Diller's inability to carry out this agreement and the insufficiency of the properties as security, wherefore it became necessary for him to make large investments, on a different basis, in order to save what he had invested in the railroad bonds. Accordingly the agreement was abandoned, and he proceeded to make purchases and investments in Randolph county through Terry and other agents. The answer in this cause does not set this out so much in detail, but pursues the same general course of defense. Terry says in his testimony he made his large advancements in pursuance of that agreement and on the faith thereof, and not under any agreement of his own with Diller, although he protests that he paid the latter full consideration for the land. This does not accord with Berwind's admission, just stated. Indeed, Mr. Terry's answer to the amended bill substantially agrees with the defense of Berwind. He says: "It is true that this respondent, Henry C. Terry, trustee, and said Samuel B. Diller, were on intimate business relations with reference to properties in said Randolph county. This was natural and almost necessary, because, upon what turned out to be untrue representations by said Diller, Edward J. Berwind, acting though this respondent, had been in or about December, 1894, induced to invest a large sum of money in the acquisition of mortgage bonds of the Roaring Creek & Charleston Railroad Company, and in order to make this investment of any avail, and, indeed, in order to save the money invested, it became necessary for said Berwind to acquire further interest in said railroad and also tracts of coal land in the vicinity of said railroad, and, through this respondent as trustee, said Berwind did proceed in the early part of the year 1895 to acquire this interest and these tracts of land, in every instance paying full and fair consideration therefor in money to the owners or those who were believed to be the owners or those who represented or acted for the owners thereof. Among these tracts so acquired and so paid for were said lots Nos. 16 and 17. Some of these lands, so acquired by the respondent as trustee for said Berwind, were lands which said Diller had prior to the investment by said Berwind in said railroad bonds represented to said Berwind as owned or controlled by him, Diller, and which said Diller had at that time proposed to give said Berwind as collateral for a proposed loan; but none of them was obtained by said Berwind, or by this respondent as trustee, as collateral or security for any loan, as it was early discovered that none of said lands was owned by said Diller and only some of them by companies in which he was interested and which he managed and claimed to control, and none of them was acquired by said Berwind or by this respondent as trustee, except upon full and fair consideration paid to the owners thereof, or to those who appeared by the records to be the owners thereof, and were believed by this respondent to be the owners thereof, or to those duly authorized to act for such owners. And neither said Berwind nor this respondent had any knowledge or information prior to the acquisition of these several properties and especially prior to the acquisition of lots Nos. 16 and 17 by this respondent of any defect in title, or anything whatever, that would in any way impeach, or tend to impeach, or cast any suspicion on, the respective conveyances by which title became vested in this respondent."

Diller was not the sole owner of the properties he represented in his application to Berwind. A great deal of it was held by corporations in which Diller was a stockholder, and in some of which he was an officer. These concerns were financially embarrassed when both Berwind and Terry first met him. He applied to Berwind for funds, representing the properties as then jeopardized by indebtedness. The whole record discloses, too, that Diller was not a man of any considerable means or wealth, and he came out of these transactions apparently, if not actually, insolvent. He and his associates were loaded down with wild, unproductive lands, the market value of which depended largely upon undertakings they were wholly unable to carry out. Under a greater burden than they could carry, they had come to Berwind for aid, and he had found them in much worse condition than had been represented to him. Acting as a representative of Mr. Berwind in the effort to make good his investments in Randolph county, Mr. Terry must have been equally well informed as to Diller's financial condition. If it be true that $400,000 was put into the hands of Diller by Terry, it is almost inconceivable that he received it as a borrower or as a vendor of property. That he did not own all the properties acquired with that money, and Terry's knowledge of this, are fairly inferable from the facts disclosed by the record. The latter knew a great deal of it stood in the names of corporations and individuals other than Diller, and yet Diller seems to have had something to do with the acquisition of nearly or quite all of it. The answer substantially admits this, and Terry's testimony, broadly considered, conforms to the answer. He distinctly says the amount advanced to Diller was "approximately more than $400,000." This seems to have been regarded and treated as the original cost of the properties embraced in the contract of sale or option of April 17, 1896, being apparently all that had been acquired in that part of West Virginia by Mr. Terry. Many of these were admittedly purchased from persons other than Diller, and yet, according to this testimony, the money went through his hands. In other words, Terry put this vast sum of money in the hands of Diller with which to purchase the property of other people, and take conveyances thereof, not to himself or in his own name, but in the name of Terry. Thus, through Diller, Terry was giving money in exchange for real and personal property. This clearly imports agency and the circumstances suggest agency as the safest, most expedient, and efficacious arrangement. Diller knew all the properties and their owners. Terry's knowledge thereof was limited. As agent his relation was confidential. All advancements became immediately due, and the principal had the protection of the criminal laws against misappropriation. As vendor or debtor, he would have had vastly greater liberty and discretion and Berwind less protection and more limited remedies. Mr. Terry is significantly silent on the subject of the exact relationship between himself and Diller. No definition thereof can be found in either his answer or his testimony. He lays stress upon payment and lack of personal knowledge of fraud. If Diller was his agent, he can truthfully do both and still not make out a good defense. Notice of the plaintiff's equity on the part of his agent was notice to him, and the fraud of his agent avoids the contract as completely as if it had been his personal act. We think it was his clear duty to negative the inference of agency, arising from all the facts disclosed, and, as he has not specifically contradicted it, the plaintiff must be accorded the benefit thereof.

[8] Diller's agency of some of the corporations from which the property was acquired does not preclude the relation of principal and agent between him and Terry. Such double agencies afford opportunities for fraud, but no rule of law forbids them. It is obviously possible for the agent to represent both principals fairly and honestly. Clark & Skyles, Agency, § 414. Mr. Terry, fully advised of Diller's agency for the owners of the property, and employing him as agent to purchase it, cannot be heard to say the existing relation of Diller to the owners rendered it impossible for him to accept an inconsistent agency. Terry could assent to agency for both parties. The dual capacity only imposed further duties upon the agent and required of him greater care and circumspection. The assent of the former employers to the subsequent inconsistent employment was not essential thereto. With knowledge of the existing relation, Terry could bind himself.

[9] Though the bill proceeding upon the theory of personal notice of fraud and a trust estate of Diller in the hands of Terry ignores agency as ground of relief or means of notice, we do not think this precludes adoption of that theory. The bill distinctly charges a purchase with notice, and we are aware of no rule requiring specification of the mode or manner of acquisition thereof. Besides, a prior equitable title in the plaintiff having been shown, establishment of a better right by purchase for value and without notice became an affirmative defense, requiring denial of notice and proof of payment of an adequate price. Occupying such a position, the defendant was bound to repel every inference of knowledge of the prior equity, whether actual in the sense of personal or of different character and tantamount to personal knowledge. He has the affirmative of the issue, and is partially excused from the burden of proof under a mere rule of convenience, relieving from duty to prove a negative. The operation of that rule ceases with the reason therefor. When facts are disclosed, raising a clear inference of knowledge or a relation from which it results as matter of law, that rule does not excuse silence. To require the defendant to repel it imposes no hardship upon him, and places him at no disadvantage.

[7] We deem the evidence of agency sufficient in kind as well as quantity. An admission of proof of an express contract of agency is not essential. The authorities uniformly say the relation may be inferred from facts and circumstances. Slers v. Wiseman, 58 W. Va. 340, 52 S. E. 460; Clark & Skyles, Agency, § 64, citing a very long list of cases fully sustaining the text.

Pending this suit Henry G. Davis, having admitted notice of the plaintiff's claim, purchased this property with other holdings of Berwind. Hence his rights are wholly dependent upon those of Terry. In purchasing the lots involved here he took the risk of title in the latter. As Terry paid off a prior lien on the property and claims to have paid some of the taxes thereon, he or Berwind or Davis is entitled to have such sums repaid as a condition to relief. The Roaring Creek Coal & Coke Company, holding the title to the timber on the land, made no defense. The process upon the original bill was served on it, but it was proceeded against on the amended bill by order of publication; no representative of it being found in the state upon whom service could be had. It has not appeared nor made any defense. As to it, the allegations of the original bill are very brief and perhaps defective. The amended bill takes no notice of it. In this imperfect state of the record we do not feel warranted in pronouncing a decree on that branch of the case.

Before entering upon the inquiry as to fraud, we suggested possible lack of equitable title to the land in the plaintiff. Having concluded that Terry was a purchaser with notice of the facts relating to the title, it becomes necessary now to say whether, by virtue of those facts, the plaintiff had such title. We think it had. The evidence of a contract for reconveyance already adverted to is uncontradicted. William F. Diller testifies positively to a verbal agreement for reconveyance at the date of the conveyance to the Roaring Creek Company. Since that company, pursuant to the agreement, did actually convey the land to the Middle Fork Company, and makes no denial of the agreement or its deed, neither the statute of frauds nor the rule inhibiting parol evidence to contradict written agreements is involved. Though the conveyance was not made to the plaintiff, the circumstances strongly indicate that it was made in consideration of the bonds and money delivered to Diller with which to procure the reconveyance. Diller was virtually the Middle Fork Company. Neither he nor it had any money. Terry made no purchase from the Roaring Creek Company. Diller manipulated the title out of that company into the Middle Fork Company and then into the hands of Terry, and, though subsequently, yet near the same time, got the bonds and money from the Cassiday Company ostensibly to repurchase these lands for it, and represented that he had done so. Thus the Middle Fork Company obtained the title, with knowledge of the Cassiday Company's right, for Diller was its president and virtual owner, and so did Terry by making Diller his agent in the procurement of the title.

Our conclusion is to reverse the decree complained of, enter a decree, requiring Edward J. Berwind, Henry C. Terry, trustee, and Henry G. Davis to convey said two tracts of land to the appellant on payment to them, or such of them as may be entitled thereto, the money expended by said Terry, trustee, in discharging liens to which said property was subject at the date of his acquisition thereof, and remand the cause for ascertainment of the sum so expended and the person or persons to whom due, and for further proceedings necessary to the execution of such decree, as well as for such further proper proceedings, respecting the timber on said land, as may be desired, including amendment of the bills or either of them. Costs in this court as well as in the court below will be decreed to the appellant.

MILLER, J. (concurring). I concur in reversing the decree below based on the relationship of principal and agent between Terry and Diller. But I do not agree that it is necessary to establish that relationship to justify reversal. In my view of the evidence it fully establishes the fraud and collusion between Terry and Diller, as charged in the bill, and that the decree below denying plaintiff relief on that ground is erroneous. I do not intend, however, to detail the evidence, or discuss the familiar legal principles, applicable in such case. I only wish to record the fact that my concurrence in the decision is not based alone on the theory of principal and agent.

ROBINSON, J., dissents.

BRANNON, J. (dissenting). This case involves the question whether Terry, when he acquired title, had notice of the equitable title of the Cassiday Fork Boom & Lumber Company. This is purely a question of fact, dependent on oral evidence and circumstances. As to the question whether Terry had actual notice fixing upon him sedate, intentional fraud, the case is one resting solely on oral evidence to fix fraud. I can safely say there is no evidence of such notice except circumstances; and I have never met with a case in which an old established rule more fitly applies. That rule is that where a decree rests on oral, circumstantial evidence, about which different minds might differ, the decree is presumed to be right, and will not be reversed. Our labored discussion for hours in conference over this case, and the nearly equal division of the court, is evidence that the case is one falling under this rule. In fact, as to this question of actual notice, a majority of the court fails to find such notice, as the opinion by Judge POFFENBARGER does not rest the decision on such actual notice, but places it on the theory of constructive notice—that is, that Diller was Terry's agent—and, as Diller knew of the right of the Cassiday Fork Boom & Lumber Company, so had Terry notice, not that he had actual notice, but on the legal principle that notice to the agent is notice to the principal. I cannot concur in this. Why? Because the bills do not allege any relation of principal and agent. No such basis for relief is hinted in them. From the relation of principal and agent the opinion deduces the legal proposition that notice to agent is notice to principal; but my understanding is that, when you would deduce a legal proposition from facts, those facts must be stated. You cannot make a rule of law flow from facts not pleaded. Moreover, the fact of agency rests on doubtful circumstances, and is not established by that quantum of evidence justifying reversal under the rule just stated of the presumption of correctness of the decree unless clearly wrong.

HELLIEL v. PINEY COAL & COKE CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 23, 1911. Rehearing Denied
Jan. 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 190*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE OF FOREMAN.

The duty to see that refuge holes along motor roads in coal mines are kept, as required by section 10 of chapter 78, Acts of 1907 (Code Supp. 1909, c. 15h), rests on the mine foreman, not on the mine owner, and for injury to a miner resulting from their absence the mine owner is not liable.

Error to Circuit Court, Raleigh County.

Action by George Helliel against the Piney Coal & Coke Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed, and new trial granted.

Watts, Davis & Davis, for plaintiff in error. T. N. Read and A. A. Lilly, for defendant in error.

BRANNON, J. George Helliel was a coal miner in the employ of Piney Coal & Coke Company, digging in its mine. While going home, walking through the main entry, he was caught by some coal cars, which had broken loose from the motor to which they were attached and ran back downgrade, and caught him and injured him by reason of the space between the cars and the rib or wall of the mine being too narrow. He sued the company and recovered judgment, and the company sued out a writ of error.

The evidence presents only two matters charged as constituting negligence—one the want of lights on the rear car of the train, the other the want of refuge holes in the mine along the entry. This case depends on the construction to be given sections 10 and 15 of chapter 78, Acts of 1907, Regular Session, Supplement Code of 1909, serial sections 408 and 410. As to the want of lights on the car we may at once dismiss it from consideration, because, as the attorney for the plaintiff concedes, the duty to see that lights are kept on such cars is one resting on the mine foreman, not on the mine owner. The real question of this case is whether the failure to make refuge holes is a failure of duty on the part of the coal company, or a failure of duty on the part of the mine foreman, for which the coal operator is not liable. Said section 10 provides that "all alopes, engine-planes or motor roads used by persons in any mines shall be made of sufficient width to permit persons to pass moving cars with safety, or refuge holes of ample dimensions, and not more than sixty feet apart, shall be made on one side of said slope, engine-plane or motor road." That section does not expressly say whose duty it shall be to see that such refuge holes are made, and it is claimed that such duty rests on the mine owner. We must read this section, using the language quoted along with a provision found in section 15 reading as follows: "On all haulways space not less than ten feet long and two feet and six inches wide, between the wagon and the rib, shall be kept open at distances not exceeding one hundred feet apart, in which shelter from passing wagons may be had." Section 15 is that which requires the coal operator to appoint mine foreman and prescribe his duties, and those duties prescribed in that section rest upon the mine foreman, and a failure to perform them does not render the operator liable, as held in Bralley v. Coal & Coke Company, 66 W. Va. 278, 66 S. E. 684, and cases there cited. Under principles of those cases it is clear that the duty of seeing that spaces 10 feet long and 2 feet and 6 inches wide are kept between the rib or wall of the haulway and coal cars is a duty of the mine foreman. The duties in that section 15 are those imposed on the mine foreman. I repeat that the duty of making those spaces mentioned in the quotation above given from section 15 is one imposed on the mine foreman.

Are the spaces so required by section 15 the same thing as the refuge holes mentioned in section 10? We conclude that they are. Is it intended that there shall be both such spaces and such refuge holes? We think not. They are both designed for safety of the miner. Both sections in this respect aim at the same thing and are designed to accomplish the same purpose. Section 15 is one containing many provisions designed to promote safety of the miners. Its special purpose is that one. Its opening clause says that the requirement of the mine foreman is "in order to better secure the proper ventilation of every coal mine and promote the health and safety of persons employed therein." And in that section we find many duties committed to the mine foreman to secure safety to the miner, and among them this duty of having spaces between the cars and walls of the haulway to save persons employed in the mine from injury from the cars, and it is reasonable to include these refuge holes among the many things required by section 15 to secure such safety. It is reasonable to classify such refuge holes among the things provided in section 15 for such safety. That section has for its special purpose the requirement of things conducive to safety of miners. Suppose we say that the refuge holes and the spaces are different things. Then, I would ask, where is the sense of imposing on the mine owner to see that such refuge holes are kept and on the mine foreman to see that such spaces are left? Both the refuge holes and the spaces are intended to accomplish the same end, safety of miners. We held in the Bralley Case that the obligation to see to break-throughs is placed by section 15 upon the mine foreman, and principles there stated would assimilate duty as to refuge holes to break-throughs. I note that section 15 requires the mine foreman to remove loose coal, slate, and rock overhead in working places and along the haulways, and it is reasonable to say that the duty of having refuge holes along those same haulways from which the mine foreman must remove slate rests on him also. The presence of such holes and the removal of slate are both for the purpose of rendering the same haulway safe. The letter of the statute does not impose the duty of having the refuge holes on the coal operator; but section 15 does commit the duty of having spaces to prevent injury from cars to the mine foreman. We think that the refuge holes mentioned in section 10 and the spaces mentioned in section 15 are the same things. We think that the duty to see that there are such refuge holes rests on the mine foreman, and under principles in the Bralley Case and prior cases there cited no action lies against the coal operator for the want of such refuge holes.

We reverse the judgment, set aside the verdict, grant a new trial, and remand the case to the circuit court.

WOODFORD et al. v. BALTIMORE & O. R. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 19, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 213*) — CARRIAGE OF LIVE STOCK—TIME FOR DELIVERY TO CONSIGNEES.

In the absence of special agreement by a railroad company to deliver cattle at the place of destination in a specified time, there is an implied obligation to deliver them within a reasonable time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 920-922; Dec. Dig. § 213.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 230*) — CARRIAGE OF LIVE STOCK—TIME FOR DELIVERY—QUESTION FOR JURY.

What is a reasonable time for transportation is a question for the jury, depending upon the facts and circumstances of each particular case, and upon the nature of the freight to be carried.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 962; Dec. Dig. § 230.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 228*) — CARRIAGE OF LIVE STOCK—ACTIONS AGAINST CARRIER—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Proof of failure to deliver cattle at place of destination within the usual or schedule time establishes a prima facie case of negligence, and makes it incumbent upon the railroad company to justify the delay.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 958; Dec. Dig. § 228.*]

4. CARRIERS (§ 213*) — CARRIAGE OF LIVE STOCK—TIME FOR DELIVERY—LIABILITY FOR DELAY.

Without special agreement to deliver in a specified time, a common carrier is not liable for delay in the delivery of freight, due entirely to unavoidable accident.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 920-922; Dec. Dig. § 213.*]

5. CARRIERS (§ 218*) — CARRIAGE OF LIVE STOCK—LIMITATION OF LIABILITY—VALIDITY.

A common carrier cannot lawfully contract against its common-law liability for negligence of its employees.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 935; Dec. Dig. § 218.*]

6. CARRIERS (§ 229*) — CARRIAGE OF LIVE STOCK—DELAY IN DELIVERY—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

The difference in the market value of cattle at the time when they were actually delivered and at the time when they should have been delivered is an element of damages, in an action against the carrier for unreasonable delay in making delivery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 963, 964; Dec. Dig. § 229.*]

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 525*) — RECORD—INSTRUCTIONS.

Instructions appearing in the printed record, but not made parts of the record by any bill of exceptions, and there being no showing whether they were given or refused, will not be considered by the appellate court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2376-2379; Dec. Dig. § 525.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Barbour County.

Action by John F. Woodford and another, partners, against the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed and new trial granted.

Blue & Dayton, for plaintiff in error.
Wm. T. George and John B. Dilworth, for defendants in error.

WILLIAMS, P. John F. Woodford and J. C. Watson recovered a judgment against the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company for the sum of $138.18, damages for the alleged failure to deliver two car loads of cattle, within reasonable time, which were shipped from the town of Philippi, in West Virginia, to Philadelphia, and the defendant has brought the case here on writ of error.

The cattle were loaded on defendant's cars at Philippi about noon, Thursday, September 3, 1908, and did not arrive in Philadelphia until about 6 o'clock p. m. on the following

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Saturday, too late for that day's market. Plaintiffs had shipped cattle over the defendant's road from Philippi to Philadelphia for about 15 years, and they testify that 36 hours is the usual time for transportation. On this occasion, however, the north-bound train, which usually passed Philippi about 1 or 2 o'clock p. m. daily, and which was the train that should have picked up the cattle cars and carried them as far as Grafton, W. Va., had an accident before reaching Philippi, which delayed it 4 or 5 hours, and it failed to make connection with the east-bound fast freight, known as "No. 98," scheduled to pass Grafton about 7:30 p. m. No. 98 left Grafton that day at 8:15 p. m. The cattle were then held over in Grafton to wait the arrival of another freight train from the west, designated as "No. 82," which carried fast freight as far as Grafton, for points farther east. But on the arrival of No. 82, it was ascertained that it had no freight to be carried any farther east, and a train was then made up, which included the two cars of cattle. That train left Grafton for Cumberland, Md., at 4:45 the next morning. Cumberland is about 102 miles east of Grafton, and the train arrived there at 1:45 p. m. of the same day. The cattle were then unloaded, fed, and watered, and reloaded and put into a train of cars which left Cumberland for Philadelphia at 7:40 p. m. A tire came off one of the blind drivers of the engine some distance south of Philippi, which delayed the train from Philippi to Grafton, and caused it to miss connection, at the latter place, with the fast freight, No. 98.

[1, 2] In the absence of special contract, there is an implied obligation on a carrier to deliver freight at its destination, within a reasonable time. What is a reasonable time depends, in a large measure, upon the carrier's equipment and facilities, and the nature of the freight to be carried. 2 Hutchinson on Carriers (3d Ed.) § 652. Live stock requires more rapid transportation than coal or lumber, for instance, and it is the duty, as well as the custom, of railroad companies to furnish more rapid transportation for the former than for the latter. The usual time for shipping cattle from Philippi to Philadelphia is shown to be 36 hours, and if defendant's trains had been run on the usual time the cattle would have arrived in Philadelphia Friday night, or early Saturday morning, in time to be sold in the Saturday's market.

[3, 4] Plaintiffs having proven that the cattle arrived in Philadelphia 10 or 12 hours later than the usual time, a prima facie case of negligence was established, and it was then incumbent on the railroad company to justify the delay. Bosley v. Railroad Co., 54 W. Va. 563, 46 S. E. 613, 66 L. R. A. 871. It seeks to do so by proving the accident which happened to its engine before reaching Philippi, on the day the cattle were loaded on the cars. Defendant is not to be held liable for delay occasioned by unavoidable accident. 2 Hutchinson on Carriers, § 654. But, notwithstanding the accident, the duty still rested upon defendant to use reasonable diligence to carry the cattle to Philadelphia without unreasonable delay. Whether it did so or not was a question for the jury to determine from all the facts and circumstances in the case, including the evidence relating to defendant's equipment and its facilities for hauling freight. 2 Hutchinson on Carriers, § 652. Defendant is only liable in this case for the failure, if any, of its employees to use reasonable care and diligence in the shipping of the cattle, making due allowance for such delay as was attributable to the accident to the engine. The proof shows that the company maintained a roundhouse and repair shops at Grafton. It was therefore for the jury to say whether or not it was negligence in the company not to dispatch an engine from Grafton to Philippi, only 24 miles away, and bring the two car loads of cattle down to Grafton in time to connect with No. 98, instead of waiting until the crippled engine was repaired. Whether the company was negligent in not ascertaining by telegraph whether No. 82, destined for Grafton, carried any fast freight on that day for the east, instead of holding the cattle there until the arrival of No. 82, and then finding that it had no such freight, is also a jury question. So, also, the jury had a right to say whether it was negligence to hold the cattle at Cumberland from 1:45 p. m. to 7:40 p. m.

[6] Objection is made to the measure of damages which the trial court allowed. Plaintiffs proved that the cattle arrived in Philadelphia too late for the Saturday market, and that they were compelled to hold them over and sell on the following Monday, when the market was 15 cents per hundred-weight less than on Saturday. This is a correct rule for the measure of damages in such a case. 2 Hutchinson on Carriers, § 651. The reduced price at which plaintiffs were compelled to sell was a direct consequence of the delay, and was an injury to them, and, if the delay was occasioned by defendant's negligence, it is liable to plaintiffs for the difference in price of the cattle.

[5] The bill of lading contains a stipulation that, in the event of unusual delay or detention, "caused by the negligence of said carrier or its employees or its connecting carriers or its employees, or otherwise, the said shipper agrees to accept as full compensation for all loss or damage sustained thereby the amount actually expended by said shipper in the purchase of food and water for the said stock while so detained." This stipulation is void. It is against the policy of the law to permit a common carrier to contract against its common-law liability for its own negligence, or that of its employes. Bosley v. Railroad Co., 54 W. Va. 563, 48 S. E. 613, 66 L. R. A. 871; 6 Cyc. 409; 1 Hutchinson on Carriers, § 450.

The court, at the instance of plaintiffs, gave the following instruction, viz.: "The court instruct the jury that when the defendant company received the plaintiff's cattle for shipment the law implies a contract on the part of the defendant that it would carry the said cattle safely to Philadelphia, and deliver the same at that place within a reasonable time, and that it was the duty of the defendant so to do; and if the jury believe that the said company did not deliver said cattle in Philadelphia within a reasonable time then they shall find for the plaintiffs." This instruction leaves out of account any delay properly attributable to the unavoidable accident to the company's engine, and was evidently misleading, and should not have been given. The jury were not instructed as to the legal effect of any delay in the shipment occasioned by unavoidable accident. Under this instruction, they might have believed, and no doubt did believe, that the failure to deliver the cattle in Philadelphia within the usual scheduled time, to wit, 36 hours, was an unreasonable delay; whereas, the correct rule applicable to this case would credit the railroad company with so much of the delay as was necessarily occasioned by the accident to the engine, and would hold it to the exercise of reasonable diligence for all the time after the accident.

The court refused defendant's instruction No. 1, which would have told the jury that, in the absence of any contract to deliver the cattle at their destination "at any specified time or date, or for any particular market," then the defendant was not required to use any special diligence, but was held to only ordinary and reasonable diligence. In view of plaintiffs' own testimony, which proves that there was no contract to deliver at a specified time, or for a particular market, this instruction correctly states the law, and it should have been given. But it must be remembered that, in view of the character of the freight, it being live stock, requiring more rapid transportation than most other kinds of freight, and in view of the evidence concerning defendant's equipment and facilities for handling and transporting such freight, it is for the jury to determine what is ordinary and reasonable diligence as applied to this case. What would be ordinary and reasonable diligence in handling dead freight might not be reasonable diligence, under a similar state of facts, in handling and transporting live stock.

It follows from what we have said respecting the measure of damages that the court did not err in refusing defendant's instruction No. 3. If, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, defendant could have delivered the cattle in Philadelphia in time to be sold on the Saturday market, and it failed to exercise such diligence, and in consequence thereof plaintiffs were compelled to hold them until Monday, and sell them in a less favorable market, defendant is liable for the difference in price.

Defendant moved the court to set aside the verdict and grant it a new trial. That motion should have been sustained.

[7] Three instructions appear in the printed record, two of which are evidently drawn on behalf of plaintiffs and one on behalf of the defendant. These instructions, however, are not made parts of the record by any bill of exceptions. It does not appear whether they were given or refused. Consequently it is not necessary to discuss them.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment will be reversed, the verdict set aside, a new trial granted, and the case remanded.

STATE v. HUFFMAN.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 21, 1911. Rehearing Denied
Jan. 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. ARSON (§ 20*)—INDICTMENT—VALUE OF PROPERTY.

It is unnecessary in an indictment for arson, under section 6, chapter 145, Code 1906, to charge the value of the building and the property therein separately; and an indictment charging the value of the building and contents as a whole is good on demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arson, Cent. Dig. §§ 41-44; Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 369*)—EVIDENCE—SIMILAR OFFENSES.

On the trial of an indictment for arson evidence of numerous other fires and depredations suffered by the owner of the property burned, covering a series of years immediately preceding the burning of the building charged in the indictment, though not traced to defendant, is admissible on the issue whether such fire was accidental, or the work of an incendiary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 822-824; Dec. Dig. § 369.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 344*)—EVIDENCE—OPPORTUNITY.

The evidence showing that most of such other fires and depredations occurred on Sunday, when the owner of the property and his family were absent at church, evidence of defendant's general habit of absenting himself from church on that day was not incompetent, on the question of opportunity of defendant to commit the other offences occurring on that day, and as tending to connect him therewith, and, under an exception to the general rule, as tending to show intent, malice and the like, and bearing on the question of his guilt or innocence of the offence charged in the indictment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 795; Dec. Dig. § 344.*]

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 789*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—REASONABLE DOUBT.

Though it is the better practice to combine them in one comprehensive instruction, it is not error on the trial of an indictment for arson, to state to the jury the law of reasonable doubt applicable to the whole case, in several distinct instructions or legal propositions to the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1906, 1907; Dec. Dig. § 789.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 829*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS ALREADY GIVEN.

As many times decided, it is unnecessary to repeat instructions which have already been given to the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2011; Dec. Dig. § 829.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 847*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS—OBJECTION TO MODIFICATION—WAIVER.

Though, by the statute of 1907 (Acts 1907, c. 38 [Code Supp. 1909, c. 131, §§ 9a1-9a5]) the right is given a party to object to the modification of a proposed instruction to the jury, and if modified over his objection, to have the same as modified given as the court's instruction, and read in the order prescribed by the statute, yet, if without objection, the court is permitted to read such modified instruction as the instruction of the proponent thereof, such right will be regarded as having been waived.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 847.*]

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 939*)—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—DILIGENCE.

The rule applicable to motions for new trial based on after-discovered evidence, stated in Jacobs v. Williams, 67 W. Va. 377, 67 S. E. 1113, applied to the facts in this case, and justifying the court below in denying the motion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2318-2323; Dec. Dig. § 939.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Nicholas County.

C. B. Huffman was convicted of arson, and brings error. Affirmed.

Corley & Duff and Osenton & Horan, for plaintiff in error. Wm. G. Conley, Atty. Gen., and J. O. Henson, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

MILLER, J. [1] The indictment, on which defendant was found guilty, and by the judgment below, sentenced to an indeterminate term of imprisonment in the penitentiary, charged, substantially in the language of the statute, section 6, chapter 145, Code 1906, that the defendant "on the ——— day of March, 1910, in said County of Nicholas, feloniously and maliciously did burn a certain building, to-wit, a granary, the property of J. J. Reynolds, situate in the said county, which said building and the property therein was then and there of the value of two hundred dollars."

The first point of error is, that the demurrer should have been sustained. The statute reads: "If a person maliciously burn any building, the burning whereof is not punishable under any other section of this chapter, he shall, if the building with property therein be of the value of one hundred dollars or more, be confined in the penitentiary not less than three nor more than ten years; and if it be of less value, be so confined not less than two nor more than five years, or in the discretion of the court, in jail not more than one year, and be fined not exceeding five hundred dollars."

It is insisted that under this statute, the indictment should have charged separately, the value of the building and the property therein, so as to give the prisoner notice. The indictment does charge the value of the building and contents. This is all the statute requires. It is generally sufficient to charge a statutory crime in the language of the statute. State v. Gould, 26 W. Va. 258, 262; People v. Murray, 57 Mich. 396, 24 N. W. 118, 6 Amer. Cr. Rep. 31; 1 Bishop's New Cr. Pro. (4th Ed.) section 611. In Wolf v. Com., 80 Grat. (Va.) 833, the demurrer to an indictment under the same statute, was grounded on the proposition that the offense was not charged with sufficient certainty, there being no allegation that there was actually any property in the barn, alleged to have been burned, and that the property therein was not specified, or in any way stated so as to give defendant any notice of what he was called upon to answer. The Virginia court was of opinion the point was without merit, observing that the indictment was framed nearly in the language of the statute, and that there was nothing in the statute requiring that the property in the building be described independently of the building; that the term of imprisonment being fixed by the value of the building and the property therein, wholly matters of proof, the prisoner could not have been surprised by the manner of alleging the offense. This point must therefore be overruled.

The second point of error is that the court below erred in admitting on behalf of the state, (1) evidence in chief, of other fires and acts of trespass suffered by said Reynolds, covering a period of several years prior to the burning of the granary in question; and, (2) evidence of defendant's habit of absenting himself from church on Sunday.

[2] Much evidence was admitted over the objection of the prisoner, of the burnings of storehouses, barns, fences, hay stacks, and of fires set out in the wood lands of said Reynolds; also of the poisoning of his cattle, and laying down of his fences, and of the turning of stock into his growing crops, and of other depredations suffered by him, covering the period from 1895, down to the year 1910, and showing, not that all, but that many of these things had occurred on Sunday. The state did not undertake to in any way connect the prisoner with either of these offenses. The defendant on the stand, denied all responsibility for or connection with these many offenses, and no attempt was afterwards made by the state to connect him with them, except the one charged in the indictment. When the prisoner, on his defense, put in issue his previous good character and reputation, on cross examination, and for the purpose of testing the truthfulness of defendant's character witnesses, the state was permitted to ask them whether they had not heard the defendant charged with some of those depredations, with the result that one of them at least answered that he could not testify as to defendant's good character subsequent to those burnings. Counsel urgently insist that this evidence, and the evidence of his Sunday habits, was very prejudicial to the prisoner, and that its admission demands a reversal of the judgment below, and a new trial.

The general rule against the admissibility of evidence of other crimes, as stated in Underhill on Cr. Ev., section 87, Walker v. Com., 1 Leigh (Va.) 574, and other authorities, is invoked. In this case, however, no attempt was made to connect the prisoner with other crimes. According to the general rule relied on, this evidence, for such a purpose would have been inadmissible. According to the attorney general, however, the evidence admitted was offered for entirely a different purpose, namely, as tending to show that the burning in question was not accidental, but the work of an incendiary. He argues that evidence of the fact that Reynolds had suffered so many prior depredations, covering a series of years immediately preceding the one charged against the defendant, of incendiary origin, tended to dispel any doubt that the fire in question was also the work of an incendiary, a fact necessary to be established before the accused could be connected therewith, and that in as much as such crimes, as in this case, are always clandestinely planned and secretly executed, and must be established in most cases by circumstantial evidence, the fact and circumstances of the other offences became most important as tending to dispel all doubt.

The authorities cited and relied on by the attorney general, and other authorities, seem to support the proposition, that where such evidence tends to show that the other fires were a part of one connected scheme or purpose of the defendant; or as tending to show that the particular fire with which the accused is charged was not accidental; or when, together with other evidence, it tends to show motive or intent, or to identify the accused with the offense charged, it is admissible. 5 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law and Pract. 633; 3 Cyc. 1007; State v. McMahon, 17 Nev. 365, 30 Pac. 1000; State v. Ward, 61 Vt. 153, 181, 17 Atl. 483; State v. Hallock, 70 Vt. 159, 40 Atl. 51; State v. Thompson, 97 N. C. 496, 1 S. E. 921; People v. Murphy, 135 N. Y. 450, 457, 32 N. E. 138; People v. Molineux, 168 N. Y. 264, 61 N. E. 286, 62 L. R. A. 193. Note, on Evidence of other Crimes in Criminal Cases, and particularly that part of the note, under the different heads, relating to arson. Underhill on Cr. Ev., section 89; Sykes v. State (Tenn.) 105 Am. St. Rep. 976, note page 976. See, also, State v. Hyde, 234 Mo. 200, 136 S. W. 316.

Generally where evidence of previous offenses has been admitted for any of the purposes indicated they have been in some way traced to the defendant, but as we understand the authorities, this is not a prerequisite to its admission, if it is intended to be limited to proving that the particular fire in question was not accidental. 1 Wigmore on Evidence, section 354; People v. Murphy, 135 N. Y. 456, 32 N. E. 138; State v. Rohfrisch, 12 La. Ann. 382. Wigmore says: "Moreover, the principle of anonymous intent is recognized as being here occasionally of peculiar utility; i. e. the recurrence of a similar fire may tend decidedly to negative innocent intent, even though the author of the other fires is not shown; then the prosecution having negatived innocent intent in the present fire by whomsoever set, the defendant may be shown to have kindled it." Our trouble in the case at bar has been whether the evidence of so many fires and other depredations running back over so many years and disconnected in time, circumstances, and character, as these were, was properly admissible, as falling within the rules and principles of the decisions and the text writers cited. We have concluded, however, that taken in connection with the evidence of the bad feeling of the prisoner towards Reynolds, beginning about the same time, the unusual number of these offences, the peculiar character of them, and the time and circumstances of their occurrences, and taken in connection with all other evidence in the case, the evidence was admissible, at least on the question of the incendiary character of the fire in question. That Reynolds, a near neighbor of defendant should have sustained so many and unusual losses of property by fire and otherwise, beginning almost coincidentally with the commencement of his troubles with the accused is very significant, and constitute a composite fact bearing not only on the fact of incendiarism, but also, in the absence of any evidence of motive or opportunity on the part of any other person, pointing strongly to the prisoner as the guilty person. For these reasons we are not disposed to sustain this point of error.

[3] On the question of the admissibility of the evidence relating to defendant's Sunday habits, we are not disposed to attach much importance to this evidence. We do not see that it could have materially prejudiced the prisoner. The position of his counsel is that, in a rural community, it tended to prejudice him greatly with the jury, contrasted as it may have been with the church going habits of Reynolds, shown in evidence. This was not the purpose of the evidence.

Moreover, the evidence of the prisoner, and others, shows that he did frequently attend church on Sunday, his wife and family more frequently, though not so regularly perhaps as Reynolds and his family. We do not think an impartial jury of his own county, sitting in judgment upon the crime with which defendant stood charged, could have been prejudiced against him by this evidence. As showing opportunity to commit the numerous other offenses it may be classed along with evidence of the fact of his place of residence, and his situation in time, place and circumstance with reference to those offenses, and as constituting a fact or circumstance pointing to the prisoner, as the perpetrator of those crimes, and pertinent under the authorities cited, as an exception to the general rule, to show intent, malice and the like, and tending to show guilt of crimes of like character to that charged against him in the indictment. We overrule the point.

[4] Relying on State v. Legg, 59 W. Va. 315, 53 S. E. 545, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1152, in which Judge Sanders, arguendo, inveighs against the practice of propounding numerous instructions to the jury on the same subject, not a point of the syllabus, counsel for the prisoner complain that the court below erred in giving to the jury State's instructions numbered 3, 4, 6, 7, 8, and 11, defining reasonable doubt. If this be error, like error was committed at the instance of defendant's counsel. But we do not see that any error was committed. The instructions complained of consisted of several short propositions, which might very properly have been embraced in a single instruction, applicable to the whole case, on the law of reasonable doubt. It is not pretended that these segregated propositions, or taken together, do not propound the law correctly; but only that, separated they emphasize too prominently the subject of reasonable doubt. The several propositions are well supported by prior decisions, and need not be repeated. This point must also be overruled.

[5] The rejection of the prisoner's instructions numbered 22 and 23 is the subject of the next point of error. In the bill of exceptions certifying these instructions the court below gives the same reason for rejecting them, that it gives for rejecting numerous other instructions covered by the same bill of exceptions, namely, that they were covered by other instructions, given, and that they were wholly unnecessary and superfluous. The answer of the court below is a good one, and we make the same response. The court need not repeat instructions which have already been substantially given. State v. Bingham, 42 W. Va. 234, 24 S. E. 883; Kerr v. Lunsford, 31 W. Va. 659, 8 S. E. 493, 2 L. R. A. 668.

[6] The prisoner objecting to their modification, the court modified, and gave to the jury as modified, and as his instructions, defendant's instructions numbered 17 and 19. This is the subject of another point of error. It is not claimed that as modified, and given, these instructions did not propound correct legal propositions, on the subject of circumstantial evidence, to which they related; but that after modifying them, the court, in violation of the statute of 1907 (Acts 1907, c. 38 [Code Supp. 1909, c. 131, §§ 9a1-9a5]), in place of reading the instructions in the order required, as the instructions of the court, they were read as the instructions of the defendant. The court fully covered the subject of those instructions by instruction number 20, given for the prisoner, and might properly have refused instructions number 17 and 19 on this ground, but this is not the point of the exception. What counsel for prisoner complain of is, that the court after his objections to the modifications, gave the instructions as modified, as the instructions of the prisoner. In its bill of exceptions certifying these instructions the court below says, that they were so given, without any objection by the defendant at the time to their being given as his instructions. We decided in State v. Clark, 64 W. Va. 625, 63 S. E. 402, and we think properly, that the statute in question is mandatory; but, as there held, the right given by the statute may be waived by the party. According to the record, no objection was interposed by the prisoner, to the reading of these instructions, as modified, as his instructions, and within the rule of State v. Clark, we think the prisoner thereby waived his right. He should have objected at the time, if he relied upon the statute; and we may properly conclude, no objection being interposed, that he was willing that the court should give the instructions, as modified, as his instructions.

[7] As we cannot say the verdict is unsupported by the evidence, the only other point of error relied upon is, the refusal of the court to award a new trial on the ground of after-discovered evidence. The motion for a new trial on this ground was based on the affidavit of C. F. McQueen, a deputy sheriff, supported by the affidavits of the prisoner and his counsel, as to the time of the discovery of this witness, and the evidence he would give. The affidavit of McQueen relates to the part he took in measuring the tracks, leading to and from the granary in question, on the morning after the fire; and the relations those tracks bore to certain sticks used in measuring them, exhibited before the jury in connection with the testimony of other witnesses; and to the comparisons he had made after the trial, between the lengths of those sticks and the length of the overshoes of the prisoner, exhibited on the trial. His evidence would have been purely cumulative of the evidence of other witnesses, examined on the trial. The witness disclosed his identity and evidence to the prisoner's counsel at the bar of the court before the arguments were concluded, or the case was submitted to the jury, and although it is shown by affidavit that the prosecuting attorney declined the request of the prisoner's counsel that the witness be then permitted to make his statement to the jury, no motion was made to the court to permit the witness to testify before conclusion of the argument and the submission of the case to the jury. Besides all this, the record shows that Reynolds, the first witness for the state, on a trial which lasted several days, disclosed the fact in the beginning of his testimony, that McQueen had been present when the tracks were examined and measurements taken, and that although present in the court room during the progress of the trial, so far as the record shows, neither the prisoner, nor his counsel, made any inquiry of him to ascertain what evidence he could give. This does not show such due diligence as the law requires, to secure a new trial on after-discovered evidence. The legal principles upon that question have been too frequently announced to require repetition. Jacobs v. Williams, 67 W. Va. 377, 67 S. E. 1113.

The record shows the prisoner was given a fair trial, by an able and painstaking judge, and had the assistance of very able counsel in his defense; and though convicted upon circumstantial evidence for the most part, it was by a jury of his own county, and we ought not disturb their verdict, except for substantial reasons. Having discovered no errors of law, therefore, our plain duty is to affirm the judgment.

HARMAN v. CITY OF BLUEFIELD et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 12, 1911. Rehearing Denied
Jan. 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 101*)—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—CHANGING GRADE OF STREET—DAMAGES.

If, by changing the grade line of one of its streets, a municipality injure the property of an abutting owner, it is liable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 269, 270; Dec. Dig. § 101.*]

2. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 101*)—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—CHANGING GRADE OF STREET—DAMAGES.

If the public have been permitted to use an open street on the natural grade, and to build on lots abutting thereon with reference to such natural grade, and the municipality thereafter improve the street and thereby cause injury to an abutting owner, it is liable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 269, 270; Dec. Dig. § 101.*]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 647*)—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—CHANGING GRADE OF STREET—DAMAGES.

If a municipality extends its corporate lines so as to include territory which had theretofore been laid off into building lots and streets, and thereafter permits such streets to be used by the public, and later improves them, it thereby makes them public streets, and the municipality becomes liable for any injury to abutting lot owners occasioned by an alteration in the natural grade line of the street.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1420; Dec. Dig. § 647.*]

4. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 141*)—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—CHANGING GRADE OF STREET—DAMAGES.

The true measure of damages to a lot abutting on a street, occasioned by a change in the grade line of the street, is the difference between the value of the lot immediately before, and its value immediately after, the street improvement, less any special or peculiar benefits to the lot because of the improvement of the street, but leaving out of account such general benefits as accrue to it in common with other property similarly situated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 372-376; Dec. Dig. § 141.*]

5. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 141*)—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—CHANGING GRADE OF STREET—EVIDENCE.

As an element affecting the value of his property, plaintiff may prove what will be the cost of any alterations in his property which have been rendered necessary, on account of the street improvement, to preserve it from further injury and render it fit for enjoyment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 372-376; Dec. Dig. § 141.*]

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

6. EMINENT DOMAIN (§§ 79, 80*)—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—CHANGE OF GRADE OF STREET—ESTOPPEL TO ALLEGE DAMAGES.

An owner of land abutting a street, who conveys a strip to the city for the purpose of widening the street, is not thereby estopped to claim damages on account of a change in the grade of the street, not contemplated at the time of the conveyance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 205-214; Dec. Dig. §§ 79, 80.*]

7. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 203*)—CHANGE OF GRADE OF STREET—DAMAGES—EVIDENCE.

Where, in changing the grade of a street, the city replaced a wooden bridge across a stream which ran through an abutting owner's lot with a concrete culvert, and made a considerable fill along the edge of plaintiff's lot on both sides of the stream, and in an action against the city the declaration alleged that, by reason of said trespasses, water has, from time to time, been caused to flow upon the lot, and to soak into and under the dwelling house, evidence that the culvert erected by the city was not large enough to let the water pass through at times of high tide, and that it caused the water to overflow his lot and endangered his property, was admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Dec. Dig. § 203.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Mercer County.

Action by M. K. Harman against the City of Bluefield and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant named brings error. Affirmed.

Ritz & Ritz and D. E. French, for plaintiff in error. Sanders & Crockett, for defendant in error.

WILLIAMS, P. Plaintiff brought an action against defendant to recover damages for alleged injury to his real estate, and recovered a judgment for $800, and defendant has brought the case here on writ of error.

Plaintiff is the owner of a corner lot, fronting 54 feet on Bland street and extending back along North street 100 feet, in the city of Bluefield. Early in 1905, he erected a wooden frame building upon this lot, and used it for a store and dwelling house combined. He also built a wood frame stable on the back end of the lot. The house is 30x48 feet, and stands in the angle of Bland and North streets. At the time these buildings were erected, the lot on which they stand was not within the city, but, on the 1st of June, 1905, the corporate limits were extended so as to include it. There was a county road where Bland street now is, and plaintiff built his house with reference to the grade line of the county road. After the city had acquired jurisdiction over the new territory, it widened and changed the grade line of the county road, and also changed the grade line of North street, and paved both of said streets, and granted a franchise to the Blue-stone Traction Company, a corporation, to lay its tracks and operate its cars upon said streets. A branch, or natural drain, runs across the lot between the house and stable and across North street, and the lot slopes from both ends towards the branch. In grading the two streets, the city lowered the grade line by nearly a foot at the intersection of Bland street and North street, and elevated the grade line at the other corner of plaintiff's lot on Bland street, and also raised the grade line of North street along the side of plaintiff's lot from three to five feet in places, and erected a concrete culvert across the branch.

[1] It is the well-settled law of this state that a municipality is liable to an abutting lot owner for injury done to his property by changing the grade line of the street. Johnson v. Parkersburg, 16 W. Va. 402, 37 Am. Rep. 779; Hutchinson v. Parkersburg, 25 W. Va. 226; Blair v. Charleston, 43 W. Va. 62, 26 S. E. 341, 35 L. R. A. 852, 64 Am. St. Rep. 837.

[3] But, it is contended, plaintiff was not entitled to damages on account of the elevation of the grade line of North street, because it was not proven that the city had ever, previous to the paving in question, established a grade line for that street. It is insisted that a municipality is not liable because of the establishment of a grade line in the first instance. It does not appear that North street was expressly adopted by city ordinance as one of its public thoroughfares and opened to travel, but it does appear that it was used by the public, on the natural grade, as a public street for about two years before the improvement in question was made. The corporate limits were extended to include the territory embracing North street, June 1, 1905, but that was after plaintiff had built his house with reference to the natural grade line. Witness George H. Hill, city engineer, says he does not know when North street was located; he was then city engineer, and had been such engineer since the 1st of June, 1905. If North street had been located by the city during his incumbency, he certainly would have known it. Therefore, while negative in character, his testimony proves that North street had been located by some one, other than the city, and opened to the public, prior to the extension of the corporate limits of the city. Consequently, when the city took in the new territory, it must be considered as having adopted North street as a public street. True there is no formal ordinance opening the street to the public, but the improvement made on it, without change of its location, is sufficient evidence that the city adopted it, and permitted it to be used as one of its public streets, from the time its corporate lines were extended.

Plaintiff had a right to build his house to conform to the grade line of the county road and natural grade line of North street, and if the change in the grade line, afterwards made by the city, injured his property, it was an injury which entitles him to compensation. It was a damaging to his property, for the public use, and our Constitution says: "Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation. * * *" Section 9, art. 3, Code 1906, p. 1.

[2] It is not necessary that the city should have first, by ordinance, established a grade line, and then afterwards have changed it, to constitute liability. The use of North street by the public from 1905 to 1907, when it was improved and the grade line was changed, was tantamount to an adoption of the street with the natural surface as the grade line, and any subsequent change from that grade line, which injured plaintiff's property, rendered the city liable. Hutchinson v. Parkersburg, 25 W. Va. 226; Blair v. Charleston, 43 W. Va. 62, 26 S. E. 341, 35 L. R. A. 852, 64 Am. St. Rep. 837; Bor. New Brighton v. United Pres. Ch., 96 Pa. 331; Jones v. Bor. Bangor, 144 Pa. 639, 8 Atl. 252; Davis v. Railway Co., 119 Mo. 180, 24 S. W. 777, 41 Am. St. Rep. 648; Hickman v. City of Kansas, 120 Mo. 110, 25 S. W. 225, 23 L. R. A. 658, 41 Am. St. Rep. 684; Bloomington v. Pollock, 141 Ill. 346, 31 N. E. 146.

[8] Plaintiff conveyed to the city a strip of land off his lot, along Bland street, for the purpose of widening that street, and counsel for the city insist that he is thereby estopped to claim damages on account of any change made in Bland street. This is true, so far as it relates to any damages which might result from cutting the strip of ground down to a level of the grade of the old road, for such damages must have been contemplated, and are regarded as compensated for by the consideration paid ($220) for the strip of ground. In fact, a part of the consideration recited in the deed is that Bland street is to be widened and macadamized. But there is nothing in the deed to indicate that a change in the grade line was then contemplated; and we do not see on what principle plaintiff could be properly denied right to damages, if any, resulting from a change of the grade line, when the deed is silent on that point, and there is no evidence that plaintiff knew, when he made the deed, that the improvement to be made contemplated a change in the grade line of the road or street.

[7] There was a wooden bridge over the branch which ran through plaintiff's lot and across North street, and in changing the grade of the street the city replaced this wooden bridge with a concrete culvert, and made a considerable fill along the edge of plaintiff's lot on both sides of the branch. Plaintiff introduced evidence tending to prove that the culvert was not large enough to let the water pass through in times of high tide, and that it caused the water to overflow his lot and injure his property. It is urged that the court erred in permitting this evidence to go to the jury, because, it is claimed, there is no averment in the declaration on which to base such testimony. The declaration, however, does contain, the following averment, viz.: "And the plaintiff avers that by reason of the said trespasses committed by the said defendants that water has, from time to time, since the committing of the grievances aforesaid, been caused to drain and flow in and upon the aforesaid lot of the plaintiff, and caused to soak, percolate, and flow into and under the aforesaid dwelling house, as it otherwise would not have done, and it has thereby caused the floors and walls of said house to become permanently damp, moist, and mouldy. * * * "While the law does not entitle plaintiff to damage on account of surface water cast upon his lot, unless collected and cast upon it in a body, still we think the averment, above quoted, is sufficient to admit the evidence objected to. It was not necessary to allege the particular manner in which the water was caused to flow upon the lot; the fact being alleged, the manner could be proven. It is one of the natural consequences of making the fill across the branch that, if the culvert was made too small to carry the water, it would cause it to overflow the land above.

[8] It is also insisted that the court erred in permitting evidence to go to the jury to prove the cost of constructing a concrete culvert entirely through the plaintiff's lot of sufficient size to carry the water of the branch. The admissibility of such evidence depends upon the existence of a necessity for such alteration or improvement, to preserve plaintiff's property from further injury and to render it fit for enjoyment. This court held, in effect, in Godbey v. Bluefield, 61 W. Va. 604, 57 S. E. 45, that costs of making alterations in the premises was proper to go to the jury in estimating damages, if such alterations are necessary to preserve the property from further injury, or to render it fit for use and enjoyment. These are questions of fact; and the reasonable cost of such improvements is an element bearing upon the quantum of damages, because they affect the value of the property. If such improvements are necessary to preserve the property from further injury, the fact that the lot would be rendered more valuable thereby than it ever had been is not a matter entitling the city to reduce plaintiff's damages by the amount of the enhanced value, because the city's improvement of the street makes such alterations necessary for the preservation of the property, and if the alterations should not be made the property would be of less value than it ever had been. Plaintiff and a number of other witnesses who testified in his behalf were asked what alterations would be necessary in plaintiff's property to preserve it from further injury and to render it fit for use and enjoyment, and they answered that it would be necessary to put a stone wall, or foundation, under the house and dispense with the use of the basement or lower story of the house, which, plaintiff says, yielded him $120 a year in rentals; that it would also be necessary to cover the branch with a concrete culvert, and to bring the surface of the lot up to the level of the street. Their estimate of the cost of that alteration ranged from $2,200 to something over $4,000.

[4] The true measure of damages in a case like this is the difference between the value of the property immediately before, and its value immediately after, the improvement in the street was made, less any peculiar benefit to the property because of the street improvement. Any general enhancement in value of plaintiff's property, occasioned by the street improvement, which affects, in the same manner, the value of other property situate in the same vicinity with plaintiff's property, is not to be taken into account. Such general advantage to his property does not lessen plaintiff's damages.

The court below tried the case according to the correct rule as to the measure of damages. But, as is almost always true in regard to the trial of cases of this character, there is much and wide difference of opinion among witnesses as to the amount of damages plaintiff had suffered. A number of them testified that, in their opinion, the damages amounted to $2,500; some put it at more than this. The plaintiff and his brother estimated it to be as much as $4,000. On the other hand, a number of witnesses for defendant gave it as their judgment that the property was not damaged at all; that the benefit to the property offset the damages. But, on their cross-examination, it is made to appear that their opinions were based on the fact that the property had been enhanced in value, in a general way, because of the improvement of the streets and the establishment of a car line upon them; and that all property in the immediate vicinity of plaintiff's lot was also enhanced in value for the same reason. It is therefore evident that those witnesses failed to leave out of account the general benefit accruing to plaintiff's property on account of the public improvement. As before stated, such general enhancement of value should not go to diminish plaintiff's damages. It is almost impossible to determine, with strict accuracy, the exact amount of damage suffered in a case like this. There is always a great diversity of opinion among witnesses, who may be, and generally are, equally honest in their views. The jury did not adopt the opinion of any one witness as the basis for its verdict, because the verdict is less than half the amount fixed by any one of plaintiff's witnesses, and is largely in excess of the damages estimated by any one of defendant's witnesses. One of defendant's witnesses, W. S. Fouts, admitted that, in his opinion, the property had been damaged as much as $100, leaving out of account the general enhancement of the value on account of the street improvement. But all of defendant's other witnesses were of opinion that the improvement of the street offset the damage to the lot.

It follows from what we have said that the court committed no error in giving plaintiff's instruction No. 1, and in refusing to give defendant's instructions Nos. 1 and 2. Plaintiff cross-assigns error in the giving of defendant's instructions Nos. 3 and 4. But, inasmuch as he asks for an affirmation of the judgment, it is unnecessary to discuss these assignments.

The judgment will be affirmed.

LATHROP v. COLUMBIA COLLIERIES CO.
et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 5, 1911. Rehearing Denied
Jan. 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 76*)—TENDER OF PRICE—DEFECT IN TITLE.

Where a vendor contracts to convey real estate free of defects of title, the vendee need not tender the purchase money on the day stipulated if the vendor is not then able to pass good title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 119; Dec. Dig. § 76.*]

2. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 116%*)—BILL—DEMURRER.

Though a bill for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of land shows the title to be in a third party, it cannot be assumed on demurrer that the statute of frauds will prevent the enforcement of the contract, when the contract, exhibited with the bill, declares that the vendor owns and controls the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Dec. Dig. § 116%.*]

3. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 116%*)—BILL—DEMURRER.

If one contract to sell the land of another, representing that he has power to cause a conveyance thereof, a bill brought by the vendee for the specific performance of the contract is not insufficient on demurrer merely because the vendor may not have title to the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Dec. Dig. § 116%.*]

4. EVIDENCE (§ 73*)—PRESUMPTIONS—CORPORATE CONTRACT—EXECUTION—AUTHORITY.

When a corporate contract is executed ostensibly by the corporation, and the officer executing the contract, professedly on behalf of the corporation, is the appropriate one to execute such a contract on its behalf, the law presumes a precedent authorization regularly and rightly made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 94; Dec. Dig. § 73.*]

5. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 22*)—VALIDITY—DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY—INDEFINITENESS.

On demurrer to a bill for specific performance, the following description in a contract for the sale of land is not void for uncertainty: "All the real estate of the Columbia Collieries Company situated in the County of McDowell, State of West Virginia, on the south fork of Tug River, and on the ridge between the north and south forks of Tug River, containing fourteen hundred and twenty-six (1,426) acres more or less."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 27; Dec. Dig. § 22.*]

6. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 141*)—CONTRACTS—OBJECTIONS TO TITLE—EFFECT.

If a vendor has contracted to convey land free of defects of title, objections to the title by the vendee cannot absolve the vendor from the obligation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 265; Dec. Dig. § 141.*]

7. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 10*)—OUTSTANDING TITLE—RIGHTS OF PURCHASER.

When a vendor contracts to sell a larger interest in real estate than he can make title to, a court of equity may compel him at the suit of the vendee to convey such estate or interests as he may have in the premises contracted to be sold, with an abatement of the consideration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 20-25; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

8. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 32*)—CONTRACTS—MUTUALITY.

A contract for the sale of land which so binds both parties that either one may compel the other to perform, cannot be held void for want of mutuality.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 89-99; Dec. Dig. § 32.*]

9. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 70*)—TRANSFER OF STOCKS AND BONDS.

Equity will compel the specific performance of a contract for the transfer of stock and bonds when they have a peculiar value to the party demanding the transfer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 203; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, McDowell County.

Bill by W. A. Lathrop against the Columbia Collieries Company and another. Decree for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Phlegar & Powell and Geo. W. St. Clair, for appellant. Anderson, Strother & Hughes and Vinson & Thompson, for appellees.

ROBINSON, J. Lathrop sued the Columbia Collieries Company and the Southwest Virginia Trust Company for the specific performance of a contract between him and the Trust Company. On demurrer, the court dismissed his bill as insufficient. He has appealed.

We deem it essential to recite some material portions of the contract:

"Witnesseth: That the party of the first part owns and controls the property hereinafter described and covenants and agrees, in consideration of one thousand dollars ($1,000) paid by the party of the second part to the party of the first part this day, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, to convey and transfer the said property and perform the conditions of this contract as hereinafter set forth, provided the said W. A. Lathrop elects to purchase the same on or before the 20th day of February, 1908, in accordance with the provision of this contract, which election is to be made in writing and delivered to the party of the first part or mailed to it, addressing same to Roanoke, Virginia; and therefore, hereby covenants and agrees as follows:

"First: That, for and in consideration of the sum of eighty-five thousand dollars ($85,000) to be paid as hereinafter provided, the party of the first part covenants and agrees:

"1. To cause to be conveyed in fee simple to the party of the second part, or his assigns, all of the real estate of the Columbia Collieries Company situated in the County of McDowell, State of West Virginia, of the south fork of Tug River, and on the ridge between the north and south forks of Tug River, containing fourteen hundred and twenty-six (1426) acres more or less, free of incumbrances and defects of title; and the deed of conveyance shall contain a covenant of general warranty of title, or,

"2. Will transfer to the party of the second part or his assigns all of the certificates of shares of the capital stock of the said Columbia Collieries Company, together with all the bonds authorized by said company to be issued, which said issue of bonds amounts to the aggregate sum of one hundred thousand dollars and is secured by a deed of trust on said real estate, which deed of trust is of record in the Clerk's office of McDowell County, West Virginia, or

"3. Will cause said land to be conveyed as hereinabove provided and transfer to be made of said stock and bonds as above set forth, for the consideration above mentioned, which conveyance or transfer shall be made on or before the 27th day of February, 1908, on or before which date it is agreed between the parties hereto this contract shall be closed by the execution of the papers and payment of cash and notes as herein provided.

"Second: It is further covenanted and agreed on the part of the party of the first part that the party of the second part shall have until the 27th day of February, 1908, to examine the title to said lands and survey the same before accepting a deed to the said real estate, or a transfer of the stock and bonds; and the party of the second part agrees that he will, on or before the 27th day of February, 1908, make such examination as he desires and will then advise the party of the first part if said titles are satisfactory and if so, will also notify said party of the first part in writing whether he will require a deed to be executed in accordance with the terms of this contract as hereinabove set forth, or the delivery of the stock and bonds as above set forth, or will close said transaction by accepting both a deed and the transfer of said stock and bonds as hereinabove provided.

"Third: In the event the party of the second part shall ascertain that there exists such substantial defects in the title which cannot be remedied within a reasonable time, then the obligation of this contract on the part of the second part shall cease and be at an end, but in the event the defect reported, if any such is reported, is cured by the party of the first part within a reasonable time, then the obligation of this contract shall remain unimpaired and the terms hereof shall be carried out as soon thereafter as said defect may be cured."

The bill shows that plaintiff duly notified the Trust Company prior to February 20, 1908, of his election to take the property under the contract, and that on or before February 27, 1908, he further notified the Trust Company of certain defects of title to be cured and of his election to take both a conveyance of the land and a transfer of the stock and bonds. Other substantial averments of the bill are: That plaintiff did all the contract required him to do, but that the Trust Company has failed and refused, though demanded, to carry out the contract on its part; that the defects of title are such as can be cured; that plaintiff is willing to take the part of the property to which the defects of title do not pertain, with proper abatement of the purchase price; and that he is able and willing to take all the property and to make payment therefor as stipulated, whenever the Trust Company shall tender him a deed for the property and the stock and bonds in compliance with the contract.

Now, what other showing should plaintiff make to demand performance of the contract? He avers full compliance on his part and a failure to comply on the part of the Trust Company. He shows that he has done all that the contract requires him to do until the other party shall tender the conveyance, stock and bonds for which the contract calls. Prima facie his case is a good one. Of course an answer to the bill may make a very different case. At present, however, we can look only to the face of the bill.

[1] Viewing the contract as a whole, and giving it reasonable meaning, we cannot hold that a tender of the installment of purchase money and of the purchase money notes on or before February 27, 1908, was essential to the right of plaintiff to demand the property, in view of the defects of title which he pointed out. Time in this particular was not of the essence of the contract, for another clause expressly contemplates further time in the event substantial defects of title are found. It must be observed that the contract expressly calls for a conveyance of the property in fee simple, free of incumbrances and defects in title. The obligation to furnish such conveyance is on the Trust Company. It assumed that obligation for a consideration. Until it performs the obligation, plaintiff is not in default for failure to tender the purchase money and notes. Indeed that would be true were time of the essence of the contract. The bill substantially avers that the Trust Company on February 27, 1908, was not then able to pass good title because of defects of title. The holding in Gas Co. v. Elder, 54 W. Va. 335, 46 S. E. 357, is in point: "Though in a contract for the sale of land a provision for payment on a day be made of the essence of the contract, yet if the vendor is not then able to pass a good title, equity will relieve against a failure to pay on the day, and enforce performance at the instance of the vendee." Since this principle is true where time is of the essence of the contract, certainly it is more applicable where, as in this case, time is not of the essence of the contract.

[2] Defendants insist that the statute of frauds prohibits the enforcement of the contract. How do we know that it does, on this demurrer? Though the Trust Company contracted to convey the property of another, we do not know that the statute of frauds will prevent that conveyance. An answer in the case may show that it will, but the fact does not appear from the bill and exhibits to which the demurrer applies. Indeed we may say that the bill and exhibits show the contrary. The Trust Company declares in the contract that it "owns and controls" the property. How then does the statute of frauds interfere? The Trust Company, it seems, has the property legally bound to it. Besides the bill avers that the Trust Company owns all the stock of the Columbia Collieries Company. That being true, it is completely within the power of the Trust Company to cause the conveyance which plaintiff demands. Kennedy v. Merchants & Miners Bank, 67 W. Va. 475, 68 S. E. 32.

[3] The argument is made that the Columbia Collieries Company cannot be compelled to convey its land without corporate action on its part, nor until a contract has been signed by that corporation charging it to convey. We grant that this is true; but the fact does not argue against the sufficiency of the bill. The suit is to compel a conveyance by the Trust Company of land which it represented it had power to convey, though the property be that of another. If the land of that other party is not within the legal control of the Trust Company so that it can be conveyed as contracted, let that fact be shown by answer. As the case now presents the matter, the Columbia Collieries Company is in some way legally bound to the Trust Company so that the latter corporation may cause a conveyance of the property of the other. Fry on Specific Performance (5th Ed.) § 994; Browne v. Warner, 14 Ves. 412; 36 Cyc. 574, 575.

[4] The contract is executed in the corporate name of the Trust Company, by its president, the corporate seal is affixed, and the same is duly attested by the secretary of the corporation. Yet on this demurrer it is said that the bill does not aver authority in the president to make the contract. This point is untenable. The contract is prima facie proof of the corporate act which it evidences. That which we said in Kennedy v. Bank, supra, is applicable here: "The contract * * * is executed ostensibly by the corporation. The officer who executed the contract professedly in its behalf was the appropriate one to execute such a contract in behalf of the corporation. The law, under these circumstances, presumes a precedent authorization regularly and rightfully made, if the corporation itself had the power to make such contract."

[5] Another point urged is that the description of the property is void for uncertainty. The description recited in the contract is sufficient. Mundy v. Vawter, 8 Grat. (Va.) 518; Vanmeter's Ex'rs v. Vanmeter, 8 Grat. (Va.) 148. The property can surely be located and identified by it. This description is to be distinguished from such as was involved in Crawford v. Workman, 64 W. Va. 10, 61 S. E. 819. It is definite in that it calls for all. Extrinsic evidence may be used to apply a contract of the character of this one to its subject matter. Kight v. Kight, 64 W. Va. 519, 63 S. E. 335; Harvey v. Edens, 69 Tex. 420, 6 S. W. 306. Usually the records of the county readily disclose, with definite particulars, all the real estate owned by one therein.

[6] Then it is said that the option was not accepted in a manner that is binding on either the optionee or the optionor. The argument that it was not so accepted is based on a construction of the contract which we cannot approve. This construction is, that plaintiff could only elect to purchase under the contract provided he found the title satisfactory to him. Since he did not find the title satisfactory, his election or acceptance amounted to nothing. In other words, if the titles were not satisfactory to plaintiff, the contract was at an end, unless the Trust Company cured the defects in a reasonable time, as provided in the third main clause of the contract. But clear import of the contract is not to this effect. The mere presence of defects of title did not end the contract. On the other hand the Trust Company contracted to convey free of defects of title, and plaintiff may give the notices of election and insist upon such a conveyance, as he has done. The contract plainly contemplates the removal of defects by the Trust Company, if plaintiff elects to take the property and defects are found. Plaintiff may insist upon having all that was promised him. True, a provision gave him the right to end the obligation he had assumed, in case substantial defects were not cured in a reasonable time; but that provision of the contract is one in his own behalf. The Trust Company cannot seek relief under it. Plaintiff is not asking to take advantage of it. He comes, virtually saying that he waives that provision, and demands that the defects of title be cured, or that the part of the property not affected by defects of title be conveyed to him, with a proper abatement of price. Reasonable interpretation of the contract gives him the right so to demand.

[7] Further, the defendants say the bill shows that the title to the land is outstanding in third parties. The bill does show that there are defects of title in this particular as to some parcels of the land. The bill, however, avers that all the defects can be cured. Besides, plaintiff expresses a willingness to take all the property not affected by adverse title. Let us here use the words of Lord Eldon: "If a man, having partial interests in an estate, chooses to enter into a contract, representing it, and agreeing to sell it, as his own, it is not competent to him afterwards to say, though he has valuable interests, he has not the entirety; and therefore the purchaser shall not have the benefit of his contract. For the purpose of this jurisdiction, the person contracting under those circumstances, is bound by the assertion in his contract; and, if the vendee chooses to take as much as he can have, he has a right to that, and to an abatement." Mortlock v. Buller, 10 Ves. 315.

[8] Defendants also say that the contract lacks mutuality, so that both parties are not bound. A perusal of the contract must convince one of the contrary view. Both the vendor and vendee are bound. After plaintiff gave the notice of acceptance, the Trust Company could make him take the property if he refused. It is insisted that he could release himself from the contract by merely saying that the titles were not satisfactory. That is by no means a proper interpretation of the agreement. If good title, free of defects and incumbrances, were tendered him in a reasonable time, a court of equity would compel him to perform. There is mutuality of remedy. Both parties are so bound that either may be compelled to perform, unless some default of the other releases him.

[9] The bill is not bad wherein it calls for specific performance in relation to the stock and bonds. Equity will compel the specific performance of a contract for the transfer of stock and bonds when they have a peculiar value. It would seem that the stock and bonds of the Columbia Collieries Company have a peculiar value to plaintiff in relation to the title of the land which he seeks to obtain. They are really muniments of title which are peculiarly valuable to the owner of the land. They cannot be obtained in the market. The Trust Company has all of them. The usual reason against allowing specific performance in relation to stock and bonds cannot apply under such circumstances. Hogg v. McGuffin, 87 W. Va. 456, 68 S. E. 41, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 491.

The court erred in dismissing the bill on demurrer. The decree will be reversed, the demurrer to the bill overruled, and the cause remanded to be further proceeded in.

HESSON v. PENN FURNITURE CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 19, 1911. On Petition for Rehearing, Jan. 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 256*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—DECLARATION—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

A declaration, in an action to recover damages for injury to the servant from defective machinery furnished by the master, is not bad on demurrer, as disclosing contributory negligence because the things making the machinery defective were evidently visible, when it does not appear that those things were palpably noticeable in relation to unsafe use of the machinery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 256.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 221*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—PROMISE TO REMOVE DANGER.

Where the servant refrains from abandoning a dangerous service in consequence of assurances by the master that the danger shall be removed, the duty of the master to remove the danger is manifest and imperative, and he is not in the exercise of ordinary care until he makes good the assurances. In such case, the servant assumes the risk only when the danger is so patent that a reasonably prudent man would not incur it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 638-647; Dec. Dig. § 221.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 296*) — INSTRUCTIONS — CURING ERROR.

Although an instruction standing alone may have been misleading, the verdict of the jury will not be disturbed on its account where the objection was removed by the giving of other consistent instructions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 705-718; Dec. Dig. § 296.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Cabell County.

Action by V. E. Hesson against the Penn Furniture Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Anderson, Strother & Hughes, for plaintiff in error. Holt & Duncan, for defendant in error.

ROBINSON, J. Plaintiff was employed in the furniture factory of defendant. While planing timber on a machine called a jointer, he was injured. The knives of the machine cut off parts of the thumb and two middle fingers of his right hand. He claims the injury was caused by defects in the machine, carelessly allowed by defendant. In this action for damages, based on the injury, a jury awarded plaintiff five hundred dollars, and the court rendered judgment on the verdict. Defendant seeks a reversal.

[1, 2] The demurrer to the declaration was rightly overruled. Each count is sufficient. The first count does not disclose contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff, as defendant insists. It does not show that the defects in the machine were so palpable that a man of ordinary prudence must have observed them. True, as to one of the alleged defects, the absence of a guard, it may be said that any man with eyesight could observe that the machine had no guard over the knives. Still, while one would observe that the machine had no guard, the necessity of such a contrivance in relation to the safe use of the machine would not necessarily be palpably presented. The second count is good under principles recently reviewed in Parfitt v. Veneer & Basket Co., 68 W. Va. 438, 69 S. E. 985. The insistence against its sufficiency is answered by the following: "If the servant * * * who has knowledge of defects in machinery gives notice thereof to the proper officer, and is promised that they shall be remedied, his subsequent use of it, in the well-grounded belief that it will be put in proper condition within a reasonable time, does not necessarily, or as matter of law, make him guilty of contributory negligence." Hough v. Railway Co., 100 U. S. 213, 25 L. Ed. 612.

The objections to some testimony that was admitted, and the exceptions to the refusal of some that was offered, urged in the brief for defendant, must be overruled. It suffices to say that we see no error in this regard. All this testimony related to the absence of a guard on the machine. That ground of the case was properly submitted for the determination of the jury. Plaintiff, however, presented another ground on which the verdict and judgment may safely rest. That ground is that defects other than the want of a guard existed and caused his injury. He made a case under the second count of the declaration. He showed that though he reported to defendant's representative in charge the fact that there was "something wrong" with the machine yet he continued to work with it under order of defendant to do so and a promise that the machine would be speedily repaired. He introduced evidence tending to establish that the failure of defendant to repair latent defects in the machine, other than the want of a guard thereon, caused his injury in a few hours after he returned to work relying on defendant's promise to repair. There is ample evidence to support the verdict on this feature of the case. Plaintiff presented relevant facts and circumstances justifying a finding in his favor under the following sound principle: "If the servant, having a right to abandon the service because it is dangerous, refrains from doing so in consequence of assurances that the danger shall be removed, the duty to remove the danger is manifest and imperative, and the master is not in the exercise of ordinary care unless or until he makes his assurances good. Moreover, the assurances remove all ground for the argument that the servant, by continuing the employment, engages to assume its risks." 2 Cooley on Torts (3d Ed.) 1157. Of course this rule does not apply where the danger is so obvious that a reasonably prudent man would not incur it. In the case at hand, however, there is no evidence tending to establish that the danger of continuing work with the jointer was so patent.

[3] The case was properly submitted to the jury. We find no error in the giving or in the refusing of instructions. Those that were denied to defendant were fairly and fully covered by others given on its behalf. All of defendant's theories of the case were plainly presented by instructions to the jury. The instructions given for plaintiff are proper ones under the facts of the case and the law applicable thereto. Numbers one and two have been criticised because they do not take into consideration the theory of contributory negligence. In the sense of directly mentioning contributory negligence, they do not take it into consideration. But they indeed do provide for that feature of the case. The first one makes a finding in favor of plaintiff to turn on the jury's believing that the defects in the machine were "the direct and proximate cause of the injury." Those defects could not be the direct and proximate cause if plaintiff was injured by his own contributory negligence. The second one makes a finding in plaintiff's favor to turn on the jury's believing that the injury was "a result of the failure of defendant to equip said machine with a proper guard." The injury could not be such result if plaintiff caused it himself. So, both instructions do recognize defendant's theory of contributory negligence. Both are binding instructions, and if they stood alone, we should say they would be much better with plain provision in them as to the question of contributory negligence. But instructions for defendant in the plainest terms cover all this ground of contributory negligence. They indeed made clear to the jury the terms we have quoted from these two of the instructions given for plaintiff. Defendant's instructions on the subject of contributory negligence provide against all misunderstanding of the terms employed in these two instructions for plaintiff. Taken together, the instructions for both sides presented the subject clearly to the jury, even if these two instructions alone did not do so. As much as may be argued against the two instructions for plaintiff which we have specially mentioned is, that, standing alone, they would tend to mislead the jury because they do not affirmatively recognize the theory of contributory negligence. In State v. Cottrill, 52 W. Va. 363, 43 S. E. 244, Judge Brannon commented on a situation analogous to the one under consideration. He said: "It has been often held that incompleteness in one instruction may be cured by another. State v. Prater (this term) 52 W. Va. 182, 43 S. E. 230, so holds. It is true we cannot say this where instructions are inconsistent, because they leave the way uncertain to the jury, Ward v. Ward, 47 W. Va. 706, 35 S. E. 873; but where both can co-exist, the one casting light on the other, each must have its effect, and both be considered like two statutes relating to the same matter; the one adds to the other. 'All instructions given are the instructions of the court regardless of who requests them, and are to be considered together.' Gray's Case, 92 Va. 772, 22 S. E. 858." Without doubt, these two instructions for plaintiff were made perfectly clear by defendant's instructions. While the former latently embraced consideration of contributory negligence, the latter, entirely consistent with the former, brought the subject plainly to the notice of the jury. We may indeed safely hold that, although an instruction standing alone may have been misleading, the verdict of the jury will not be disturbed on its account where the objection was removed by the giving of other consistent instructions. Russell Creek Coal Co. v. Wells, 96 Va. 416, 31 S. E. 614.

A thoughtful consideration of the record leads to an affirmance of the judgment. It will be so ordered.

On Petition for Rehearing.

ROBINSON, J. Defendant seeks a rehearing on the authority of Standard Oil Co. v. Helmick, 148 Ind. 457, 47 N. E. 14. It is true that the opinion in that case promulgates a doctrine, relative to the promise of the master to repair defective machinery, which is contrary to the well established rule affirmed by us in the foregoing opinion. But the Indiana court has expressly condemned Standard Oil Co. v. Helmick in the particular to which we refer. See McFarlan Carriage Co. v. Potter, 153 Ind. 117, 53 N. E. 465. This later case says that the former case cannot be accepted as authority on the point. And the later case directly sustains the very principle we apply in the case at hand.

BURKE v. JACKSON COUNTY COURT.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 19, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. HIGHWAYS (§ 193*)—DEFECTS—LIABILITY OF COUNTY—NOTICE OF DEFECT.

A county court is liable for injury to property of one using a highway arising from defect in it, though the defect is latent, and though the county court had no notice of defect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 487-490; Dec. Dig. § 193.*]

2. HIGHWAYS (§ 5*)—"PUBLIC ROAD."

A road used, controlled, and occupied as a public road by a county court is a "public road," within the meaning of Code 1906, c. 43, §§ 31 and 53.

Poffenbarger, J., dissenting.

Error to Circuit Court, Jackson County.

Action by G. O. Burke against the County Court of Jackson County. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

R. E. Hughes and John M. Baker, for plaintiff in error. W. F. Boggess and N. C. Prickitt, for defendant in error.

BRANNON, J. G. O. Burke brought action against the county court of Jackson county to recover for damage to a steam wheat thresher by the breaking down of a wooden culvert or bridge on a public road, and, having recovered verdict and judgment for $125, the county court brings the case to this court.

[2] Complaint is made for the overruling of a demurrer to the declaration. The defect alleged is that it does not sufficiently allege that the county court had opened, controlled, maintained, and treated the road as a public highway. The declaration alleges that when the accident occurred, and long before, the county court "used, worked, controlled, and occupied" said road and highway, and kept and maintained the wooden culvert over a ravine, and that it was a public road for all. This is a sufficient allegation to charge the county as for a public road. The Code, § 31, c. 43, says that every road used and occupied as a public road shall, in all courts, be deemed such whenever its establishment shall come in question. The charge is that the county used, occupied and worked the road. If so, it is a public road. Ball v. Cox, 29 W. Va. 407, 1 S. E. 673; Campbell v. Elkins, 58 W. Va. 308, 52 S. E. 220, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 159. Declaration good under those cases and Waggener v. Point Pleasant, 42 W. Va. 798, 26 S. E. 352.

Various exceptions are made because of exclusion of evidence. We find them not ground of error, especially as it does not appear what was to be proven. We have examined the instructions. We find no error in them. We think as a whole they laid before the jury fairly the contention of the two sides, the question of liability of the county, and that of contributory negligence. They contain no points of law not already discussed and settled. We see no utility in discussing settled law in every case in which it arises, causing delay in the administration of justice and public expense. In my own opinion, much of it could be dispensed with.

[1] The brief of the county's counsel argues that a county court is not liable absolutely for damage coming from defect in a road; that it is not liable for latent defect, and not liable without notice of defect. We understand that under Code, § 53, c. 43, the county is absolutely liable, if there is actionable defect. No matter that the defect is latent, or whether the county court knows of the defect or not. Campbell v. Elkins, 58 W. Va. 308, 52 S. E. 220, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 159; Arthur v. Charleston, 51 W. Va. 182, 41 S. E. 171; Yeager v. Bluefield, 40 W. Va. 484, 21 S. E. 752.

We affirm the judgment.

POFFENBARGER, J. (dissenting). I think the court should have set aside the verdict in this case. Desiring to cross the culvert with a traction engine several times heavier than the ordinary loads it was designed to carry, after having been notified that the culverts on the road were weak, the plaintiff drove the engine on it, without having taken any reasonable precaution against accident. The culvert was about 16 feet long and supported by log stringers about 8 inches in diameter. These stringers, old and de-cayed, were unsupported by any middle pillars of any sort. Advised of the weakness of the culverts on the road, he stopped the engine before attempting to cross this one and examined it, but made no careful or adequate examination thereof. His own testimony is that he merely looked at the stringers, found them covered with bark, and thought they were sound. He applied no test whatever. The stroke of an ax or hammer would have revealed the rottenness of the stringers, and fully disclosed the insufficiency of the culvert. Then he would have taken his engine through an adjacent field, or set some braces under the stringers before going on the culvert, and thus escaped the injury of which he complains. In view of these facts, I regard his attempt to cross the culvert as a plain and palpable assumption of risk, without legal necessity therefor.

I am also of the opinion that the court erred in giving plaintiff's instruction No. 4, telling the jury to find for the plaintiff, if the decayed condition of the stringers was the proximate cause of the injury, provided due caution and care were used in conducting the boiler and engine over the culvert. It embodies an unsound proposition which seems to have governed the trial, namely, that a traveler may unnecessarily assume a risk in the use of a defective highway, if he is careful in doing so. We have expressly condemned that theory in Shriver v. County Court, 66 W. Va. 685, 66 S. E. 1062, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 377. It was not enough that the plaintiff "used due care and caution in conducting his said engine and boiler over said culvert," it being insufficient to bear the burden by reason of its decayed stringers, but the court here told the jury it was. Having knowledge of such condition, or under a duty by reason of notice to make a reasonable investigation which would have revealed it, he was bound to go extra viam, if he could, or shore up the culvert to the point of safety, if he could do that by reasonable effort and without unreasonable delay. Shriver v. County Court, cited. This instruction wholly ignores that duty of the plaintiff; nor does any other given impose it.

Some were given which, in general and abstract terms, gave the defendant the benefit of the principle of contributory negligence; but they were so worded as to conceal the true application of it to the facts in the case. In other words, they do not modify the false proposition propounded in the one here analyzed. Thus defendant's instruction No. 6 tells the jury the plaintiff cannot recover, if, knowing the engine would probably break the culvert down, he did not "proceed with such boiler and engine with greater care and caution than would be required of him with lighter vehicles"; and defendant's instruction No. 8 that they should find for the defendant, if the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence "in not using ordinary care in proceeding along the public road in question, at the point therein complained of, with a traction boiler and engine." Under these, the jury were at liberty to find for the plaintiff, if they believed he exercised care in the matter of propelling his engine and none in any other respect. In other words, they were relieved from inquiry as to whether he knew the culvert was dangerous, or made a reasonable effort to ascertain the defect of which he undoubtedly had notice. He admits the road surveyor told him the culverts were all weak and likely to break down under his heavy engine, and furnished him two two-inch boards for use in passing over them, and also that he laid the boards aside and investigated this culvert only to the extent of looking at the stringers and seeing they still had bark on them. All this the jury could ignore under these two instructions, and were virtually directed to ignore by plaintiff's instruction No. 4.

The false proposition embraced in plaintiff's instruction No. 4, and not negated in any given for the defendant, was asserted in plaintiff's instruction No. 2, also, which reads as follows: "The court instructs the jury that, if they believe from the evidence in this case that the traction engine and boiler which the plaintiff was propelling along the public highway when the bridge broke, as alleged in the declaration in this case, was of ordinary weight for such engines, it was not necessary for him (plaintiff) to carry with him boards or planks to be used for the purpose of strengthening the culverts or bridges which he should pass over with his engine and boiler, in order to enable him to recover in this case, and that as to whether or not the engine and boiler which plaintiff was propelling, as aforesaid, was an engine and boiler of ordinary weight, such as is propelled along the highways of this county, the jury are the judges from the evidence in the case." In saying plaintiff was under no duty to carry boards with him, this instruction may be correct, but it carries by implication the unsound proposition we have been discussing. Its common-sense construction is that the plaintiff was under no duty to attempt to avoid injury, otherwise than by carefully moving his engine, however defective the culvert, and however thoroughly he knew it. In correctly telling the jury he need not carry certain boards to strengthen defective culverts, the court incorrectly relieved the plaintiff of all duty respecting a bald defect, except to drive carefully in attempting to get over it.

Plaintiff's instruction No. 3 carries the same vice. It reads as follows: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the traction engine and boiler of the plaintiff which was injured was of such weight as it was usual to propel over the roads of Jackson county, and that at the time the injury to the same occurred, the plaintiff was propelling the same with the use of due care and diligence, and was not negligent, but that the proximate cause of the injury to said engine was the decayed condition of the timbers in the bridge mentioned in the evidence, then they should find for the plaintiff such damages as they may consider the evidence shows him entitled to recover." The phrase "not negligent" leaves the false direction of this instruction in full force, since it is not defined. It means not negligent in merely propelling the engine.

The reasons here expressed constrain me to dissent.

Note by BRANNON, J. I make this note to say that no knowledge or notice to Burke of defect in the bridge was brought home to Burke. Nobody knew of any defect. His machine being heavy, the surveyor told him to be careful in going over it and to examine it. Burke did examine it, and thought it sufficient. Another man told Burke to be careful. That is all the notice he had.

2. TRIAL (§ 194*) — QUESTIONS FOR JURY — CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES.

It is proper for the trial court, by instructions to the jury, to tell them that they are the judges of the weight and credibility that should be given the testimony of witnesses, but not what effect, if any, should be given by them thereto.

interest in his land taken by plaintiff, and damages to the residue, is, on the evidence adduced on the trial in this case, tested by the rule of prior decisions governing the same, grossly excessive, and the judgment of the court thereon is set aside and a new trial awarded.

Error to Circuit Court, Wayne County.

Action by the Cincinnati Gas Transportation Company against G. L. Wilson and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Simms, Enslow, Fitzpatrick & Baker and Geo. J. McComas, for plaintiff in error. Campbell, Brown & Davis and W. W. Marcum, for defendants in error.

MILLER, J. Plaintiff, alleging its right to construct, maintain and operate a pipe line on, through and upon the lands of defendant and others, and to take by condemnation such lands as may reasonably be necessary for the purpose of laying therein suitable pipes and constructing thereon suitable telephone or telegraph lines for the successful and proper operation thereof, declares in its petition its purpose to take, not an absolute fee simple therein, but such an interest in the lands of defendant and others, as under the statute and laws of this state it has the right to take, namely, the right or right of way to lay such pipe lines and to construct such necessary telephone and telegraph lines on and through said lands as may be necessary for the proper conduct of its business, and to this end to erect poles thereon and to have the right of ingress and egress for the purpose of constructing, maintaining and repairing and otherwise fully operating said pipe lines.

The commissioners reported, that in their opinion seven hundred dollars would be a just compensation to defendant for the interest which the petitioner proposed to take in his land. Their report was excepted to by both parties, and each demanded that the question of compensation to the landowner for the real estate proposed to be taken, as well as damages to the residue thereof, beyond the peculiar benefits which may be derived in respect to such residue from the work to be constructed, be submitted to a jury of twelve freeholders; and on the trial the jury impaneled were duly sworn "to well and truly ascertain what will be a just compensation for so much of the real estate as is proposed to be taken by the applicant in this case, as well as for the damages, if any, to the residue of said real estate beyond the peculiar benefits, if any, which will be derived in respect to such residue from the work to be constructed, or from the purposes to which the part to be taken by the applicant is to be appropriated, and a true verdict render according to the evidence"; the defendant thereby assuming the burden of proof upon the exceptions to the commissioners' report.

On the trial the jury found for defendant damages to the amount of fourteen hundred dollars, and for which the court below gave him judgment.

[1] By objection to the form of the issue and to the oath administered to the jury; by exceptions and objections to certain parts of the evidence of defendants' witnesses, and by instructions proposed to the jury, which were rejected by the court, all preserved to it on the record by sundry bills of exceptions, defendant has presented, as one of the principal questions for decision here, whether under the statute laws and constitution of this state, a landowner whose land is to be condemned for public use, and less than a fee simple is to be taken, is entitled to "damages to the residue of the tract beyond the peculiar benefits to be derived, in respect to such residue from the work to be constructed." It is contended in argument that that provision of our statute, section 14 of chapter 42, Code 1906, giving such damages, is applicable only where a fee simple estate is condemned, and not where less than a fee is taken. This argument is predicated on a comparison of that portion of said section 14, giving such damages, with that portion of section 18 of said chapter, providing that: "When less than a fee is taken, in assessing damages, the commissioners and jury shall take into consideration the actual damage that is done or that may be done to the fee by such construction." It is contended that "damages . . . to the fee" authorized by this statute are limited, by proper construction, to the fee in that portion of the land, in, upon, under or over which the right of way or easement less than a fee is condemned, and that no matter what damages the owner may actually sustain to the residue of his land or the fee in the whole tract, the statute awards him no damages therefor, and that none can lawfully be assessed. This argument is attempted to be further fortified by reference to that provision of said section 14, relating to the manner of assessing damages by commissioners, where the fee simple is to be taken, which rule section 17 of said chapter makes applicable on the trial of an issue before a jury, which is: "Shall ascertain what will be a just compensation to the person entitled thereto for so much thereof as is proposed to be taken, and for damage to the residue of the tract, beyond the peculiar benefits to be derived, in respect to such residue, from the work to be constructed." The argument is, that the rule for assessing damages contained in the provision of said section 18, quoted, differing in language from said section 14, in not providing for first ascertaining a just compensation for the land actually taken, and then damages to the residue less peculiar benefits, impliedly, if not in express terms, limits the damages recoverable when less than a fee is taken to damages to the fee in the land actually covered by the right of way or interest less than the fee, and gives nothing for damages suffered by the owner to the residue. We can not agree to this construction of the statute.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

A preceding and pertinent clause of said section 18, not noticed by counsel for petitioner is: "A * * * company organized for the purpose of transporting * * * natural gas * * * by means of pipes or otherwise, and desiring to construct its pipe lines, may as to all or any part of the real estate sought to be taken for that purpose describe, in its application an estate or interest therein less than a fee, and with respect to the same may proceed as in other cases; and upon payment therefor, such estate and interest as is stated and described in the application shall vest in the applicant." Section 18, chapter 42, Code Suppl. 1909. Then follows the clause relied on by plaintiff's counsel. The clause just quoted and by its words, "proceed as in other cases," clearly refers to sections 14 and 18, and to the rule of section 14 for measuring damages; and requires that that rule shall apply and in the same way, when less than a fee is taken as when the fee is condemned, and that damages less special benefits to the residue, including the fee in the tract covered by the right of way or easement actually taken shall also be added. Unless we give these statutes this construction, as counsel for defendant suggest, we would be obliged to declare the statutes void for infraction of that provision of the constitution saying: "Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation."

Not only is this construction required by reason, but authority also justifies it. Thornton on Oil and Gas, section 361, says: "The courts will presume that it is a damage to land to conduct a pipe line through it, without any evidence of that fact. In determining the amount of damages, both present and future damages may be recovered. The measure of damages in the appropriation of a right of way is the actual value of the land appropriated and any injury to the residue." And in Indiana, construing statutes substantially like ours, the Appellate Court says: "The object, therefore, of the legislature in passing the act we are now considering was to provide landowners a just and adequate compensation for damages incident to the construction of pipe lines, etc., over and across their lands. Such compensation must be measured by the actual damages to the freehold occasioned by such construction, including the land appropriated and occupied, and the relation of the remaining land thereto." Manufacturers', etc., Co. v. Leslie, 22 Ind. App. 677, 51 N. E. 510.

In Pennsylvania, in an action by a landowner against a gas company, for injuries due to negligence in the operation of a pipe line through his land, it was held that as he was entitled to be compensated for the depreciation in the market value of his farm due to the location, construction and operation of a skillfully and carefully operated pipe line through the same, and that such damages must necessarily have been considered and compensated for in the proceedings for the assessment of such damages, nevertheless, damages caused by negligence in the operation of said pipe line could not be regarded as having been included and compensated for in such prior proceedings, and that plaintiff was entitled to recover therefor, in the absence of evidence that the alleged acts of negligence were consistent with proper construction, and not the result of negligent operation of said pipe line. We are of opinion, therefore, that there was no error in overruling the objection of petitioner to the form of oath administered to the jury, nor in rejecting its instructions numbered one, two, six and twelve; nor in overruling certain objections to the evidence of certain witnesses predicated on a different theory.

[2] Petitioner next complains of the rejection of its instruction number eight. It proposed to tell the jury in substance, that a witness who only knew defendants' land by having gone over the proposed right of way once, and was not acquainted with the market value of said land, or of land of similar character in the same neighborhood, was not a competent witness, and that the opinion of any such witness should be disregarded by the jury in arriving at their verdict. By petitioner's instruction number five, given, the court properly instructed the jury on the weight and credibility that should be given by them to the testimony of witnesses, considering their knowledge of the land, its character, quantity, fertility and its relation to the proposed pipe line to be constructed on or under the same, and in the light of the ownership of lands; but by instruction number eight it was proposed to tell the jury that they should wholly disregard, and accord no weight to the opinion of a witness if he had only gone over the right of way proposed to be taken once, and was not acquainted with the market value of lands in the same neighborhood. According to the brief of counsel this instruction was more particularly directed to the evidence of the witness Stender. This witness, though residing some six miles from defendant's land, testified that he did know the market value of this land, that he had dealt in lands all over the state, and though he did not instance any particular sale or sales of land in the same vicinity, yet he had discussed values with others, and had his opinion as to values, based on experience and observation, and of the value of defendant's land, though he had not gone over it all and did not know the exact location of the lines. We think this knowledge qualified him to give his opinion. Its weight and credibility was for the jury, as they were told by said instruction number five. Instruction number eight was therefore properly rejected. Harman & Crockett v. Maddy Bros., 57 W. Va. 66, 72, 49 S. E. 1009.

[3] The next question to be considered is, was the verdict excessive? On the whole evidence before the jury we think it clearly was. The commissioners who had gone upon the land awarded defendant but seven hundred dollars. The highest price put upon the land covered by the proposed right of way, mostly through bottom land, was one hundred dollars per acre. The boundary covered thereby is but 4.38 acres. The aggregate assessed value of the three tracts constituting defendant's farm is $3,570.00. The farm is largely hill land. All witnesses for defendant, remarkable to say, concurred in their opinion that $2,000.00, would be a just compensation to defendant for the land or interest therein proposed to be taken and damages to the residue, but not one, so far as we see, was able to or did give his opinion, as to the value of the land before as compared with the value thereof after the appropriation of the right of way by the gas company. As was said by this court in Kay v. Glade Creek & R. R. Co., 47 W. Va. 479, 35 S. E. 978, a witness "may not express his mere naked opinion of the amount of damages caused by the work, but must state his opinion of the value of the land before and after the construction of the railroad, in connection with the facts and circumstances relative to the land flowing from the construction of the railroad." The testimony of all the witnesses in the case violates this rule. This rule, alluded to in the case just cited, and laid down in prior and subsequent decisions, as interpreted in Morrison v. Traction Co., 60 W. Va. 441, 448, 55 S. E. 669, and Guyandot Valley R. Co. v. Buskirk, 57 W. Va. 417, 50 S. E. 521, 110 Am. St. Rep. 785, is the test by which damages must be assessed. As these later cases hold, the rule must not be so interpreted as to charge the landowner with benefits common to the public in general, but with special benefits only, accruing to him by the proposed work. This is especially made clear in Railroad Co. v. Buskirk, supra, where the railroad company was proposing to take the whole of defendant's land, leaving no residue. But with due regard to the rule, as thus interpreted, it seems to us no data were given by any of these witnesses, on which to support their mere naked opinions, that defendant's land would be damaged $2,000.00. These opinions are all there is in the evidence to support the verdict. The jury did not personally view the premises. If they had done so, though their verdict could not stand, on the evidence alone, we might not be warranted in disturbing it. Railroad Co. v. Buskirk, supra, 57 W. Va. 480, 50 S. E. 521, 110 Am. St. Rep. 785. Viewing the case as presented our conclusion is that the verdict is excessive, and not warranted by the evidence, and that the judgment thereon for this reason ought to be set aside, and a new trial awarded, and it will be so ordered.

CINCINNATI GAS TRANSP. CO. v. KRESS et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 20, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

CONDEMNATION PROCEEDINGS.

For syllabus, see Gas Transp. Co. v. Wilson, 73 S. E. 806, this term.

Error to Circuit Court, Wayne County.

Action by the Cincinnati Gas Transportation Company against John Kress and others to condemn right of way. From the judgment, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Simms, Enslow, Fitzpatrick & Baker and Geo. J. McComas, for plaintiff in error.

BRANNON, J. The Cincinnati Gas Transportation Company instituted a proceeding in the circuit court of Wayne county seeking condemnation of a strip of land, of the width of 30 feet, out of a tract of 152 acres owned by John Kress, for laying an underground pipe line for conveyance of oil or gas, and for the erection of telegraph or telephone poles. The parcel sought to be condemned contains 1.21 acres. The commissioners of the court to assess compensation reported $300 as compensation. A jury having been asked, it found the sum of $750 as compensation, and, the court having rendered judgment for that sum, the company brings the case to this court.

We are of opinion that the sum of $750 as compensation for the small piece of land to be condemned is grossly excessive. We hesitate not to say that, whilst there are some arbitrary opinions which go to justify such finding, the evidence adduced by the defendant himself, when examined in detail, and considering the valuation of lands near by, and the per acre valuation of this tract, and other circumstances, show this valuation to be excessive. The tract in 1905 was assessed by the official assessor at $8 per acre for the land, and $11 an acre for land including improvements, making the total tract value $1,584. Kress himself puts the total valuation at the time he gave his evidence at $6,000 for the whole tract, and yet demands $750 for an acre and one-fifth, for only an easement. Remember that only an easement for an underground pipe 127 rods long and a few telephone poles will exist under this condemnation. The corpus or body of the land is not taken. The fee of the body or corpus of the land remains in Kress. He can use it for all purposes of agriculture, subject only to the right of repair in the company, which will likely not be often needed. I suppose the company could not fence off the strip of land. And I suppose that the company would have right only of repair, and such legitimate use as would be reasonable, considering the nature of such use, and that its power could not be arbitrarily used to the hurt of Kress. It would be the case of mutual rights by the two parties, and the law would say, I suppose, that each must exercise his rights reasonably and consistently with the rights of the other. The principles stated in the case of Cincinnati Gas Transp. Company v. Wilson, 73 S. E. 306 decided this term, apply to and rule this case.

Our conclusion is to reverse the judgment, set aside the verdict, grant a new trial, and remand the cause to the circuit court.

CARTY v. CARTY.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 19, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. DIVORCE (§ 63*)—GROUNDS—DESEPTION.

A wife, deserted by the husband without cause at the marital domicile in another state, may acquire in good faith a separate domicile in this state and under our laws obtain a divorce on the ground of desertion, though the husband is a non-resident and is only constructively served by publication.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. § 217; Dec. Dig. § 63.*]

2. DIVORCE (§ 63*)—GROUNDS.

Where the plaintiff in a suit for divorce has been actually and in good faith domiciled in this state for one year next preceding the bringing of the suit, it is no valid reason against granting the relief that the original marriage status was in another state, or that the cause for which the divorce is sought arose outside of the state, or that the defendant is a non-resident and only constructively notified.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Brooke County.
Bill by Nettle Carty against Hugh Carty.
Decree for defendant, and complainant appeals. Reversed.

R. L. Ramsey and J. A. Gist, for appellant.

ROBINSON, J. Plaintiff and defendant were married in this state. They took up a domicile in Ohio. After residing together there for a short time, plaintiff returned to this state for a holiday visit with her mother. While making this visit, she received a letter from defendant notifying her that he was forwarding her clothes and announcing his intention to desert her. She returned to the domicile in Ohio, but the house was empty. Defendant had sold the household effects and departed. He had left no word as to his whereabouts. Plaintiff returned to the home of her mother in this state, where she has since resided continuously, supporting herself as a mill worker. In all that time, more than three years, plaintiff has never seen defendant. Plaintiff, in the county of her residence in this state, sought a divorce from the bonds of matrimony, on the ground of defendant's desertion, proceeding against defendant, a non-resident, by order of publication. The circuit court denied the relief prayed. The decree expressly states that relief is denied because it appears from the evidence "that the ground of action arose outside of the state"; that jurisdiction was obtained only by constructive service; that defendant is a non-resident; and "that the marriage status was outside the state."

Plaintiff sufficiently alleges and proves that she has resided in this state for more than one year next preceding the time of bringing her suit; that defendant wilfully deserted her, without justifiable cause; and that the desertion has continued for more than three years. Ordinarily the case would warrant a decree of absolute divorce. Do the reasons assigned by the court below justify its refusal of a decree?

[1] Plaintiff became a bona fide resident of this state after defendant deserted her. Through the necessity of her situation, she came here to live. It was natural that she should return to her old home when she found herself an abandoned wife. There is not a word of evidence from which it can be inferred that she merely came to this state to seek a divorce. The circumstances all negative any such intention on her part. She returned to this state, again to become one of its citizens, because the desertion of her husband enforced upon her the necessity of leaving strangers and seeking refuge in a native land among friends. Having in the best of faith become a resident of this state, plaintiff is entitled to the protection of the laws made for the good order and well being of its people.

To such a citizen as plaintiff has become, the statutes of the state vouchsafe right to the relief she asks. Any one who has in good faith resided in the state for more than a year is entitled to seek a divorce under its laws. Hear the statute: "The circuit court on the chancery side thereof shall have jurisdiction of suits for annulling or affirming marriages, or for divorces. No such suit shall be maintainable, unless the parties, or one of them, shall have resided in the state one year next preceding the time of bringing such suit. The suit shall be brought in the county in which the parties last cohabited, or (at the option of the plaintiff) in the county in which the defendant resides, if a resident of this state; but If not, then in the county in which the plaintiff resides. Such suit may be brought and prosecuted by the wife in her own name, without a next friend, and a decree may be rendered in the case upon the publication of the summons and statement as provided in chapter one hundred and twenty-four of this Code." Code 1906, ch. 64, sec. 7. By another section, it is provided that a divorce from the bonds of matrimony may be decreed to the party abandoned "where either party wilfully abandons or deserts the other for three years." Code 1906, ch. 64, sec. 5. These statutes have been enacted for the protection and welfare of our people. Any one domiciled within the borders of the state for the time required may avail himself of the efficacy of these provisions of law. For the welfare of the society of which he has become a member, he may by these laws promote his status as such member of society. At least one of the parties to a divorce suit must have resided within the state for the period of one year next before the suit is brought. But, by the very terms of the statute, both parties need not reside in the state to justify the pendency of the suit. The statute plainly contemplates that a resident plaintiff may sue a non-resident defendant. It says a plaintiff may sue in the county of his own residence when the defendant is a non-resident. Provision is made for constructive service by publication.

Plaintiff returned to this state bringing with her the status of a married woman. When she acquired a new domicile here, that status pertained to the domicile. It is on that status that the suit for divorce, under the laws of the domicile, acts. When she sued for divorce, the marriage status was not outside the state, as the lower court held. As to plaintiff, that status was with her in this jurisdiction, subject to the operation and effect of our laws. "The right of any state to declare the status of its own domiciled subject is absolute. Without this right, no ruler could be a sovereign in his own dominions. And both in reason and by the highest judicial authority in our country, this doctrine applies as well to a husband or wife whose married partner is permanently abiding in another state, as to both parties when living together in the same state." 2 Bishop on Marriage, Divorce, and Separation, sec. 138.

But may the wife acquire a domicile distinct from that of the husband? Most assuredly so under the circumstances of this case. Would it not be preposterous to say that plaintiff must seek the unknown whereabouts of her neglectful husband and sue for divorce where he has established a domicile, or must sit down alone at the place of joint marital domicile—an empty house in a strange land—awaiting the return of the deserting husband for a long period fixed by law, and then sue for divorce there? When a wife is deserted without cause, she may go where reason and necessity dictate and there establish a domicile distinct from the offending husband's domicile. In reason, she cannot be required to follow the offender or to remain always where he left her. Indeed our statutes make plain the right of a wife to have a domicile in this state separate from that of her husband for the purpose of jurisdiction in obtaining divorce. "If, when a statute authorizes a wife to bring an ordinary suit against her husband, it by interpretation includes the needful collateral rights, among which is the right to have a separate domicile therefor, the same reason applies also, and with added force, to a suit which a statute permits her to bring against him for divorce." 2 Bishop, sec. 116. "While the matrimonial domicile of the wife is usually that of the husband, yet if he is guilty of misconduct entitling her to a divorce, she may leave him and acquire a new residence in another state." 14 Cyc. 818. The principle enunciated in these texts is now generally recognized by text writers and adjudicated cases. Nelson on Divorce and Separation, sec. 46; Barber v. Barber, 21 How. 582, 16 L. Ed. 226; Cheever v. Wilson, 9 Wall. 108, 19 L. Ed. 604. In the celebrated case of Haddock v. Haddock, 201 U. S. 562, 26 Sup. Ct. 525, 50 L. Ed. 887, the Supreme Court of the United States again clearly recognizes that a wife may have a separate domicile in a state other than that which is the domicile of her husband, and may there obtain a divorce if the case she presents justifies her maintenance of such separate domicile and her right to a severance of the marriage bond.

We have shown that our statutes provide for the granting of a divorce to one domiciled here, though the other party is a non-resident served only with constructive process by publication. It is not now pertinent to discuss the extraterritorial operation or validity of a divorce so granted. Plaintiff is entitled to a divorce so granted, and such divorce will avail her in this state. The fact that foreign jurisdictions may not credit the decree is no reason against granting it. In this state the decree will be valid, subject of course to the right of defendant to appear and re-open the case within the time fixed by law. "Where a court in one state, conformably to the laws of such state, or the state through its legislative department, has acted concerning the dissolution of the marriage tie, as to a citizen of that state, such action is binding in that state as to such citizen, and the validity of the judgment may not therein be questioned on the ground that the action of the state in dealing with its own citizen concerning the marriage relation was repugnant to the due process clause of the Constitution." Keezer on Marriage and Divorce, page 462; Maynard v. Hill, 125 U. S. 190, 8 Sup. Ct. 723, 31 L. Ed. 654; Haddock v. Haddock, supra.

[2] Nor is the fact that the desertion took place in another state a valid reason against decreeing a divorce to plaintiff. She has shown that she is a deserted wife. What matter where the desertion took place? Her status as a resident of this state is the same as it would have been had the desertion taken place here. We have seen that our laws may operate to effect that status, because plaintiff is a citizen of the state—a subject of our government. Besides, our divorce statutes make no distinction as to the place of the arising of the ground for which a divorce may be granted. The place of the marriage, the domicile at the time of the offense, and the place where the offense was committed, are all immaterial in a divorce suit under the existing laws of this state, so far as jurisdiction to maintain the suit is concerned. It is the domicile of one or both of the parties in this state, at the time of suit, that gives jurisdiction under our statutes. No other basis of jurisdiction is fixed. In this particular, our law is in accord with that generally recognized in the American states. Years ago, Justice Story announced: "The doctrine now firmly established in America upon the subject of divorce is, that the law of the place of the actual bona fide domicile of the parties gives jurisdiction to the proper courts to decree a divorce for any cause allowed by the local law, without any reference to the law of the place of the original marriage, or the place where the offense for which the divorce is allowed was committed." Conflict of Laws, sec. 230 a. The following authorities are also in point: 2 Bishop, chapter 2, also sections 160, 164, 174; Nelson on Divorce and Separation, secs. 22, 23, 24, 25, 128; 14 Cyc. 589, 590, 591.

We must reverse the decree of the circuit court and enter here the decree that the circuit court should have entered—a decree annulling the bonds of matrimony between plaintiff and defendant.

SALINGER v. NORTH AMERICAN WOOLLEN MILLS CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 19, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 393*)—PAROL EVIDENCE AFFECTING WRITINGS—LEASE.

As a general rule a written lease of land becomes the repository of the contract, all preceding negotiations becoming consummated in it, and in the absence of fraud or mistake, it is the controlling evidence of the terms and conditions upon which the property was demised.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1736-1744; Dec. Dig. § 393.*]

2. LICENSES (§ 58*)—REAL PROPERTY—REVOCABILITY OF LICENSE.

The knowledge of a landlord, or of one of his tenants, and his or their acquiescence in the use by another tenant, without consideration, of the outside walls of a portion of the building not enclosing the part occupied by or leased to him, but leased to and occupied by another tenant, amounts simply to a revocable license, revocable at pleasure by the licensor, whether such licensor be the landlord or a tenant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Licenses, Cent. Dig. §§ 116-120; Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

3. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 123*)—USE OF PREMISES—SIGNS ON WALLS.

The lessee of a store room, unless restrained by the terms of his lease, has the exclusive right to the use of the outside walls of that portion of the building covered by his lease, for advertising signs, to the exclusion of a lessee of another part of the same building, but he has no right to occupy with such signs or for any purpose the outside walls not enclosing his part of the leased premises.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 435, 436; Dec. Dig. § 123.*]

4. LICENSES (§ 59*)—REAL PROPERTY—REVOCATION OF LICENSE—AUTHORITY OF LESSEE.

The rule giving right to the owner of a fee to revoke at pleasure a mere license to another to occupy his land, or any portion thereof, is equally applicable to his lessee, where such lessee is the licensor, unless the latter be restrained by the terms of his lease from granting such license.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Licenses, Cent. Dig. §§ 121, 122; Dec. Dig. § 59.*]

5. LICENSES (§ 62*)—REAL PROPERTY—REVOCATION OF LICENSE—ACTS CONSTITUTING.

As a general rule a mere license is terminated by any act of the licensor which evinces an intention to revoke it, such as a conveyance or contract inconsistent with the continued enjoyment of the license.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Licenses, Cent. Dig. § 125; Dec. Dig. § 62.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wood County.

Bill in equity by Gus Salinger against the North American Woollen Mills Company and others. From a decree for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John F. Laird, D. C. Casto, and Dorr Casto, for appellant. Thomas Coleman and Merrick & Smith, for appellees.

MILLER, J. Plaintiff, on bill filed, obtained an injunction restraining defendants and all other persons, from "destroying, removing, painting over, interfering with, or in any wise molesting, defacing, or changing the painted advertisement and signs" placed by him on the front outer walls of the upper stories of the store building occupied by him on Court Square in the city of Parkersburg.

On bill, answers of defendants, and affidavits filed on behalf of plaintiff the court, in vacation, on motion of defendants dissolved the injunction, and plaintiff has appealed.

Plaintiff is lessee under Strong, the owner of the building, of the store room occupied by him, while defendants, Kinney & Carroll, are lessees of the two upper stories of the same building. Plaintiff first entered in October, 1907, as assignee of Rauch, a prior lessee. Subsequently, on April 1, 1908, the date of the expiration of the Rauch lease, pursuant to agreement, Salinger obtained from Strong, a new lease for five years, on the terms of the old, with privilege of an additional term of five years. Following this new lease, Strong, by agreement with plaintiff, built an addition in the rear, and on October 1, 1908, the prior lease of April 1, was surrendered, and a second lease, covering the new addition, on the terms of the first, except that the rent was increased from sixty to one hundred dollars per month, was executed.

The grounds of relief alleged are, not that plaintiff's lease, in terms, gave him any right to occupy the front walls of the upper stories of the building with his signs, but that prior to purchasing the lease from Rauch, and as an inducement thereto, Strong agreed that he might paint signs on said walls; and that Kinney & Carroll, tenants of the upper stories, and who had been such tenants for many years prior to plaintiff's purchase of the Rauch lease, had also consented thereto; and that before occupying said store room with his stock of goods, he had actually painted said signs on said upper walls, as they were at the time of filing his bill, and that he was so occupying said walls with his signs to the knowledge and acquiescence of Strong, and the knowledge and acquiescence of Kinney & Carroll, when Strong executed to him, the two leases of April 1, and October 1, 1908, and when in August, 1910, the North American Woolen Mills Co., or Boso its manager, claiming the right by contract with said Kinney & Carroll, and with Strong the landlord, undertook to enter and paint out said signs, and occupy said walls with signs advertising the business of said Woolen Mills Company, and for which he sought to enjoin them.

The answer of Strong denies the alleged agreement, and denies that the subject of so occupying said upper walls with signs was ever mentioned by plaintiff prior or subsequent to plaintiff's purchase of the Rauch lease. His only admission is that some time after he executed the lease of April 1, 1908, plaintiff said to him that he was going to paint the upper walls, but that no mention was then or at any time made about painting signs thereon. He admits knowledge that plaintiff had painted signs on these walls, but he disclaims the right, as against Kinney & Carroll, his upper tenants, to authorize plaintiff to so occupy said walls, and he denies that he ever undertook to do so. He says he had no objection, if Kinney & Carroll had none, to plaintiff's use of said walls; and the latter, while denying any agreement with plaintiff that he might so occupy said walls, say they were not disposed to annoy or interfere with plaintiff in such use, so long as they had no opportunity to otherwise occupy said walls; but that having had opportunity in August, 1910, to lease said walls at a profit they had executed the contract to Boso for his Woolen Mills Company, and they denied any right in plaintiff by contract, license or otherwise to longer occupy said walls with his signs.

While admitting said signs may be of value to plaintiff, all the answers deny any alleged intention to injure him or his business, in making the contract with Boso, or that depriving him of the use of said walls for his signs will have that effect.

No evidence was offered in support of the bill, except the ex parte affidavit of plaintiff himself, to the effect that on August 20, 1910, M. Carroll, of the firm of Kinney & Carroll, had said to him that his firm had been compelled to sign the contract with Boso, for fear that if they did not do so Strong, the landlord, would require them to vacate the building, and that he, Carroll, personally did not then or at any time lay claim to any right to use said front walls for display signs or the right to lease the same to any body else, and that he would not have signed the contract with Boso, except for the threat of Strong and Boso to cancel their lease, a lease from month to month.

On this state of the pleadings and proofs, was the injunction properly dissolved? That a moral wrong may possibly be inflicted on plaintiff may be admitted. But the rights of plaintiff to longer occupy said walls with his signs, depend solely on the nature of that right.

[1] It is conceded that his lease does not in terms give him such right, and we must say from the record, that he had no contract resting in parol, either with Strong, the landlord, or with Kinney & Carroll, the upper tenants, to so occupy said upper walls with his signs, for the allegations of his bill, as to any such contract or agreement are denied by the answers, and there is no proof thereof. The rights of the plaintiff, therefore, rest solely upon the fact that Strong, and Kinney & Carroll knew of plaintiff's use of said walls, and for so long a time did not object thereto. We do not see how this knowledge of Strong, at the time he executed the leases to plaintiff can in any way affect the rights of the American Woolen Mills Company or Boso, under their contract with Kinney & Carroll, the upper tenants. The written lease from Strong to Salinger became the repository of plaintiff's contract, and all preceding negotiations were consummated in it, and it furnishes the controlling evidence, in the absence of fraud or mistake, of the terms and conditions upon which the property was demised. Jones on Landlord and Tenant, section 132. This is an elementary principle of contracts.

[2] It is contended by counsel for defendants that the acquiescence of Strong, and of Kinney & Carroll, in the use of said walls by plaintiff, amounted to a mere license, revocable at pleasure, and not to an easement. This proposition seems well founded in law. 2 Minor Inst. 22; Mumford v. Whitney, 15 Wend. (N. Y.) 380, 30 Am. Dec. 68; Lowell v. Strahan, 145 Mass. 1, 12 N. E. 401, 1 Am. St. Rep. 422. The proposition is particularly applicable where the license appertains to the occupancy of outside walls for advertising signs. Jones on Landlord and Tenant, section 40.

[3] The question then is, who had the right to give such license? If Kinney & Carroll, the upper tenants, had the right to control the use of the outer walls of that portion of the building occupied by them, they alone had the right to give the privilege or license to plaintiff, and no act of Strong could bind them, unless they had knowledge thereof and approved or acquiesced therein. Their answer is a denial of any knowledge of Strong's action or contract with plaintiff, and asserts their right to the use of said outer walls, and their legal right to contract the use thereof to the Woolen Mills Company. It is well settled also that a lessee has the exclusive right to the use of the outside walls of the portion of the building covered by his lease, to the exclusion of a lessee of another part of the same building, and has no right to use for any purpose, any portion of the outside walls not enclosing his part of the premises. 1 Underhill on Landlord and Tenant, section 277. And this rule applies to the use of such walls for signs. Jones on Landlord and Tenant, section 108; 24 Cyc. 1047; Riddle v. Littlefield, 53 N. H. 503, 16 Am. Rep. 388. Our conclusion, therefore, is that Kinney & Carroll, and not Strong, had the right to control the outer walls of the upper stories of the building occupied by plaintiff. They were tenants thereof when plaintiff obtained his lease; he was charged with notice of their rights. He does not claim to have had any contract with them, and having undertaken to occupy these walls, without agreement with them, he did so at his peril.

[4] Was the license of Kinney & Carroll revocable by them? Mr. Minor, 2 Minor's Inst., 22, says: "A license is sometimes revocable, namely, where if it is countermanded, it leaves the party in statu quo." And Mr. Jones says: "A mere license, unaccompanied with any vested interest in the real estate, created by deed or other writing, and independent of any title acquired by grant, prescription or adverse possession and claim for a period of the statute of limitations, must be deemed to be, in its own nature, countermandable, and essentially revocable at the will of the owner of the fee." Jones on Landlord and Tenant, section 37. But when the owner of the fee is not the licensor, we think the rule is equally applicable to a tenant, unless restrained by the terms of his lease from granting such license. This latter proposition we think fully supported by Riddle v. Littlefield and Lowell v. Strahan, supra. The license of Kinney & Carroll, having been without consideration, they could revoke it at any time. Harris v. Brown, 202 Pa. 16, 51 Atl. 586, 90 Am. St. Rep. 612; Lawrence v. Springer, 49 N. J.

Eq. 289, 24 Atl. 933, 81 Am. St. Rep. 713; Pifer v. Brown, 43 W. Va. 412, 27 S. E. 399, 49 L. R. A. 497.

[5] The remaining question is, did Kinney & Carroll revoke the license? The general rule is that a license is terminated by any act of the licensor which shows an intention to revoke it, such as a conveyance, or contract inconsistent with the continued enjoyment of the license. 18 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 1141; note to Pifer v. Brown, supra, 49 L. R. A. 497, and cases cited. The agreement in writing of Kinney & Carroll with the defendant Boso, giving to him the privilege of using said walls is sufficient evidence, according to these authorities, of their intention to revoke the license to plaintiff.

We are of opinion, therefore, that the injunction was properly dissolved. The material allegations of the bill having been fully, fairly, plainly, distinctly and positively denied in the sworn answers, and not proven, it was the duty of the court, on motion of the defendants, to dissolve the injunction. Cox v. Douglass, 20 W. Va. 175; Schoonover v. Bright, 24 W. Va. 698; Kester v. Alexander, 47 W. Va. 329, 34 S. E. 819; Crossland v. Crossland, 53 W. Va. 114, 44 S. E. 424. The decree below must, therefore, be affirmed.

COUCH v. EASTHAM.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 14, 1911. Rehearing Denied
Jan. 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. DOWER (§ 12*)—PROPERTY SUBJECT—"ESTATE OF INHERITANCE."

Where one is seized of an estate in land that is limited only on his dying without lawful children, the estate, being one that can pass to heirs if lawful children are born, is an "estate of inheritance" in which his widow is dowerable though it expire by failure of issue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dower, Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 3, pp. 2490, 2491.]

2. DOWER (§ 12*)—ESTATES AND INTERESTS SUBJECT TO—RIGHTS OF WIDOW.

A widow is dowerable to the extent of one-third of the real estate whereof the husband, or any one to his use, at any time during the coverture, was seized of an inheritance, such as that issue of the marriage might inherit the same as heir to the husband, unless her right to dower therein has been lawfully barred or relinquished.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. §§ 36-43; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

3. WILLS (§ 455*)—CONSTRUCTION—LANGUAGE OF INSTRUMENT.

A will that is clear and unambiguous in its terms must be interpreted by those terms. The true inquiry is not what the testator meant, but what the terms used by him express.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Mason County. Bill by Mary Catharine Couch against Sarah F. Eastham. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Mollohan, McClintic & Mathews, Rankin Wiley, and Harry Couch Eastham, for appellant. J. S. Spencer and Somerville & Somerville, for appellee.

ROBINSON, J. By this suit the widow of Peter S. Couch prays that dower be assigned her in the lands devised to her husband by the will of his father, Samuel Couch. Her right to dower therein is denied by the defendant, Sarah F. Eastham. The case presents a single question: Is the plaintiff entitled to dower?

The answer to the question must be determined by a consideration of the following paragraph in the will of Samuel Couch: "I give and devise unto my son Peter S. Couch the farm on which I reside in Mason County, West Virginia containing about Nine Hundred and Fifty Acres, but it being my desire to divide my property as near equally as may be between my two children Peter S. Couch and Sarah Frances Eastham. I direct my said son Peter S. Couch to pay his sister Sarah F. Eastham the sum of Four Thousand Dollars and I hereby make the said sum of Four Thousand Dollars a lien and charge upon the real estate aforesaid devised to said Peter S. Couch, until the same is paid to said Sarah F. Eastham or her heirs, but in event the said Peter S. Couch shall die leaving no lawful children surviving him, but leaving his wife Mary Catharine Couch surviving him, it is my will and desire that the title to all my real estate aforesaid shall pass to and be vested in my daughter Sarah Frances Eastham or her children if she be not living upon the payment by her or her said children to said Mary Catharine Couch of the sum of Four Thousand Dollars, but in the event that said Mary Catharine Couch shall not then be living, it is my will and desire that said real estate shall pass to and vest in my said daughter, Sarah F. Eastham, or in case of her death to her children without the payment of anything in consideration therefor." A codicil to the will reduced the last named sum of four thousand dollars to two thousand dollars.

This same paragraph of the will of Samuel Couch, twice before, in the lifetime of Peter S. Couch, has been involved in suits in this court. Couch v. Eastham, 27 W. Va. 796, 55 Am. Rep. 346; Couch v. Eastham, 29 W. Va. 784, 3 S. E. 23. But, of course, in neither of those cases was the character of the estate devised to Peter S. Couch viewed in relation to dower. Now that he has departed this life leaving no issue, and Sarah F. Eastham has paid to his widow the two thousand dollars pursuant to the terms of the will and the codicil thereto, this subsequent controversy about the right of dower arises.

[1, 2] The will gave Peter S. Couch a defeasible fee in the land. He held an estate in fee simple which would shift in the event of his dying without lawful children. The fee continued in him until he died without issue. If lawful children had been born to him, the estate was one which they could have inherited as his heirs. Since the estate of which he was seized was one that could pass to his heirs, it was an estate of inheritance. It is to estates of this character that dower attaches. Code 1906, ch. 65, sec. 1. "The widow is dowerable of all the real estate whereof the husband, or any one to his use, at any time during the coverture, was seized of an estate of inheritance, such as that issue born of the marriage may, by possibility, inherit the same as heir to the husband, unless her right to such dower has been lawfully barred or relinquished." 2 Minor's Inst. (4th Ed.) 147. Though the estate of Peter S. Couch in the land expired when he died without leaving children, still his previous seizin of the estate of inheritance therein during the coverture is a basis of dower in his widow. "If the consort's estate expires by the regular efflux of the period originally marked out for its duration, leaving the previous seizin of the consort unimpaired, dower (and curtesy) are prolongations of the consort's estate, annexed by force of law." 2 Minor's Inst. (4th Ed.) 153. So, we must observe, Samuel Couch by his will vested such a title in his son, gave him such a seizin of the land, that dower in the son's widow was annexed thereto, by force of law, as a prolongation of the son's estate. That Peter S. Couch held a defeasible fee and that his widow is dowerable therein, unless her right has been lawfully barred or relinquished, is clear. Tomlinson v. Nickell, 24 W. Va. 148; Nickell v. Tomlinson, 27 W. Va. 697.

[3] It is, however, insisted that Samuel Couch did not intend that the widow of his son should take dower in the land. What he did intend must be determined from the will itself. The will is clear and unambiguous. We cannot change it and thereby make a new will. The testator plainly gave his son an estate in which the widow of the latter was dowerable. This imports that the testator intended her to have dower, after the son's death. He must be presumed to have known the legal consequences of his will. Whether Samuel Couch could have so devised an estate of inheritance to his son by terms of the will as to cut off right of dower therein, we need not decide. The will does not undertake to cut off dower. It does not directly affirm that the son's widow shall have no dower. Nor does it say that the two thousand dollars to be paid by Sarah F. Eastham to the son's widow shall be in lieu of dower. We cannot assume or conjecture that the testator meant that sum in place of dower when he says nothing to that effect. The plain import of the will from the terms used is that the widow of his son may take dower and receive the two thousand dollars also. We cannot hold that the will means that Sarah F. Eastham is to have the immediate possession of all the land at the death of Peter S. Couch, for none of the terms used warrant that meaning. The will does not say that the possession of the land is to pass to Sarah F. Eastham if Peter S. Couch dies without lawful children and leaves a widow. It says the "title" to the land is "to pass to and be vested in" Sarah F. Eastham in that event. The use of these words is consistent with the right of dower claimed. "Title" does not mean "possession." Dower is mere right to possession, not title. In short, Samuel Couch gave to his son an estate in which he must have known that the son's widow could take dower, and used no words promulgating an intention contrary to her taking dower. Why he gave a dowerable estate, and why he also provided that a sum of money should be paid to the widow, is not for us to inquire. It is enough that we see that he did so by the plain language of his will. It may be that he meant to return to the widow at least a portion of the four thousand dollars paid by her husband. Relative to this same will it was held in a former case: "In the interpretation of a will, the true enquiry is, not what the testator meant to express, but what do the words used express." Couch v. Eastham, 29 W. Va. 784, 3 S. E. 23.

The decree is a proper one. It will be affirmed.

STOUT v. CLIFFORD.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 19, 1911. Rehearing Denied
Jan. 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. WILLS (§ 614*)—CONSTRUCTION—NATURE OF ESTATE DEVISED.

The will in this case gives Sarah Clifford only an estate for life, with remainder to testator's children vesting at his death.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Harrison County.

Bill by Clarence P. Stout against John H. Clifford and others. Decree for plaintiff, and John H. Clifford and certain other defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John Bassel, Sperry & Sperry, Davis & Davis, and Geo. M. Hoffheimer, for appellants. Edward G. Smith and Stephen G. Jackson, for appellee Clarence P. Stout. Philip P. Steptoe, for appellees Clifford McManaway and Angela McManaway.

BRANNON, J. James Clifford made a will reading as follows, omitting formal opening: "I will and bequeath to my wife Sarah Clifford for and during her natural life all my real estate and personal property and also all my notes and bonds and bank stock of every description and kind and after my wife is death that the property if any is left shall be divided exactly among the children no bond or security shall be required of executor." He died in 1892 leaving his widow, Sarah Clifford, and seven children. One of these children, Agnes, married Clarence P. Stout in 1898. Agnes Stout died intestate in 1899, leaving an infant child, Benjamin Clarence Stout, and this child died in 1900, leaving his father as his heir. Sarah Clifford, the widow of James Clifford, died in 1909. Clarence P. Stout, claiming as father and heir of his deceased infant son, Benjamin Clarence Stout, that he was entitled to one-seventh of the real estate of James Clifford, brought a suit in the circuit court of Harrison county against the children of Clifford for a partition of the real estate left by Clifford. The case resulted in a decree holding that Stout was entitled to one-seventh interest in said real estate, and that certain grandchildren of James Clifford had also shares therein in right of their dead parents, who died after the death of James Clifford, and directing a partition of said real estate. From this decree John Clifford, Sarah E. Dolan, and Anna C. Brennan appealed.

[1] What estate did the widow Sarah Clifford take under the will of James Clifford? On the answer to that question depends the decision of this case. A number of able and elaborate briefs discuss this case in many views, and cite dozens of cases from all quarters more or less bearing upon it. I shall not discuss any large fraction of them, because to do so would make an opinion prolix and confusing, and becloud rather than enlighten. To the members of this court the case has not seemed difficult. The intent of Clifford in his will must control. It has been well said that, "in disputes upon wills cases seldom elucidate the subject, which, depending on the intention of the testator, to be collected from the will, and from the relative situation of the parties, ought to be decided upon the state and circumstances of each case." So said President Pendleton, in 1794, in Shermer v. Shermer, 1 Wash. (Va.) 266, 1 Am. Dec. 460. He added that he generally observed that cases more frequently disappoint than illustrate the intention, and that he was free to own that, where a testator's intention was apparent to him, cases must be strong, uniform, and apply pointedly, before they would prevail to frustrate that intention.

It is claimed for the appellants that Sarah Clifford, widow of James Clifford, under his will took an estate in fee, not a mere life estate, and only those who can claim as heirs under her can take any interest, which would shut out Stout, and that the decree giving him a share is erroneous. This contention that Sarah Clifford took a fee is based on the case of May v. Joynes, 20 Grat. (Va.) 692, decided in 1857, and cases following it. That case involved a will by which the testator gave to his wife "my whole estate real and personal, especially all real estate I may hereafter acquire, to have during her life, but with full power to make sale of any part of the said estate and to convey absolute title to the purchasers, and use the purchase money for investment or any purpose that she pleases, with only this restriction, that what ever remains at her death shall, after paying any debts she may owe, or any legacies that she may leave, to be divided as follows"—then specifying limitations to his children and grandchildren. It was held that the wife took an absolute fee, and that the limitation over of whatever remained at her death was inconsistent with such fee simple and failed. This is based on the doctrine spoken in Burwell v. Anderson, 3 Leigh (Va.) 348, saying that from the earliest time it was received doctrine of common law that an absolute and unqualified power of disposing, conferred by will, and not controlled or explained by any other provision, should be construed as a gift of absolute property; that the power of absolute disposition is the eminent quality of absolute property; that he who has the absolute property and that he to whom is given the absolute power over an estate acquires thereby absolute property, unless there is something in the gift which negatives and overthrows this otherwise irresistible implication.

In Milhollen v. Rice, 13 W. Va. 510, Judge Green said this: "It is settled that if a testator gives property to a devisee or legatee, to use or dispose of at his pleasure—that is, to consume or spend, sell or give away, at his pleasure—such devisee or legatee has the fee-simple or absolute property, even though his interest in it be called by the will a life estate, and there be a provision in the will, whereby what may remain of the property at the death of the devisee or legatee is given to another person." It thus appears that a material, essential element of the rule just stated is that, where a life estate is expressly given, to convert it into a fee there must be clear power of disposition given to the devisee of the life estate. Without at all assailing the rule above stated, we say that the rule does not apply in this case—does not govern this case. Why? Because Clifford's will does not contain such clear, distinct power in Sarah Clifford to sell or dispose of the land. That is the touchstone of this case. Look at the will. It contains no express power. It does not say, as did the will in May v. Joynes, that Sarah Clifford should have power to sell or to will or otherwise dispose of the property. There is no such express power found in it. As Judge Poffenbarger said, in Behrens v. Baumann, on page 59 of 86 W. Va., on page 6 of 86 S. E., 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1092: "No power of disposition or consumption is expressly given her. In express terms her estate is defined as one for life." But it is said there is such power given by implication by the words "after my wife is death that the property if any is left shall be divided equally among the children." Upon the four words, "if any is left," rests the contention that the life estate is elevated into a fee in the wife, and denying to the children all estate, though the testator has declared that they shall have the property after their mother's death. Thus what the words of the will declare to be a life estate is made a fee simple. Thus a remainder in fee written by the will is made nothing, and this by the magic force of those four words. We would think from the will, and from the relation of father to wife and child, and from our knowledge of the love of father for his children, that the father's intent was to give the use of the property to his wife for life and remainder, after she had done with it, to the children of his loins. Our knowledge of love of father to wife and child would tell us this. We have right to place this court in the place of Clifford, having wife and children to provide for. His duty to provide for all. The will does just what we would say he would do. The will, to conform to this natural instinct of love; but the construction contended for defeats all this, forgets the children, and vests in the wife who in her old age did not need it, a large property which she might lose by mismanagement or give away to a second husband or somebody else, and leave seven children penniless. Shall we work this result by implication, a dim one at that? And this construction runs counter to a rule of law found in Graham v. Graham, 23 W. Va. 36, 48 Am. Rep. 364, holding: "The heir will not be disinherited, unless it is done by the express terms of the will or by necessary implication. The heir being favored in law, there should be no strained construction to work a disinherison, where the words of the will are ambiguous." Those four words in this will are ambiguous, entirely impotent, and inconclusive to bring about the construction sought to be given this will. Again, I say the appellants rest their case on implication from the clause above quoted, and I repeat that it is not plain enough to work this result. The words of the will, to be conformable to what we would expect from a testator situated as was Clifford, give the widow only a life estate, plainly do this; yet this remainder is to be defeated by those few words. "When implications are allowed, they must be such as are necessary, or at least highly probable, and not merely possible. In construing a will, conjecture must not be taken for implication. Necessary implication means so strong a probability of intention that an intention contrary to that imputed to the testator cannot be supposed. The whole will taken together must produce the conviction, that the testator's intention was to create the estate raised by implication." Graham v. Graham, 23 W. Va. 37, 48 Am. Rep. 364. See Bartlett v. Patton, 33 W. Va. 78, 10 S. E. 21, 5 L. R. A. 523, Coberly v. Earle, 60 W. Va. 295, 54 S. E. 336, and Earle v. Coberly, 65 W. Va. 163, 64 S. E. 628. "A clearly expressed intention in one portion of the will is not to yield to a doubtful construction in another part." Bell v. Humphrey, 8 W. Va. 6, 11.

It was the general intent, the dominating intent, of Clifford to give only a life estate to his wife, the remainder to his children. The case last cited, same point, says that "when the general intent of the testator is clear, and it is impracticable to give effect to all the language expressive of some particular intent, the latter must yield to the former." So, under this rule, and being ambiguous if so, those four words would have to be eliminated and the provision for life estate and remainder prevail. But we can assign those words a reasonable office. We say that they must mean that Sarah Clifford could use personal property consumable in the use, and perhaps money or securities. Such uses as a life tenant could make. Brant v. Coal Co., 93 U. S. 326, 23 L. Ed. 927; Bartlett v. Patton, 33 W. Va. 71, 10 S. E. 21, 5 L. R. A. 523. In Behrens v. Baumann, 66 W. Va. 56, 66 S. E. 5, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1092, the meaning given to such words is that they apply to personal estate in such use of life estate as a life tenant may make of it. Thus, we assign a meaning to those words consistent with the general intent of the will, plainly expressed by it; that is, to give a life estate to the wife, the remainder to the children. In the Behrens Case it is held that though a clause in a will clearly expressing a particular or special intent will prevail over such general intent, doubtful expressions, merely susceptible of a meaning inconsistent therewith, will not do so. It says that, if it is done by implication, it must be so plain that the contrary cannot be supposed. Our West Virginia cases uphold this construction of this will. Take the case of Mihollen v. Rice, 13 W. Va. 510. The will gave the wife personal property, "to use and dispose of at her discretion during her natural life, and also to have the right of disposal at her death." It was held, because of that power of disposal and use, that she took an absolute estate, though the will declared it to be a life estate; whereas, as to the land the will said that the wife during life might use it, but had only a life estate, the court saying that, as there was no power of disposition given the wife as to the land, she had only a life estate. Take the case of Behrens v. Baumann. A life estate given wife to be administered for the benefit of herself and others was not enlarged into a fee simple by the following phrase, describing the property to go over, "whatsoever may be left." The case also says that such indefinite expressions cannot be allowed the widest signification of which they are capable, if, when so read, they conflict with the general intent expressed." The general intent in the will before us is to create a life estate for a wife and the remainder to children. That is what we would call, under the case of Morgan v. Morgan, 60 W. Va. 327, 55 S. E. 389, the dominant intent. This purpose, the dominant or primary intent, in the language of Judge Cox, in that case, although there was language prescribing a life estate, yet as there was plain intent to give complete power of disposition to the life tenant, she was held to have a fee simple; but in our case there is no such dominant intent in favor of the widow, and the case upholds our holding. I can, and do, cite even the case which is the fulcrum for the lever with which the appellants would lift the life estate to a fee (May v. Joynes) to support our position. Why so? Because the reason of decision in that case lies in the very broad and strong language found in the will in that case, giving the life devisee power of sale of land and to consume or give its proceeds by will. The want of such a clear clause repelled a fee in McDonald v. Jarvis, 64 W. Va. 62, 60 S. E. 990, 131 Am. St. Rep. 889. That case calls for such a clause. Our case does so.

These principles close the case, and it is not necessary to notice some of the very many cases cited by counsel for appellants. Riddick v. Cohoon, 4 Rand. (Va.) 547. An absolute legacy, with provision that, if legatee die without issue, then all that shall be left at death, over to others. Here was an absolute gift, not for life, and under the principle that, when an absolute estate is given and one inconsistent is given, the latter is repugnant and void. So in Elcan v. Lancasterian, 2 Pat. & H. (Va.) 53. Shermer v. Shermer, 1 Wash. (Va.) 266, 1 Am. Dec. 460, goes on a clear power of disposal; intent governed. Bowen v. Bowen, 87 Va. 438, 12 S. E. 885, 24 Am. St. Rep. 664; Robertson v. Hardy, 23 S. E. 766, 2 Va. Dec. 275; Carr v. Effinger, 78 Va. 197; Davis v. Heppert, 96 Va. 775, 32 S. E. 467; Hunter v. Hicks, 109 Va. 615, 64 S. E. 988; Hansbrough v. Trustees, 110 Va. 15, 65 S. E. 467; Johnson v. Smith, 108 Va. 725, 62 S. E. 958; Randall v. Harrison, 109 Va. 686, 64 S. E. 992. In these cases the wills give power of sale.

We admit that some late Virginia cases say that such words as "if any is left," in the Clifford will, give a fee to the life devisee by implication. Farish v. Wayman, 91 Va. 430, 21 S. E. 810; Rolley v. Rolley, 109 Va. 449, 63 S. E. 988, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 64. We regard them unsound, and cannot follow them.

Under decisions in almost all other states, and in the United States Supreme Court, even such words of power of disposal as in May v. Joynes give only a life estate. Brant v. Coal Co., 93 U. S. 326, 23 L. Ed. 927. If their rule is followed, of course, the widow in our case took only a life estate. Brown v. Strother, 102 Va. 145, 47 S. E. 238. No life estate, and court said legatee had power of disposal.

Some of the children died before their mother died, and to exclude them it is argued that even if we say that Clifford's will gives the widow only a life estate, with remainder to the children, that remainder would not vest until the death of the widow, and thus only those children then living would take. We do not accede to this position. The law favors the vesting of estates. Suter v. Suter, 68 W. Va. 690, 70 S. E. 705. That case would vest the remainder at testator's death. When Clifford said that upon his wife's death his estate should go to his children, did he not mean to at once give them an estate awaiting for possession and enjoyment only the end of the life estate? Why shall we say he intended to vest not until then? What purpose would he have for such postponement?

[2] "Vested remainders" are those by which a present vested interest passes to the party, though to be enjoyed in future, and by which the estate is invariably fixed to go to a certain person after the particular estate is spent. 11 Va. & W. Va. Encyclopedia Digest, 817. "The true criterion of a vested remainder is the existence in an ascertained person of a present fixed right of future enjoyment." 24 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 389. There stood Clifford's children ready to take possession on their mother's death. The case of Diehl v. Cotts, 48 W. Va. 255, 37 S. E. 546, will sustain this holding.

Thus we hold that Clifford's will gives his widow only a life estate, with remainder to his children, vested at his death, and affirm the decree.

NOTE.—Some time after the foregoing decision my attention is called to the case of Herring v. Williams (N. C.) 73 S. E. 218, where is found a full discussion of the construction of the will like the one in our case. It will decidedly sustain our holding. The first decision was the other way; but on rehearing it was reversed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County.

Bill by Charles E. Mylius against Jacob Koontz and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed, and bill dismissed.

C. H. Scott, H. G. Kump, S. T. Spears, and Mollohan, McClintic & Mathews, for appellants. W. B. Maxwell, for appellee.

MILLER, J. The injunction, which the court below, by its final decree, of August 5, 1909, refused to dissolve, in accordance with the prayer of the bill, enjoined defendants, Jacob Koontz, E. F. Phillips and John Stamm, their servants, agents and employees, from severing and removing any timber whatever from either lots number 14, 15 and 21, and especially from number 14 and 15, of the subdivision of the Phillips and Law survey, of nineteen thousand acres, as platted by David Goff, commissioner of forfeited and delinquent lands for Randolph County, in 1840.

The plaintiff's claim of title to these lands, particularly to lots 14 and 15, is the same as that relied on by him in Mylius v. Raine-Andrew Lumber Company, an action for damages for cutting timber, in which the judgment below in his favor was reversed by this court, and the case remanded for a new trial. — W. Va. —, 71 S. E. 404.

The defendants, Koontz, Phillips and Stamm, claim title to 411.8 acres, part of the land in controversy, by deed from their co-defendant, Thomas J. Arnold, and Eugenia H., his wife, dated November 12, 1906. Their title to the four other tracts involved they derived as follows; a half undivided interest therein, by deed from said Thomas J. Arnold and wife, and Elizabeth E. Arnold, executrix, etc., dated November 14, 1906; the other undivided half interest therein, they obtained from Charles R. Durbin and wife, by deed dated November 27, 1906. The object of the bill is not to try the legal title to these lands, but to maintain a status quo, until the legal title can be adjudicated in a suit in ejectment which the bill alleges plaintiff has brought and has pending against defendants.

As we view the case presented by the pleadings and proofs, it is wholly unnecessary to enter upon any consideration of the conflicting legal titles to these lands. The decree appealed from, though modifying the injunction in certain particulars, not necessary to notice, in effect, overrules the motion of defendants to dissolve the injunction as modified. This, then, is simply an appeal from an order refusing to dissolve the injunction. The decree in terms specifically provides that: "Nothing in this order shall be construed as settling the rights of the parties as to matters in controversy relative to lots No. 14, No. 15 or No. 21, but all rights of the parties relative to said lots are reserved for the future order of the court."

The real and only question presented for decision, therefore, is not whether the plaintiff, as against Thomas J. Arnold, has the better legal title to the lands in controversy, but whether, as defendants allege in their answers, he is stopped by his contract, or his conduct, or by both, from denying their title to these lands, and from intervening by injunction to stop them from cutting the timber thereon.

The facts pleaded by respondents are not denied, but admitted by plaintiff; that in the spring of 1907, some months after Koontz, Phillips and Stamm had obtained their deeds for these lands, and had begun building their mills and houses, preparatory to cutting the timber, Mylius notified them of his claim, and not to cut or remove the timber. This interference of Mylius was at once brought to the attention of Arnold, who a day or two afterwards met Mylius in the law office of Arnold's son at Elkins, Stamm being present, where Mylius and Arnold, as they both admit, verbally agreed on a settlement of their differences, as Arnold claims, on the terms of a prior agreement in writing between them, made in 1904. Stamm, though present, or nearby, claims not to have heard the full terms of this agreement; but he says, as both Mylius and Arnold admit, that they then notified him that they had settled, and that he and his co-partners were free to go ahead with their operations. Arnold's testimony in reference to this agreement in substance is, that Mylius and he had a previous written agreement about this 411.8 acres, and that he supposed it was settled; that when Mylius made objection to the operations of Koontz, Phillips and Stamm they came to him about it, and that he and Mylius talked the matter over again and had a further understanding, satisfactory to him, namely, using his language, that "in event any of this land was determined to be his, I was to pay Mr. Mylius the price per acre for that that was uncut, and for that part of the land that Mr. Mylius had cut over, I was to give him other land of equal value in place of it. That was about the agreement between us, and that's what they came to see me about. The agreement was satisfactory between Mr. Mylius and myself."

The agreement in writing of 1904, referred to by the witness and exhibited with his evidence provides, in substance, that if in the suits of Arnold against the Raine-Andrew Lumber Co., and Mylius against the same company it should be found that the northern line of lot No. 14, of the Phillips and Law survey, is the same as what is known as the Kupfer line; or wherever the northern line of said lot No. 14, and the northeastern corner of lot No. 15, should be located in said suits, then, in consideration of one dollar, in hand paid, and the covenants thereafter set forth, Mylius agreed to release to Arnold all his claim to the land north of the Kupfer line, and east of three beeches, or east of wherever said corner of lot No. 15, might be located, and north of a line extending from where said corner might be located by said suits, south 76° east, with variation south 73° east; also to the owners of lot No. 21 of said survey, his claim, as owner of said lot No. 15, to all that portion thereof north of a line run north 76°, with variation 73° west, from said three beeches, or wherever said northeastern corner of said lot might be located by said suits, to the intersection of a line run from two hemlocks and a service, north 14° east, with variation north 17° east. And in consideration of the premises, and the sum of one dollar by Mylius to Arnold in hand paid, Arnold thereby agreed to release to Mylius all his right, title and interest acquired by deed from Yocum, commissioner, to 848 acres, a portion of lot No. 22 of said survey, south of a said line run from the northeastern corner of said lot No. 15 (three beeches as claimed by said Raine), or from wherever said corner might be established by said suits, S. 76° east, with variation south 73° east; and also to release to Mylius his interest in lot No. 21, the Hare lot, south of a line run from said three beeches, or from wherever said northeastern corner of lot No. 15 should be located and established by said suits, north 76° west, with variation north 73° west, to the intersection of a line run from said southwest corner of lot No. 15, north 14° east, with variation north 17° east. By the last paragraph thereof it is said that this agreement is to obviate any further difficulties which may arise between the parties, as to where the line between said lots may be, and to thus locate and determine them, as they may be located in said suits.

That this written agreement is in full force and binding on the parties is not seriously controverted. It is charged by Arnold in a general way, that Mylius has violated the terms of the agreement, but we do not understand Arnold to claim that the agreement is thereby abrogated or nullified.

As we interpret the evidence of Arnold, relating to the verbal agreement, we understand him to say, not, as might be inferred from his language perhaps, that this agreement was on the same terms as the written one, but that the terms of the written agreement were again talked over and were satisfactory to both parties, and that because of the controversy with Koontz, Phillips and Stamm, the written agreement was supplemented by the verbal agreement, providing, how, as already recited, the parties should account to each other for the land in the events contemplated by the written contract.

Both Arnold and Mylius agree, moreover, that in concluding this verbal agreement they notified Stamm, for Koontz, Phillips and Stamm, that they had settled their differences, and that they, Koontz, Phillips and Stamm were free to go on with their contract, and cut the timber, unaffected by the claims of Mylius. Mylius concedes, also, as testified by Stamm, that he confirmed the agreement afterwards in subsequent conversations, and that it was not until about the time of the bringing of this suit and obtaining the injunction in March, 1909, nearly two years intervening, and after said firm had completed the building of its mills and houses, and made contracts for lumber to be cut, rendering them liable for damages, and had paid all, or nearly all, the purchase money for the land, that Mylius set up a contrary claim.

These facts are pleaded and proven by appellants, Koontz, Phillips and Stamm, in estoppel of Mylius' right to maintain and prosecute the present suit against them. The question before us then, is, do these facts constitute a good defense? We are of opinion that they do, and that as to said firm, the injunction should have been wholly dissolved, and the bill dismissed. We reach this conclusion readily on the legal principles enunciated and elaborated by this court in Norfolk & Western R. Co. v. Perdue, 40 W. Va. 442, 21 S. E. 755; Bates v. Swiger, 40 W. Va. 420, 21 S. E. 874; Stone v. Tyree, 30 W. Va. 687, 5 S. E. 878; Williamson v. Jones, 39 W. Va. 231, 19 S. E. 436, 25 L. R. A. 222; Id., 43 W. Va. 562, 27 S. E. 411, 38 L. R. A. 694, 64 Am. St. Rep. 891, 4 Am. & Eng. Dec. in Eq. 258, 371, and note; Atkinson v. Plum, 50 W. Va. 104, 40 S. E. 587, 58 L. R. A. 788; Hanly v. Watterson, 39 W. Va. 214, 19 S. E. 536; Pomeroy, Eq. Jur. section 807.

It is objected by Mylius to this defense, that Stamm was present and knew that the contract, then verbal, was to be reduced to writing on the back of the agreement of 1904, and that being a contract relating to land, he was charged with knowledge of the law, that it was not enforceable, and not binding on the parties until reduced to writing.

The answer to this contention is that Koontz, Phillips and Stamm are not seeking in this suit enforcement of the contract between Arnold and Mylius, and no one, not even Arnold, has pleaded the statute of frauds. The statute of frauds, to be available, must be pleaded. Cunningham v. Cunningham, 46 W. Va. 1, 32 S. E. 998; Howell v. Harvey, 65 W. Va. 310, 64 S. E. 249, 22

L. R. A. (N. S.) 1077; 20 Cyc. 311, 312, and notes.

It is conceded on all hands that Arnold and Mylius made an agreement, and notified Stamm for his firm that they had settled their differences, and to go on with their timber operations. This agreement was reaffirmed afterward by Mylius, who stood by for nearly two years, knowing that that firm was relying on those representations, and were continually changing their condition for the worse before, by this suit, he again set up, against them, his claim of title to these lands. The authorities already cited, and many others in Virginia and in this state concur in holding the general proposition, applicable here, that "Where one, by words or conduct, intentionally causes another to believe in the existence of a certain state of things, or such words or conduct are of such nature as he has reason to believe will cause him to so believe, and such other, not knowing the contrary, acts thereon, the former will be estopped from averring or claiming under a different state of things, then existing and known to him, to the prejudice of the other party." See 5 Ency. Dig. Va. & W. Va. Reports, 230 et seq. Equitable estoppel under such circumstances will operate to vest or divest the title to real estate, in spite of the statute of frauds. See note to Williamson v. Jones, 4 Am. & Eng. Dec. in Eq. 258, 371.

Our opinion is that as to Koontz, Phillips and Stamm, the decree below should be reversed, the injunction wholly dissolved and the bill dismissed, and it will be so ordered.

VARNEY & EVANS v. HUTCHINSON LUMBER & MFG. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 19, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 406*)—POWERS AND LIABILITIES—REPRESENTATION BY OFFICERS—AUTHORITY OF PRESIDENT.

The president of a corporation has no inherent power to make contracts on its behalf.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1612; Dec. Dig. § 406.*]

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 410*)—POWERS AND LIABILITIES—REPRESENTATION BY OFFICERS—AUTHORITY OF PRESIDENT.

Authority in the president of a corporation, engaged in the manufacture and sale of lumber, to purchase expensive machinery for use in its business cannot be inferred from his management and control of its ordinary business.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1629-1632; Dec. Dig. § 410.*]

3. CORPORATIONS (§ 432*)—POWERS AND LIABILITIES—REPRESENTATION BY OFFICERS—EVIDENCE.

The authority of the president of a corporation to make a certain contract on its behalf being in issue in a trial, it is error to exclude his offered testimony denying such authority.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1733; Dec. Dig. § 432.*]

4. CORPORATIONS (§ 432*)—POWERS AND LIABILITIES—REPRESENTATION BY OFFICERS—EVIDENCE.

Evidence of management of the ordinary business of a corporation, engaged in the manufacture and sale of lumber, by its president is insufficient to sustain a verdict against it for purchase money of expensive machinery for use in its business, on the theory of a contract made by the president, in the absence of evidence of ratification of the alleged contract by the defendant or reception of the benefit of the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1737; Dec. Dig. § 432.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Mingo County.

Action by S. M. Varney and another, partners under the firm name of Varney & Evans, against the Hutchinson Lumber & Manufacturing Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

Wyatt & Graham and Sheppard, Goodykootz & Scherr, for plaintiff in error. Stokes & Bronson, for defendants in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. After this case was remanded to the circuit court of Mingo county, in obedience to the decision of this court, as reported in 64 W. Va. 417, 63 S. E. 203, a trial was had which resulted in a verdict for the plaintiffs for the sum of $1,230, a portion of which was released to prevent the court from setting it aside, and judgment was rendered for the residue thereof, $558.40.

Insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict and the exclusion of certain testimony are the only assignments of error we deem it necessary to pass upon. The defendant is a corporation, and the verbal contract sued upon is alleged to have been made with its president. This was a contract for the purchase of a portable engine and a sawmill at the price of $1,230. As stated in the evidence for the plaintiff, it was very informal, and whether it was made or not seems to depend largely upon the credibility of two men, the agent of the alleged vendors and the president of the defendant company, who explicitly denies the purchase and almost every fact and circumstance relied upon as indicating it. There was no proof of any express authority in the president of the corporation to make the purchase, and no conduct on his part, or on the part of the corporation, tending to show such authority is in evidence, except his alleged purchase of the engine and sawmill, and his admission that he had charge of the business of his company, "to a certain extent," in Mingo county, and of its "operation" in a certain place, "so far as the manufacture was concerned, and shipments, etc." The court refused to allow the defendant to prove by him that his company had not in any way authorized him to purchase this property. It is also conclusively shown that the company never accepted the property, nor had it in its possession at any time.

The defendant was not a dealer in engines and sawmills. It was engaged in the lumber business. Though machinery of the kind alleged to have been sold may have been owned and used by it, its general purpose was not the purchase of such machinery for resale. In other words, it was not a dealer in machinery. The disposition of the two assignments of error, therefore, must depend largely upon the legal inquiry as to whether the president of such a corporation has inherent authority to purchase expensive machinery to be used by it in its business, or to constitute what may be called its plant or a substantial part thereof.

[1] Of the power of the president of a corporation, Cook on Corporations, at section 716, says: "His duty is merely to preside at meetings of the board of directors, and to perform only such other duties as the by-laws or resolutions of the board of directors may expressly authorize. This is a rule established by the great weight of authority. The board of directors may, of course, expressly authorize the president to contract; or his authority to contract may arise from his having assumed and exercised that power in the past; or the corporation may ratify his contract or accept the benefits of it, and thereby be bound. But the general rule is that the president cannot act or contract for the corporation any more than any other director." Morawetz on Corporations, at sections 537, 538, substantially agrees with Cook's statement of the law. It says: "The implied powers of the president of a corporation depend upon the nature of the company's business and the measure of authority delegated to him by the board of directors. It seems that a president has no greater powers, by virtue of his office merely, than any other director of the company, except that he is the presiding officer at the meetings of the board."

* * * However, the presidents of corporations, by general custom, exercise much wider powers than those accorded to them by the authorities cited in the preceding section; and this custom has been judicially recognized." The power exercised by general custom, judicially recognized, has its limitations, however, as shown by the authorities cited in support of the text. Cook, at section 716 of his work, also refers to it in these terms: "The fact, however, that he is almost always the corporate officer who is directed to sign the corporate contracts that have been authorized by the board of directors has led to an enlargement of his importance as a corporate officer. Hence the rule has arisen in New York that a contract, which apparently is a corporate contract, being signed by the president, is presumed to be a corporate contract until the want of authority of the president is shown by the corporation." He then shows that a few courts have gone further. Proceeding, Morawetz says, at section 538: "There can be no doubt that the board of directors may invest the president with authority to act as chief executive officer of the company. This may be done, either by an express resolution, or by acquiescence, in a course of dealing. A person dealing with the president of a corporation in the usual manner, and within the powers which the president has been accustomed to exercise without the dissent of the directors, would be entitled to assume that the president had actually been invested with those powers." A few cases may go beyond this doctrine, but it undoubtedly states the limits of the powers of the president of a corporation as recognized generally throughout the country. It accords with the principles declared and applied by this court. Bank v. Kimberlands, 16 W. Va. 555; Bank v. Manufacturing Co., 56 W. Va. 446, 49 S. E. 544; Thompson v. Manufacturing Co., 60 W. Va. 42, 53 S. E. 908, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 311.

[3] The admissions of the president as a witness in the case show conduct or a course of dealing indicating some authority in him to represent his company. To anticipate such evidence and show he had no authority to purchase this property, he offered to testify that his company had not conferred it upon him. The extent of his authority was a fact for the jury, unless it was so plainly established by the evidence that the court could declare it as matter of law. As his admissions were obviously not conclusive, and there was no other evidence tending to show his authority, the question was one for jury determination, upon which the court should have admitted all relevant and material evidence offered. Hence we think the rejection of the offered testimony to prove want of authority was plainly erroneous.

[2, 4] Moreover, we are of the opinion that the evidence relied upon to prove authority to make the contract is wholly insufficient. As we have said, the corporation was not a dealer in machinery. Authority in the president to buy it could not be inferred from his management of the company's business, if his admissions can be regarded as sufficient to prove his character as manager. There is no proof of any course of dealing sufficient to justify such an inference. It does not appear that he had ever before bought, for or on behalf of his company, an engine or sawmill, or any other machinery, apparently designed for use as a part of its plant. All that he said is that he has, or had had, charge of its business in Mingo county "to a certain extent," and charge of a certain "operation" in that county. There is no evidence of any established course of business, or conduct on the part of the president, relating to transactions of the kind involved here, and acquiescence of the company therein, nor of ratification of the alleged contract, nor of the reception of benefit thereof in any sense or degree. The company never accepted the property, or any part of it. Hence the court should have directed a verdict for the defendant as requested, and, not having done so, should have sustained the motion to set aside the verdict.

The erroneous judgment will be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial.

WHITE v. TOWN OF ROMNEY et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Oct. 24, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 9*)—AUTHORITY TO EXERCISE POWER—WATER SUPPLY.

A municipal corporation, when necessary to do so to obtain a water supply for the use of the town or city, may condemn land, though situated outside the corporate limits.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 27-34; Dec. Dig. § 9.*] Poffenbarger, J., dissenting.

Petition of John Baker White for a writ of prohibition against R. W. Dailey, Judge, and the Town of Romney. Writ denied.

J. E. Chilton and John Baker White, for petitioner. J. S. Zimmerman and J. Sloan Kuykendall, for respondent Town of Romney.

BRANNON, J. The town of Romney is a municipal corporation holding its charter under chapter 47 of the Code. In June, 1911, the town filed in the circuit court of Hampshire county a petition seeking to condemn a small parcel of land having upon it a spring of water, for the purpose of supplying the town with an adequate supply of water for the public use, which land is the property of John Baker White. The said White seeks a writ of prohibition from this court to prohibit the said circuit court and town of Romney from entertaining and prosecuting the said condemnation proceeding. The ground on which White rests his claim for the prohibition is that, as the land to be condemned lies outside the corporate limits of the town, therefore the town has no power or right to condemn the land. He claims that, whilst the town can construct and operate water-works within its limits, it cannot condemn land outside the corporate limits for supply of water. He cites the case of City of Charleston v. Reed, 27 W. Va. 681, 55 Am. Rep. 336, and other cases, holding that: "A municipal corporation can exercise the following powers and no others: First, those granted by express words in its charter or the general statute under which it is incorporated; second, those necessarily or fairly implied in or incident to the powers thus expressly granted; and, third, those essential to the declared purpose of the corporation, not simply convenient, but indispensable." White claims that no statute gives the town power to go outside its limits to thus acquire land for water purposes.

The Code, in chapter 47, § 14, says that the mayor, recorder, and councilmen of a city, town or village shall be a body politic and corporate and have perpetual succession, sue and be sued, "purchase and hold real estate necessary to enable them the better to discharge their duties, and needful for the good order, government and welfare of said city, town or village." Section 28 says: "The council of such city, town or village shall have plenary power and authority therein * * * to erect or authorize or prohibit the erection of gas works, electric works or water works in the city, town or village." White lays special emphasis upon the presence of the word "therein" and the words "in the city, town or village" found in section 28. He says those words show an intent on the part of the Legislature to limit waterworks and all their appliances to the town boundary. We do not think that such was the intent of the use of those words. They were used merely as descriptive of the territory of operation of waterworks. It cannot be possible that those words were meant to prohibit a town or city, when necessary, to go outside its limits to get a necessary supply of water; they were intended as descriptive of the use or purpose of the waterworks. Thus we see from those sections that a town is a corporation given power to establish waterworks and to acquire real estate necessary to enable it to discharge their functions and needful for the welfare of the town. Can we not say that land is highly necessary for the construction of waterworks? Can we not say that land for waterworks is necessary for the welfare of a town? Thus the town has power to acquire land for such purposes by purchase by the letter of section 14. The Legislature has there declared that land is needful for a town in some cases where necessary to perform its functions. A town may so acquire by purchase.

It may acquire land by condemnation. Chapter 13, Acts of the Extraordinary Session of the Legislature of 1907 (Code Supplement of 1909, c. 42, § 2, cl. 8), amending chapter 42 of the Code, in section 2, cl. 8, says that land may be condemned "by any city, town or village or company, now incorporated or hereafter incorporated for the purpose of establishing waterworks for the public use, to acquire any land necessary for the construction of reservoirs, dams, cisterns, and other waterworks which may be necessary for its purposes and land and right of way for pipes, conduits for the conveyance of water and so much water from any springs, rivers and creeks as may be necessary for its purposes." Here is a very broad, wide power of condemnation given municipal corporations for water purposes. It contains no language limiting the power of condemnation to lands within the municipal limits. It says "any land," "any springs, rivers and creeks." It gives right to condemn lands necessary for waterworks purposes without any limitation to municipal limits. We may reasonably say that, if such a restraint on the power of the town was intended, it would be found in the statute. We know that a supply of water for a town or city is highly useful, and essential, in many instances indispensable. The Legislature knew that in many instances it would be impossible to secure a sufficient supply of water within the municipal limits. It knew that in many of the towns and cities of the state water is obtained from beyond their boundaries. It intended to confer this indispensable power without restraint to the corporate limits. In most cases the power of condemnation, if so limited, would be worthless. It does seem unreasonable to say that these statutes taken together must be construed to limit the power of the municipality in the maintenance of waterworks to the municipal boundary. We have to insert such a limitation into the statute by judicial construction, and that too against public utility, and thus cramp the powers of municipalities in the discharge of essential functions. Such a construction would be against public policy. It would be ruinous to towns and cities. In 28 Cyc. 605, we find it stated that as a rule municipal corporations may not acquire property without their limits, but that "the Legislature, however, may confer such power, either in express terms or by necessary implication; and there are cases in which, without any special grant of such power, it has been implied as necessary to carry out powers granted." A number of cases are cited for this proposition. Keller v. Riverton, 161 Pa. 422, 29 Atl. 82, so holds. Our Legislature gives the towns power to have waterworks, and the power can be implied to get water beyond their limits. We find it stated in 28 Cyc. 954, that, "although a municipality has usually no authority outside its limits, yet authority to act beyond its bounds is sometimes implied on ground of special necessity." In 28 Cyc. 917, it is laid down that, if a municipal corporation is "authorized to construct such a system, they have implied authority, when necessary, to go beyond their limit and acquire property to obtain an outlet so as to make it effective." This relates to sewerage. Why is not the same power implied for waterworks?

It is abundantly established, and indeed virtually conceded in the brief for White, that a city or town may extend its sewer outlet beyond its limits. Elliott on Roads and Streets, in the last edition, section 559, says: "The right to provide for the drainage of streets and to construct and repair sewers is generally granted to cities in express terms by their charters or by the statute governing their incorporation; but, without any express grant of such authority, the right to exercise it is regarded as incident to the general power to maintain and control streets. The authority of the municipality as to such matters may extend even beyond the city limits; and, unless prohibited by charter or statute, the city has inherent power to contract for and construct works beyond the corporate limits for the discharge of sewage where the same is necessary." In the case of the City of Richmond v. Gallego Mills Co., 102 Va. 165, 45 S. E. 877, it is held that a municipal corporation may maintain necessary sewers outside its bounds as incident to its general powers to maintain and control its streets, without any express grant of authority for that purpose. This is sustained by much authority as to sewerage. McQuillin, Municipal Ordinances, § 513. See Langely v. Augusta, 118 Ga. 590, 45 S. E. 486, 98 Am. St. Rep. 134, holding this power in municipalities, and citing many authorities in its support, including the leading case of Coldwater v. Tucker, 36 Mich. 474, 24 Am. Rep. 601. I quote the following from 10 A. & E. Ency. of Law, 238: "The authority vested in a municipal corporation to construct sewers carries with it all subsidiary power necessary to make it effective, and hence if, in the construction of sewers, it becomes necessary to make use of private property, the municipality has an implied power to acquire such property by lawful means." This would include similar power as to waterworks. The power to have sewer outlets, pesthouses, and cemeteries is unquestionable and comes from necessity for the public weal. Why not as to waterworks? Water is essential and indispensable for the comfort and health of the people of the town, necessary in draining streets, for household purposes, for carrying off sewerage. Sewers cannot be operated without water. Why does not necessity give to towns an implied power to seek a source of supply outside of town by fair implication? For myself I would not appeal to power by implication, because I think our statute of 1907, giving broad power of condemnation, without limitation to town boundary, may be said to be an express grant of power to condemn for water supply outside the town. But if wrong in this, I do assert such power by implication. Here is a town given power to maintain waterworks and the power of condemnation for waterworks, and when it is necessary it has implied power to get water outside its limits. The authority cited for White—Charleston v. Reed, and many other cases—lays down the legal proposition that towns have powers "necessarily or fairly implied in or incident to expressly granted powers and those essential to the declared purpose of the corporation." Christie v. Malden, 23 W. Va. 667; Richards v. Clarksburg, 30 W. Va. 491, 4 S. E. 774, and other cases. When, under such authority, it is necessary for a town to go outside its limits for water, it has the clear implied power to do so to carry out the duties imposed upon it.

We therefore discharge the rule and refuse the writ of prohibition.

TRIUMPH ELECTRIC CO. v. EMPIRE FURNITURE CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 19, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§§ 130, 138*)—PROPERTY SUBJECT—RECORDING ACTS.

A deed of trust upon personal property, to be acquired by the grantor after the delivery of the trust deed, does not pass the legal title to the property, but creates an equitable lien in favor of the creditor, and is protected, by section 3 of chapter 74 of the Code, against an unrecorded reservation of title to such after-acquired property in favor of the vendor in the sale to the grantor in the deed of trust.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Chattel Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 217, 223-236; Dec. Dig. §§ 130, 138.*]

2. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 18*)—PROPERTY SUBJECT—AFTER-ACQUIRED PROPERTY.

Such a deed of trust is a contract to give a lien on the property when acquired, which a court of equity will enforce.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Chattel Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 61-66; Dec. Dig. § 18.*]

3. JUDICIAL SALES (§ 50*)—TITLE AND RIGHTS OF PURCHASER.

A sale of such property under a decree in an equity suit, to which the vendor is not a party, to have the deed of trust declared fraudulent or preferential in violation of the statute against preferences, passes to the purchaser the superior right of the trust deed creditors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judicial Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 90-96; Dec. Dig. § 50.*]

4. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 138*)—PRIORITY OF LIEN—CONDITIONAL SALES—RECORDING ACTS—"PURCHASER."

Such a creditor is regarded in equity as a "purchaser," within the meaning of the recording statutes, and the decree of sale, treating the equitable lien as having been perfected in equity by specific execution of the contract to give a lien, evidenced by the deed of trust, passes the legal title to the property.

Error to Circuit Court, Cabell County.

Action by the Triumph Electric Company against the Empire Furniture Company.

Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed and rendered.

Williams, Scott & Lovett, for plaintiff in error. Campbell, Brown & Davis, for defendant in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. This case presents a question of title to personal property; the plaintiff claiming under a reservation thereof in a contract of sale, and the defendant under a purchase at a judicial sale, founded upon the theory of a lien upon the property by a deed of trust, subsequent in date to the contract reserving title. To a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, the defendant has obtained a writ of error.

From an agreed statement, made part of the record, the following material facts are obtained: On the 16th day of October, 1907, the Probst Furniture Company executed a deed of trust to E. E. Williams and H. T. Lovett, trustees, to secure the payment of certain negotiable promissory notes in favor of Geo. N. Biggs and others. It conveyed all the property then owned by the company and such property as it should thereafter acquire and install or place in, upon, or about the real estate, buildings, structures, and appliances of the grantor, and was recorded on the day of execution thereof. On the 14th day of October, the grantor in that deed of trust purchased from the Triumph Electric Company, another corporation, an electric belted generator and a belted vertical engine for the sum of $498, of which $98 was paid in cash. Three notes were executed for the balance, payable in 30, 60, and 90 days, and, as stated, there was a reservation of title to the property, by a written contract of sale, until payment of the notes. This contract gave the vendor the right, in the case of default in payment thereof at maturity, to repossess itself of the property and take possession of it wherever found. About one month after the purchase of this property, delivery thereof was made, and it was installed in the plant of the purchaser. The contract reserving title was not recorded until the 15th day of April, 1908, about five months after delivery of the property. In April, 1908, a suit was instituted against the Probst Furniture Company to have the deed of trust in favor of Biggs and others declared fraudulent and preferential, and incidentally to have a receiver appointed, and, on April 27, 1908, Rufus Switzer and Paul W. Scott were appointed special receivers, and took charge of the property. On the 18th day of July, 1908, an order was entered in that suit for the sale of all of the property of the Probst Furniture Company, and such sale was made on the 7th day of October, 1908; C. R. Comer, trustee, becoming the purchaser. Comer was personally notified, at the time of the sale, of the plaintiff's claim of title and its intention to demand the possession of the property.

Later he conveyed the machines here in controversy to the Empire Furniture Company, the defendant, in whose possession they were at the date of the institution of this action. It is admitted that the balance of $400 due on the purchase money has not been paid, and also that the notes secured by the deed of trust were assigned to Comer, trustee, and by him to the Empire Furniture Company, prior to the institution of this action.

Had the Probst Furniture Company been the owner of the machines at the date of the execution of the deed of trust, superior title in the defendant would be clear, since it is a purchaser under a decree, ordering a sale of the property to satisfy liens. But it is rightly contended that the instrument created no legal lien upon the machines, since the grantor therein did not then own the property. It can be regarded as having done no more than create an agreement to give a lien upon that property to secure a debt. Such an agreement constitutes an equitable lien, but not a legal one. Upon these settled propositions, the defendant in error relies in support of its claim that the purchaser under the deed of trust obtained no right that a court of law can recognize or respect.

[1] That a mortgage or deed of trust upon personal property, to be obtained by the grantor after the execution thereof, passes no legal title is well settled. Horner-Gaylord Co. v. Fawcett, 50 W. Va. 487, 40 S. E. 564, 57 L. R. A. 869; Jones, Chat. Mort. § 138; 5 A. & E. Enc. L. 979. That it gives an equitable lien is equally well settled. Horner-Gaylord Co. v. Fawcett, supra; Jones, Chat. Mort. § 170; 5 A. & E. Enc. L. 982. This principle agrees with the interpretation and effect of imperfect mortgages and deeds of trust upon real estate. A defective deed of trust on land is good as against creditors and subsequent purchasers (Atkinson v. Miller, 84 W. Va. 115, 11 S. E. 1007, 9 L. R. A. 544), since it is justly regarded as a recordable contract to give a lien, and equity treats that as done which ought to have been done. Assuming these two machines to have remained personal property, agreeably to the contention of the defendant in error, and the deed of trust, in so far as it relates to them, to be unrecordable, the result must be the same, by force of section 3 of chapter 74 of the Code, making the buyer of personal property in possession thereof the owner for the protection of the rights of his creditors and subsequent purchasers from him without notice. As to them, the unrecorded reservation is nullified by the statute, and, though the deed of trust did not pass legal title to the trustee, nor make the cestui que trust legally a creditor or purchaser, the latter nevertheless acquired an equitable interest therein.

[2] Treated as a contract to give a lien, the instrument conferred a right in equity to charge the property with the debt, which the statute protected against the unrecorded reservation of title, just as the recordation of the defective deed on real estate saved the benefit of the contract in Atkinson v. Miller. The two species of property differ. To ascertain who is the owner of real estate, we must ordinarily go to the record; but to ascertain the ownership of personal property we look to the possession, unless there is a recorded reservation of title. When these machines came into the possession of the buyer, they at once became subject, in the view of a court of equity, to the operation of the deed of trust, and such court necessarily had the power to protect and vindicate the equitable right. The situation, relation, and effect were analogous to those in Huffard v. Akers, 52 W. Va. 21, 43 S. E. 124, in which an unrecorded reservation of title was postponed to the statutory lien for rent. Differing only in respect to the character of the lien, one being legal and the other equitable, the result must be the same, else a court of equity is powerless to enforce a right it recognizes. Besides, a mere equitable mortgage prevailed over creditors in Atkinson v. Miller, cited.

This conclusion harmonizes with the great weight of authority in this country, as will be seen by reference to Jones, Chat. Mort. § 173. Judge Story first elucidated and applied the principle in Mitchell v. Winslow, 2 Story, 630, Fed. Cas. No. 9,673, and it has since been adopted in most of the states. In Massachusetts, a contrary rule was applied in Moody v. Wright, 13 Metc. (54 Mass.) 17, 46 Am. Dec. 706, but now mortgages of personal property to be acquired in the future are, in that state, upheld against creditors of the mortgagor. Bennett v. Bailey, 150 Mass. 257, 22 N. E. 916; Wasserman v. McDonnell, 190 Mass. 326, 76 N. E. 969. In England, Lord Campbell held the right of an execution creditor superior to that of the mortgagee of after-acquired personal property, in Holroyd v. Marshall, 2 De G. F. & J. 596; but, in this, he was reversed by the House of Lords in 10 H. L. Cas. 191 (1862). In that case the doctrine was limited to property in respect to which courts of equity will specifically enforce contracts; but the American cases do not seem so to limit the application of the principle, and we perceive no basis for such a limitation, since there is no legal remedy by which the right can be enforced. The contract gives a mere equitable lien, enforceable only in a court of equity. It gives right to charge certain property with a debt, and that confers equity jurisdiction, founded upon lack or inadequacy of legal remedies.

The argument for defendant in error denies to the person for whose benefit the trust deed was made the status of purchaser or creditor, and the authorities here cited show this position to be true in a legal sense; but equity nevertheless accords him a right, and protects it. That right is described as an equitable lien, and remains so until it has been enforced; but it arises out of a legal agreement to give a lien. Since equity regards that as done which the party executing the contract was bound to do or ought to have done, the beneficiary is, no doubt, considered a purchaser. The decree treats him as having the status of a creditor secured by a valid deed of trust, who is a purchaser, within the meaning of the registry statutes. His right is of the same nature as that of an equitable mortgagee of real estate, who is regarded as a purchaser.

If the two machines, by annexation to the real estate, became part thereof, the right of the plaintiff in error is much clearer, for equity jurisdiction specifically to enforce contracts for rights in real estate is undoubted; but, as we think equity had jurisdiction to charge them as personal property, we deem it unnecessary to say whether they became real property.

[3,4] The purchaser at the judicial sale obtained this superior right of the creditor in the deed of trust. Hence he was not bound nor affected by either actual or constructive notice. The defendant in error waived or lost what would have been a superior right by its failure to record the contract. As it was not a party to the suit in equity, nor under any duty to go into that suit for adjudication of its claim, the question of title here depends, not upon the adjudication therein, as one against the defendant in error, except in so far as the decree became the basis of the transfer to the purchaser of a superior contractual right. Nor is the date of the institution of the equity suit, nor the stage of the proceedings at which the sale was ordered therein, nor the conditions under which it was ordered, material. If the property was sold to satisfy the equitable lien created by the deed of trust, the decree passed to the purchaser the superior right of the creditor, as perfected by the decree. If the bill to impeach the deed of trust for fraud was sustained, it avoided that instrument in favor of such parties only as attacked it upon the ground of fraud, and the plaintiff here was not one of them. If the deed of trust was adjudged to have created a preference in violation of the statute, that adjudication treated it as having been executed for the benefit of all the creditors. It was not, in any event, declared wholly void, so as to let in the reservation of title relied upon here.

For these reasons, the judgment complained of will be reversed, and judgment rendered here for the defendant, with costs in the court below, as in a case upon a demurrer to evidence.

FRANTZ et al. v. WYOMING COUNTY COURT et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Nov. 14, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. MANDAMUS (§ 23)—PERSONS ENTITLED TO RELIEF—INTEREST IN SUBJECT-MATTER—CITIZENS OR TAXPAYERS.

A citizen, taxpayer, or voter in any proper case may maintain mandamus to compel a public tribunal to perform a ministerial duty, imposed upon it by law in favor of the public without showing any special or pecuniary interest in the performance thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. § 56; Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

2. MANDAMUS (§ 23*)—PERSONS ENTITLED TO RELIEF—PETITIONERS.

If such duty arises upon the filing of a petition bearing the signatures of a large number of persons, and performance is refused, mandamus lies, at the instance of one or more of such petitioners, to compel performance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. § 55; Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

3. COUNTIES (§ 34*)—COUNTY SEAT—RELOCATION—SUBMISSION OF QUESTION TO VOTE—BOND.

The statutory bond, conditioned to pay the legal costs of a special election on the question of relocation of the county seat of a county, need not be tendered or filed with the petition for submission of such question. It suffices to give the bond at the term at which the petition is filed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 34-37; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

4. COUNTIES (§ 35*)—COUNTY SEAT—RELOCATION—SUBMISSION OF QUESTION TO VOTE—TIME FOR HOLDING.

The filing of a proper petition, in a year in which no general election is to be held, for submission of such question, requires submission thereof at a special election, even though, by reason of delay in filing the petition, the special election must occur in a year in which a general election will be held.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 38-45; Dec. Dig. § 35.*]

5. COUNTIES (§ 34*)—COUNTY SEAT—RELOCATION—SUBMISSION OF QUESTION TO VOTE—PROCEEDINGS.

Prevention of the filing of a petition for such an election at a regular session of a county court by a clandestine meeting and immediate adjournment of the term, with intent to prevent it, excuses failure to present or file the petition at such meeting, and also lack of a formal demand, and amounts to a refusal on the part of the court to receive and act upon the petition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 34-37; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

6. MANDAMUS (§ 81*)—SUBJECTS OF RELIEF—ACTS OF PUBLIC OFFICERS.

If a county court in regular session adjourn without performance of a ministerial duty it was bound by law to perform at such session, on behalf of the public, and with intent to avoid performance thereof, a citizen, desiring performance of such duty, may, by mandamus, compel such court to reconvene and perform it. Quoad the omitted duty, the term of court is deemed to continue until it has been performed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 138, 139; Dec. Dig. § 81.*]

Original proceeding by L. N. Frantz and others for mandamus to the County Court of Wyoming County and others. Peremptory writ granted.

M. F. Matheny, R. D. Bailey, and Farley, Sutphin & Ward, for petitioners. George P. Stewart, Pros. Atty., and Howard & Worrell, for respondents.

POFFENBARGER, J. [1] On this application for a peremptory writ of mandamus, to compel the county court of Wyoming county to reconvene, as in regular session, and permit the filing of a petition for an election on the question of relocation of the county seat of said county, and enter an order providing for such election, lack of pecuniary interest in the relators is relied upon as barring right to relief. Occasionally it is said in the text-books and decisions that pecuniary interest in the relator is essential (19 A. & E. Enc. L. 884; People v. Masonic Lodge, 98 Ill. 635; Payne v. Staunton, 55 W. Va. 202, 46 S. E. 927); but this generally occurs in those cases in which the relator seeks some alleged right in a corporation or a benefit society by mandamus. There are numerous instances in which we have granted the writ at the instance of relators having no pecuniary interest in the subject-matter. Doolittle v. County Court, 28 W. Va. 158; Brown v. County Court, 45 W. Va. 827, 32 S. E. 165; Morgan v. County Court, 53 W. Va. 372, 44 S. E. 182; Mann v. County Court, 58 W. Va. 651, 52 S. E. 776. Some of these cases were of the class to which this one belongs—applications by citizens for writs of mandamus to compel county courts to perform public functions concerning elections to relocate county seats. Any substantial interest, whether pecuniary or not, suffices in all cases in which the purpose of the writ is to compel performance of a public duty. Citizens, taxpayers, and voters in all proper cases may invoke the remedy to compel performance of a duty which a public officer or tribunal owes them, without showing any interest, other than that they are citizens, taxpayers, or voters, as the case may be. 26 Cyc. 404; Merrill on Mand. § 230. In some jurisdictions, private individuals are not allowed the aid of this writ to enforce performance of public duty, but that is not our rule. Where the courts do so hold, a special or pecuniary interest must be shown to enable a private individual to sue in mandamus. Failure to notice the two distinctions here noted may result in the invocation of inapplicable precedents and judicial expressions.

[2] The right of only 5 of the 987 petitioners to apply for this writ is also denied by the respondents. It is usual for one of the petitioners to ask for the writ on behalf of himself and all the others; but we do not regard this as essential. Equity principles require all persons interested in the subject-matter of an equity suit to be made parties; but those principles seem not to apply in mandamus. Payne v. Staunton, 55 W. Va. 202, 46 S. E. 927.

[3] Failure to tender with the petitions a bond, conditioned to pay all legal costs of holding the election, is relied upon as matter of defense. This bond must be given at the term of the court at which the election is ordered, but it is no part of the petition, nor need it be tendered therewith. Full compliance with the terms and spirit of the statute is effected by giving the bond at that term of court. Nothing more can be required.

[4] Right of the county court to postpone the election for four months, and so place it in the year 1912, in which a general election will occur, is invoked as a bar to the relief sought, in reliance upon the statutory requirement for submission of such question at a general election, if one is to be held in the year in which the petition is presented. This position is likewise clearly untenable, for the statute says, if the petition is filed in any year in which no general election is to be held, the question shall be submitted at a special election, to be called by the court and held not less than 60 days nor more than 4 months from the date of the order. The date of the filing of the petition, not of the election, determines the character and time of the election.

[5] Alleged refusal of the county court to permit tender, presentation, or filing of the petition and denial of the charge raise the main issue. It was circulated and completed for filing at the regular term of the court, commencing on the 4th day of September, 1911. As that was a holiday, the statute authorized postponement of the sitting until the next day, and no meeting was held until after dark and under circumstances strongly indicating intentional secrecy. No business was transacted. No opportunity was allowed any person to be heard. Though many citizens had come to the county seat on business with the court, it did not convene until all, or practically all of them, had returned to their homes, and such as remained, if any, were not advised of the secret meeting. Adjournment "until the first day of the next term" was the sum total of the court's action, and the only ground or cause shown therefor was notice of an application for an injunction against the court, to prevent the issuance of certain orders for work, to be made at Beckley, in Raleigh county, on September 7, 1911, a journey to which place required one day. This notice, together with necessity for appearance to resist the application, was recited in the adjourning order. Had the court remained in session over Tuesday, September 5th, the members would have had the 6th for the journey. An adjournment could have been taken until Friday or the following Monday. Mann v. County Court, 58 W. Va. 651, 52 S. E. 776. No necessity for adjournment sine die or justification thereof is shown, but such adjournment, if acquiesced in, would have defeated the election. Intent to bring about this result is fairly inferable from the adjournment, followed by a special term for transaction of certain business which ought to have been disposed of at the regular term, but allowing no opportunity for the filing of the petitions. The conduct of the court is hardly reconcilable to any other hypothesis. Having considered all the evidence respecting the intent and motive of the adjournment, we have no doubt that its purpose was to prevent the filing of the petition.

Upon this state of facts, lack of demand by the petitioners and refusal by the court to comply therewith are insisted upon. Of course, there was no formal demand. The court prevented it by its clandestine meeting and adjournment. The petitioners were upon the ground ready to make the demand at the time appointed therefor by law, and would have made it, had not their attempt to do so been frustrated in the manner shown. While this was not a technical, formal demand, it was, under the circumstances, an obvious equivalent thereof. The law does not require an impossibility on the part of an applicant for performance of public duty. Indeed, many authorities hold that no demand therefor need be made. 26 Cyc. 181; 19 A. & E. Enc. L. 759, 760. Whether this is the correct principle, we deem it unnecessary to say, inasmuch as an effort to make it is beyond question. The filing of the petition was a requisite precedent act on the part of the petitioners. Likely that would have been a sufficient demand, since the statute makes it the duty of the court, upon the filing of the petition, to order an election. Prevention of performance of this precedent condition excused it, just as an actual tender of money is excused, if the party to whom the tender should have been made signified his intention not to receive it. No reason is perceived why this principle, so generally recognized and enforced in other proceedings and relations, should not apply here. It is a salutary and necessary one. But for it, parties would be put to the trouble of vain and useless acts, and rights defeated by pretexts, subterfuges, and technicalities. That a formal demand is not necessary, and is often excused by the conduct of the party or tribunal upon whom it would otherwise have been necessary to make it, is asserted by the following authorities: Attorney General v. Boston, 123 Mass. 460; Railroad Co. v. Commissioners, 49 Kan. 399, 30 Pac. 456; People v. Mahoney, 30 Mich. 100; Morton, Bliss & Co. v. Comptroller General, 4 S. C. 430; State v. Baushausen, 49 Neb. 558, 68 N. W. 950; United States v. Auditors

(C. O.) 8 Fed. 473; Austin v. Cahill, 99 Tex. 172, 88 S. W. 542, 89 S. W. 552.

The clandestine meeting and adjournment of the term also amounted to a refusal to perform the duty imposed upon the court by the statute in behalf of the petitioners. A formal and express refusal to act is not necessary. Any conduct on the part of the officer or tribunal, under a duty to perform, signifying unequivocal intention not to do so, amounts to a refusal. Merrill on Mand. § 225; State v. Trustees, 4 Nev. 400; State v. Wrightson, 56 N. J. Law, 126, 28 Atl. 56, 22 L. R. A. 548; State v. Rotwitt, 15 Mont. 29, 37 Pac. 845; Brandt v. Murphy, 68 Miss. 84, 8 South. 296; State v. Board, 38 N. J. Law, 259; Goodwin v. Railway Co., 13 U. O. C. P. 254; People v. Supervisors, 20 N. Y. 252. It has been held that refusal or conduct amounting thereto, in advance of the time of performance, justifies the awarding of the writ in advance of such time (Brandt v. Murphy, supra; State v. Wrightson, supra; State v. Rotwitt, supra); and also that unreasonable delay, with the manifest intention not to perform, will sustain an application for the writ. Mandamus, though an extraordinary writ, cannot be averted or denied upon unsubstantial and pretextual grounds. It is a highly remedial writ. Though extraordinary in the sense that it is designed to give relief under conditions which make the delay of ordinary remedies highly prejudicial or such remedies wholly inapplicable, when such a case arises, the remedy is not to be barred by shifts, devices, or subterfuges. If it could be, it would prove ineffectual, in many instances, to accomplish its obvious purpose.

In opposition to the inference of intent to prevent the filing of the petitions, and so avoid the sequential duty imposed upon the court, lack of evidence of knowledge on the part of the court of the purpose of the petitioners to file the same is insisted upon. Ignorance of the circulation thereof, on the part of the members of the court, is hardly probable. They must have gone all over the county, and the fact of their circulation been notorious. Besides, the uselessness of an adjournment of a regular term of the court without the transaction of any business whatever, imports purpose and design to prevent the transaction of some sort of business. However, we need not rest our conclusion upon mere inference. There is positive testimony to the admission of knowledge on the part of one or more of the commissioners of the existence of the petitions, and also of purpose and intent on their part to prevent the filing thereof in the manner in which it was done, namely, by a clandestine meeting and adjournment of the term.

[8] In response to the argument against the power of this court to reconvene the county court, for the purpose of permitting the filing of the petition and action thereon, it suffices to quote the following declaration of law in Mann v. County Court, 58 W. Va. 651, 52 S. E. 776: "A court or other tribunal, charged with the performance of a mandatory duty at a given term or session, which adjourns without having performed such duty, may be reconvened and compelled to perform such duty, by mandamus, and the act, when so done, will be deemed to have been performed at the term or session at which the law required it to be done." In that case, we held that, as to the matter of action upon a petition for an election on the question of relocation of a county seat, there had been no adjournment of the regular term. The court was still in session for the purposes of that petition, provided proper steps were promptly taken to compel it to act upon the same. The county court and parties in that case presumably had no difficulty in following our direction, since this court heard no more of the controversy; and, if the parties interested in this one, are disposed to obey the mandate of this court in good faith, they will have no difficulty in complying therewith. It is only necessary for them to agree upon as early a date as may be practicable, and meet and allow the petition to be filed, and act upon it in accordance with law. How they shall proceed is very clearly indicated in Doolittle v. County Court, 28 W. Va. 158, and Mann v. County Court, 58 W. Va. 651, 52 S. E. 776. These directions need not be repeated here.

For the reasons stated, a peremptory writ of mandamus will be awarded, commanding the county court of Wyoming county and the commissioners thereof forthwith to reconvene and permit the petitions, mentioned and described in these proceedings, to be filed and act upon the same in accordance with law.

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 130*)—COMPUTATION—COMMENCEMENT OF ACTION—NEW ACTION AFTER DISMISSAL.

One whose action, commenced within the time allowed by law, has been erroneously dismissed on a plea in abatement for variance between the writ and the declaration, after refusal to permit an amendment of the writ, may bring a new action, having the same purpose as the one dismissed, within a year after the date of dismissal, though after his right of action would have been barred by limitation, had the dismissed action not been instituted.

Error to Circuit Court, Raleigh County.

Action by C. C. Ryan against the Piney Coal & Coke Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed and remanded.

T. N. Read and A. A. Lilly, for plaintiff in error. Watts, Davis & Davis, for defendant in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. For a variance between the writ and declaration the plaintiff's action for damages for a personal injury was dismissed, the court having refused leave to amend the writ, which was in assumpsit, so as to make it correspond with the declaration, which was in trespass on the case.

Soon after the dismissal, but more than a year after the date of the injury, the plaintiff instituted a new action in trespass on the case. In the declaration, he averred the dismissal of his first action and the cause thereof, and relies upon section 19 of chapter 104 (section 3512) of the Code of 1906, allowing an additional one year in which to bring a new action in case of dismissal of one commenced within due time on a ground which does not preclude a new action for the same cause, or by reason of any other cause, which could not be pleaded in bar of an action. To this new action, the defendant interposed another plea, founded upon the dismissal and denying the application of the statute relied upon as excepting the case from the application of the general statute of limitations. It also plead the statute of limitations. To the plea of the statute of limitations, there was a replication. Having overruled an objection to the plea designated as plea No. 2, the court determined the issue on said plea in favor of the defendant and dismissed said second action.

The construction of the statute involved has been fairly well settled in Lawrence v. Coal Co., 48 W. Va. 139, 35 S. E. 925, denying the benefit thereof to a party who has taken a voluntary nonsuit or the equivalent thereof, Ketterman v. Railroad Co., 48 W. Va. 606, 37 S. E. 683, allowing it in a case of dismissal for a fatal defect in the summons, and Tompkins v. Life Ins. Co., 53 W. Va. 479, 44 S. E. 439, 62 L. R. A. 489, 97 Am. St. Rep. 1006, granting it to a party whose action, commenced in the wrong court, had been dismissed for want of jurisdiction. In the first and last of these three cases, several decisions of other courts, construing similar statutes, are reviewed and analyzed. Our interpretation of the statute, based upon its terms and the general principle and object of statutes of its class, as defined by the courts and text-writers, makes its application depend largely upon the good faith and diligence of the party invoking it.

We are of the opinion that the plaintiff in error is within the spirit, as well as the letter, of the statute. As the dismissal was the result of court action, and not abandonment by the plaintiff, it was involuntary, even though it may have been erroneous, by reason of refusal of the court to permit amendment of the writ to make it correspond with the declaration, as authorized by section 15 of chapter 125 (section 3835) of the Code (Barnes v. Grafton, 61 W. Va. 408, 410, 56 S. E. 608), and the error acquiesced in. Every dismissal not purely voluntary, nor attributable solely to the negligence of the plaintiff, makes a case within the excepting statute. Here we have the elements of court action over the protest of the plaintiff, and fault on the part of the court alone, the plaintiff having offered to amend.

Liberality in the construction of this statute is warranted by its remedial character and also by the nature of its subject-matter. A party whose action has once been commenced and then dismissed occupies naturally a position radically different from one who never sued within the period allowed for action by the statute of limitations. There can be no presumption of abandonment of claim, on which the statute is founded, in his case. His dismissed action negatives that presumption. This is the obvious basis of the differentiation made by the Legislature. Naturally, therefore, only voluntary dismissals, or equivalents thereof, are excluded from the benefit of the saving section of the statute. To a limited extent, the common law, unaided by statute, made an exception on this ground. 25 Cyc. 1313.

We reverse the judgment, sustain the objection to defendant's special plea No. 2 and strike it out, and remand the case for further proceedings.

DUTY v. CHESAPEAKE & O. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 28, 1911. Rehearing Denied
Jan. 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1040*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—RULING ON PLEADINGS.

If the good count or counts of a declaration, and the evidence thereunder be sufficient to support the verdict, the judgment thereon will not be vitiated by the error of the trial court, if any, in overruling the demurrer to a bad count, when it clearly appears that the defendant has not been prejudiced thereby.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4089-4105; Dec. Dig. § 1040.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 314*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—PLEADING.

The first count of the declaration in this case, though omitting to allege, as did the second, that defendant failed to stop its train at the station where plaintiff offered herself as a passenger, and was injured, for a sufficient length of time to enable her to get aboard, and to a place of safety, held good on demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 314.*]

3. PARTIES (§ 95*)—AMENDMENT—STATUTORY PROVISION.

Where there are two corporations of the same name, one created under the laws of one state, the other of another, but the corporation intended to be sued, has in fact been sued, and duly served with process, but on the trial plaintiff discovers that in one count of his declaration he has erroneously alleged the wrong state under the laws of which defendant was incorporated, it is not error for the trial court, after non-suit suffered, and set aside, on his motion, to permit plaintiff to amend his declaration by striking out the erroneous allegation. Such an amendment is authorized by section 14, chapter 125, Code 1906.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Parties, Cent. Dig. §§ 160-166; Dec. Dig. § 95.*]

4. PLEADING (§ 248*)—AMENDMENT—NEW CAUSE OF ACTION.

Such an amendment is not the introduction of new cause of action against the defendant actually sued.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 686-709; Dec. Dig. § 248.*]

5. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 130*)—COMPUTATION OF LIMITATIONS—COMMENCEMENT OF ACTION—AMENDMENT OF PLEADING.

Nor will a non-suit thus suffered and set aside, amount to a voluntary abandonment or discontinuance of the old suit, and the beginning of a new action, so as to entitle defendant to have its plea of the statute of limitations applied to the date of the amendment, and not to the date of the writ commencing the suit. Section 12, chapter 127, and section 19, chapter 104, Code 1906, are decisive of this point.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 553-566; Dec. Dig. § 130.*]

6. TRIAL (§ 139*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—EFFECT.

The verdict for the plaintiff is not contrary to the overwhelming weight and preponderance of the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 338-341; Dec. Dig. § 139.*]

7. CARRIERS (§ 320*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

The questions of the manner in which plaintiff sustained her injuries; the reasonableness of the stop made at defendant's railway station; whether plaintiff was attempting to board a moving train at the time of her injuries, and whether defendant was guilty of negligence in not seeing her and seeing that she got on the train, and to a place of safety, before giving the signals to go ahead, all depended on conflicting evidence and attendant circumstances, and were properly submitted to the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 320.*]

8. CARRIERS (§§ 287, 303*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—TAKING UP PASSENGERS.

It is actionable negligence for a conductor or other servant of a railroad company to start a train while passengers are obviously in the act of getting on it, or alighting therefrom.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1154-1166, 1224-1243; Dec. Dig. §§ 287, 303.*]

9. TRIAL (§ 260*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS—INSTRUCTIONS ALREADY GIVEN.

It is not error to reject instructions the subject of which has been substantially covered by other instructions given.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 651-659; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

10. NEW TRIAL (§ 99*)—APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 981*)—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT.

If the affidavits on which a motion for a new trial for after discovered evidence is based, are rebutted by counter affidavits, it is for the court below exercising a sound judicial discretion to say whether a new trial should be granted, and its judgment should not be disturbed, except for plain abuse of that discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 201-207; Dec. Dig. § 99.* Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3876; Dec. Dig. § 981.*]

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

11. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT (§ 81*)—REINSTATEMENT—"IN THE SAME MANNER."

In Code 1906, c. 127, § 12, providing that all causes in which orders of dismissal or orders of nonsuit have been set aside and the cause reinstated shall remain on the docket and be proceeded with "in the same manner" as if the order had never been made, the quoted phrase means with all the rights preserved, the same as if a nonsuit had never been suffered.

Error to Circuit Court, Cabell County.

Action by Amanda S. Duty against the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Simms, Enslow, Fitzpatrick & Baker, for plaintiff in error. Marcum & Marcum, for defendant in error.

MILLER, J. Defendant by writ of error seeks reversal of the judgment below against it for five thousand dollars, damages for injuries alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff while a passenger, at West Hamlin, in Lincoln county, on the night of September 24, 1907.

[1] The first point of error is the overruling of the demurrer to the amended declaration and to each count thereof. This declaration contains two counts. The second count, among other things, avers the duty and the breach thereof by defendant to stop its train at its said station, on the night in question, a reasonable length of time to enable plaintiff to get aboard and to reach a place of safety. This count is concededly good, but it is insisted that the first count, which omits this averment, but which avers other duties of defendant to plaintiff, and the willful, wanton, reckless, and negligent disregard thereof, resulting in the injuries complained of, is nevertheless fatally bad, demanding reversal of the judgment and that a new trial should be awarded.

The law on this subject, however, is that if the good count and the evidence thereunder, be sufficient to sustain the verdict and judgment, the error, if any, in not, on demurrer, suppressing the bad count, will be disregarded by an appellate court, if it clearly appears that the action of the court on the bad count and the evidence, if any, admitted thereunder, has not resulted in an excessive verdict, or that the defendant has not been otherwise prejudiced thereby, this upon the same principle that where there is but one count, which contains good and bad matter, and a general demurrer thereto is properly overruled, the bad will not after verdict vitiate the good, unless prejudice due to the bad matter and evidence thereunder has resulted to the defendant. Robrecht v. Marling, 29 W. Va. 765, 773, 2 S. E. 827, and cases cited; 6 Ency. Pl. & Prac. 367, citing, at page 368, numerous Alabama and Indiana decisions, sustaining the proposition.

[2] But is the first count bad for omitting the alleged primary and paramount averment? It avers facts sufficient to establish the relationship of passenger and carrier; the duty of defendant thereafter to use all due and proper care, caution, skill and diligence in and about the operation and movement of its locomotives, engines, cars, coaches and trains and so forth, so as to prevent and avoid all hurts, injuries, accidents, and dangers to plaintiff, and to carry her safely and securely to destination; the disregard of those duties, in that while at the instance and request of defendant, she was attempting to board the defendant's regular passenger train and the car or coach thereof at said station, to be carried safely to destination, and while said train was standing motionless, and while she in the exercise of all due and proper care and diligence for her own safety and security, the defendant, its officers, agents and servants, without ring of bell, blow of whistle, or giving the usual and customary warnings and signals, or warning or signal of any kind, whatsoever, wantonly, recklessly, carelessly, and negligently caused said train and the car or coach whereon plaintiff was then and there in the act of boarding, to be suddenly and quickly and without warning started and jerked forward and whereby she was then and there hurled and thrown with great force and violence from the platform and from the step of the car or coach which she was then and there in the act of boarding, as aforesaid, resulting in the injuries of which she complains. Does this state a good cause of action? It is insisted that it does not, for the reason noted.

To sustain this proposition Snyder v. Wheeling Electrical Co., 43 W. Va. 661, 28 S. E. 733, 39 L. R. A. 499, 64 Am. St. Rep. 922, is mainly relied on. We do not think this case supports the contention of counsel; quite the contrary. If in disregard of its alleged duties defendant, as this count avers, while plaintiff was in the act of boarding the train, without notice as alleged, wantonly, recklessly, carelessly and negligently caused its train and coach in which, in the exercise of due and proper care and diligence, she was so attempting to enter, to be suddenly started and jerked forward, causing her injuries, it was guilty of actionable negligence. The count states with reasonable certainty the main or primary acts of omission and commission doing the damage, within the rule of the case cited, namely the duty of defendant, while plaintiff was so in the act of boarding its train not to so wantonly, recklessly and carelessly and negligently move its train as to injure her. Whether or not defendant did so offend might, on the trial, depend on whether a stop of sufficient length was made, and whether defendant's servants saw or reasonably ought to have seen plaintiff in her place of danger when giving the signal to go ahead, but the want of averment of that fact did not in our judgment render the count bad on demurrer.

But even if the count be bad, we can plainly see, the second count being concededly good, that defendant was not prejudiced by the action of the court on the first count, and that the judgment ought not to be reversed for any error therein. No evidence was admitted under the first count, not admissible under the second, and nothing could have been added by way of damages under the first count not provable under the second count, wherefore defendant could not have been prejudiced.

[3] The next point is that the court erroneously permitted plaintiff to withdraw a juror, and on a non-suit suffered, but set aside the same day on her motion, to amend her declaration by striking out of the first count the words, "State of West Virginia," descriptive of the corporation sued, leaving the corporate name as described in the writ executed upon the defendant company, and as described in the second count, Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company, a corporation. It is insisted that although the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company, a corporation under the laws of the State of Virginia, was in fact the corporation sued, and intended to be sued, and the one served with process, the error of description in the first count, committed plaintiff to the West Virginia corporation, and that she could not of right amend her declaration, as she was permitted to do, without suffering the consequences of a new suit brought as of the date of the filing of the amended declaration, and to which the statute of limitations interposed by the defendant, the Virginia corporation, could be properly pleaded; also that the amendment permitted was equivalent to stating a new cause of action to which the statute of limitation might also be properly applied. The evidence relied on by defendant in the court below in support of its motion to strike out the amended declaration, shows, we think, that neither the words "State of West Virginia," stricken out, nor the words "State of Virginia" constitute any part or parts of the corporate names of either of these corporations. Each corporation has the same corporate name, the one sued being organized under the laws of Virginia, the other under the laws of West Virginia, the latter not being the owner or operator of the railroad at the time plaintiff is alleged to have sustained her injuries. If we should treat the words "State of West Virginia" as part of the corporate name, and a misnomer, the right corporation having been sued and served with process, the variance would not be fatal; nor, by section 14, chapter 125, Code 1906, the proper subject of a plea in abatement. Under that section the declaration would be amendable on mere motion of either party. Bank v. Distilling Co., 41 W. Va. 530, 23 S. E. 792, 56 Am. St. Rep. 878; Grocery Co. v. Brewing Co., 60 W. Va. 281, 54 S. E. 349; Stout v. B. & O. R. Co., 64 W. Va. 502, 63 S. E. 317, 131 Am. St. Rep. 940.

[4] The other argument based on the theory of a new cause of action introduced by the amendment is, in our opinion, wholly untenable. The cause of action is the same in both pleadings. Defendant knew it was the corporation sued, intended to be sued, and described in the writ, and that it was properly served with this writ. It is true perhaps, as a general rule, as decided in the cases cited, that the introduction by way of amendment of a new and distinct cause of action, will not prevent the running of the statute of limitations, except from the date of such amendment; but we have no such case here. This is not a case where by amendment a different party has been substituted for the defendant actually sued; but one in which the name of the party actually sued and served with process has been corrected. Such a case is clearly within our statute, and the decisions cited, and within the rule of Mill Co. v. Hobdy, 165 Ala. 411, 51 South. 871, 138 Am. St. Rep. 73, one of the cases relied on by defendant.

[5] But was a new cause of action begun by the amendment and non-suit suffered and set aside, to which the statute of limitations could properly be replied? In affirmance of this proposition, counsel rely on the Virginia cases of Manuel v. N. & W. Ry. Co., 99 Va. 188, 87 S. E. 957, and Wickham v. Green, 111 Va. 199, 68 S. E. 259, construing the statute of that state, the first, a new suit, brought after a non-suit voluntarily suffered, but not set aside; the second a suit dismissed by the clerk at rules for want of pleadings, and reinstated on motion at the subsequent term of the court. In both cases the actions were held to be barred. These decisions were rested on the statute of Virginia, corresponding to section 19, chapter 104, Code 1906, of this state. In Tompkins v. Insurance Co., 53 W. Va. 479, 484, 44 S. E. 439, 62 L. R. A. 489, 97 Am. St. Rep. 1006, the difference between our broader and more comprehensive statute, and the statute of Virginia, and the statutes of some other states, is distinctly noted, and the Virginia decisions cited are regarded as uncontrolling. Lawrence v. Coal Co., 48 W. Va. 139, 35 S. E. 925, distinguished in Tompkins v. Insurance Co., supra, involved a voluntary abandonment of the first suit, after dismissal at rules, and new suit subsequently brought. In the recent case of Ryan v. Piney Coal & Coke Co., 73 S. E. 330, decided at the present term, and not yet officially reported, we had occasion, in construing our statute, to review our former decisions on the subject. We held the statute broad enough in its application to cover the case of a new suit brought after a former one dismissed for variance between the writ and declaration, and refusal of the court to allow an amendment.

[11] But why need we further pursue this question? Our statute, section 12, chapter 127, Code 1906, originating with chapter 132, Acts 1868, unlike any statute of Virginia, specifically provides, that all causes in which orders of dismissal or orders of non-suit have been set aside, and the same reinstated, "shall remain upon the docket, and be proceeded with in the same manner as if the order had never been made." True this statute says "in the same manner"; but rightly interpreted it clearly means with all the rights preserved the same as if a non-suit had never been suffered. The statute is remedial, and is entitled, under well known canons, to liberal construction, and read in the light of section 19, c. 104, Code 1906, another remedial statute, it should be given the construction indicated.

The next point is that over the defendant's objection, the court below admitted improper evidence. This point is made with respect to the whole of the evidence of Doctors Solter and Turner, motion to exclude which it is claimed was overruled. If such motion was ever made we have been unable to find it in the record. Attention is not directed to any particular portion or portions of this evidence which in the judgment of counsel ought to have been excluded. The generality of the objection does not require us to give it consideration. But counsel say that the motion to exclude, which we fail to find in the record, should have been sustained on the rules and principles of C. & O. Ry. Co. v. Wiley, 134 Ky. 461, 121 S. W. 402; McKormick v. West Bay City, 110 Mich. 265, 68 N. W. 148, and Comstock v. Township of Georgetown, 137 Mich. 541, 100 N. W. 788. The particular rules of these cases supposed to have been violated by the alleged action of the court, are not pointed out. We are left in the dark, as the court below evidently was, if such motion was made, justifying it in denying the motion. We have read the evidence of these witnesses with reference to the authorities cited, and we can see no substantial infraction of the rules of evidence enunciated in those cases. The evidence relates mainly to the treatment of the plaintiff by these witnesses, from the time of her supposed injuries, the history, symptoms, and progress of her disease and their opinions based thereon, as to its cause. One rule of McKormick v. West Bay City, which may possibly have been in the mind of counsel, is that where a physician is called to examine a plaintiff in an action for personal injuries, for the express purpose of giving testimony, his voluntary exclamations of pain and the like are incompetent evidence; but no such case is presented by the evidence of these witnesses. Much of the evidence went in without objection by defendant's counsel. We perceive no substantial error in its admission.

[8] Next, it is said that the evidence of the plaintiff is overborne and buried under the preponderating evidence of the defendant, and that on this ground, notwithstanding the conflict, the court below, as proposed by defendant's instruction number 1, should have directed a verdict for it, and after verdict should have set the same aside on its motion to award a new trial. This point is directed to two distinct portions of the evidence: First, it is claimed that the evidence of plaintiff's witnesses, doctors Turner and Solter, relating to the nature of plaintiff's injuries, the causes, and results, and particularly their opinion, at the time of the trial, that she was suffering from locomotor ataxia, was completely demolished and overriden by the evidence of some six other physicians, most, if not all, of them employees of the defendant, and who had never treated plaintiff, or made any physical examination of her or her injuries, but gave it as their opinion, based on the evidence of the plaintiff's witnesses, and what they had seen of plaintiff at the trial, that she was not then suffering from locomotor ataxia. We are unable to agree with counsel. True there is conflict, but it was for the jury, and not for the court to judge of its weight and credibility; the number of witnesses is not controlling. Defendant's witnesses, as they admit, had never had the opportunity to examine or treat plaintiff, as plaintiff's witnesses had done, and they did not attempt to speak with the same personal knowledge or accuracy as Doctors Turner and Solter.

[7] The other class of evidence to which counsel would apply their theory of overwhelming preponderance is: (a) that relating to the manner in which plaintiff's alleged injuries were received; (b) that relating to the reasonableness of stop made at West Hamlin on the night in question, and (c) that relating to defendant's claim that plaintiff attempted to get aboard the train while it was in motion, and thereby contributed to her injuries, depriving her of right of recovery. It is conceded that the (a) class of evidence is conflicting. It might reasonably be said to be one-sided, for defendant's witnesses profess not to have seen plaintiff as she was attempting to board the train. Plaintiff, her husband and another witness all agree, that these injuries were sustained substantially as alleged in the declaration. We need not further consider this point.

Next, as to the evidence relating to the reasonableness of the stop, and that relating to contributory negligence. It is insisted that this case is clearly controlled by Hoylman v. Kanawha & Michigan Ry. Co., 65 W. Va. 264, 64 S. E. 536, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 741, and the rules and principles of Louisville, H. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Coons, 76 S. W. 45, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 509; C. B. & Q. R. R. Co. v. Landauer, 36 Neb. 642, 54 N. W. 976; C. B. & Q. R. Co. v. Lampman (Wyo.) 104 Pac. 533, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 217; Hurt v. St. L. & I. M. & S. Ry. Co., 94 Mo. 255, 7 S. W. 1, 4 Am. St. Rep. 374; Raben v. Central Iowa Ry. Co., 73 Iowa, 579, 35 N. W. 645, 5 Am. St. Rep. 708; Pa. R. R. Co. v. Kilgore, 32 Pa. 292, 72 Am. Dec. 787, and Shealey v. S. C. & G. Ry. Co., 67 S. C. 61, 45 S. E. 119. We do not think the Hoylman Case controls this one. In that case there was no conflict in the evidence as to the reasonableness of the stop, or as to the negligence of Porter who was killed. In this case there is conflicting evidence; the witnesses for the defendant do not agree as to the exact length of the stop, except in saying that it was longer than usual. But the train was about two hours late at West Hamlin; it was of unusual length, being composed of some eight coaches, including the baggage coach, and heavily loaded with passengers returning from a circus at Huntington that day, and an unusual number got off at West Hamlin. Plaintiff and her husband with six small children were destined for Big Creek, a station east of West Hamlin. Both testify, and they are not contradicted, that they had been waiting for a long time for the belated train, and that as soon as the train whistled for the station, they went out promptly, and on its arrival at the station presented themselves at the place between the smoking car and the coach immediately in the rear of it, where passengers for that station were alighting, near the lower end of the platform, each carrying one of the smaller children, and directing the others; that as soon as the passengers for that station had alighted, they proceeded at once to get aboard, the husband with one child in his arms, and one or two of the other children going in first, and who succeeded in getting up on the platform and into the coach, the wife and plaintiff with the child in her arms, and the other children following closely behind. Plaintiff testifies and she is corroborated by her husband and her witness Wilkinson, present, that while she was in the act of getting on the train with her right foot on the lower step, and holding on to the hand rail with her released hand, the train and the car on which she was then standing, without warning or signal, gave a lurch forward, jerking her loose and backwards against the car, throwing her to the ground. These witnesses distinctly say that the train was not in motion when Mrs. Duty thus attempted to get on the train, and that she and her husband started right on the train, as soon as the passengers for West Hamlin got off. The evidence of defendant relied on is that of the two conductors and the brakeman in charge of the train. Conductor Cowherd in charge of the three front coaches, was standing up on the front platform of the smoking car, between it and the baggage car, and concededly was not in a position to see plaintiff with her husband and children attempting to board the train. The brakeman claims to have been standing on the station platform, about opposite Conductor Cowherd, or about midway of the smoking car, as to which the evidence is not very clear; but he does not appear to have been giving attention to the passengers getting off and on the train where plaintiff was attempting to get on. Armstrong the conductor in charge of the rear coaches testifies that after he got the passengers off his coaches, which stood far back from the station, opposite freight cars on another track, he walked forward; that he could see Walker, the brakeman, but did not see plaintiff and her children attempting to get aboard the train; and Walker the brakeman professes to have seen Armstrong, and both profess to have had a full view along the entire length of the train; yet both say they did not see plaintiff and her husband with their large family in the act of getting aboard when giving the signals to go ahead. It was dark and the trainmen had their lanterns; but if Armstrong and Walker could see each other it seems almost incredible that they did not see or could not while looking along the train, as they profess to have been, have plainly seen this family in the act of getting on the train. Whether they could or did, and whether a sufficient stop was made, and whether plaintiff attempted to get on the train after it started, were, we think, under all the evidence in the case, peculiarly questions of fact for jury decision.

[8] Most, if not all, the cases cited and relied on by counsel for defendant, were actions for damages sustained by passengers while alighting from trains in motion, after reasonable stops made, where, as in our case of Hoylman v. Railway Co., supra, the rule is, that the carrier will not be liable unless the circumstances indicate or cause the trainmen to suspect, in the exercise of reasonable diligence, that a passenger has not reached a place of safety, so as to be in danger if the train is started. The rule perhaps would not be different, as indicated in the Hoylman case, in actions for damages for injuries sustained while attempting to get on moving trains. The rule is clearly stated in 5 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 578, one of the authorities cited and relied upon by defendant's counsel, as follows: "It is universally held to be negligence for the conductor or other servant of a railroad company to start a train while passengers are obviously in the act of getting on the train or alighting therefrom." The numerous decisions cited in the footnotes fully support the text. One of them, Texas & P. Ry. Co. v. Gardner, 114 Fed. 186, 52 C. C. A. 142, holds, that it is negligence to start a railroad train from a station, while a passenger is actually getting on board, regardless of the length of the stop. And in Kulman v. Erie R. Co., 65 N. J. Law, 241, 47 Atl. 497, it is held, that where the evidence, as in the case at bar, is conflicting, the question of the reasonableness of the stop; or whether the train was in motion when the plaintiff stepped upon the lowest step; and whether the circumstances were such as called for the exercise of reasonable diligence upon the part of defendant's servants, to see that the plaintiff had reached a place of safety, are all questions of fact to be determined by the jury, and that a motion for an involuntary non-suit was properly refused. Our own case of Normille v. Wheeling Traction Co., 57 W. Va. 132, 49 S. E. 1030, 68 L. R. A. 901, is also authority in support of this proposition. Our conclusion is that the court below did not err in refusing to set aside the verdict for want of sufficient evidence to support it.

[9] Another point is that the court improperly rejected defendant's instructions number 5 and 8. These instructions are based upon the theory that the plaintiff attempted to board the train while it was in motion. There is little evidence to support this theory. The evidence clearly shows that the entire family of the plaintiff was in the act of boarding the train at one and the same time, the husband preceding the wife, she following him in close succession. But conceding that defendant was entitled to instructions upon this theory, the law applicable to the facts in the case was fully covered by other instructions given on its behalf and there is no error.

[10] Lastly, it is claimed that the court erred in refusing to set aside the verdict on the ground of newly discovered evidence. The motion of the defendant to set aside the verdict on this ground, was supported by the affidavits of two women to the effect, that in December, 1907, following the accident, plaintiff had admitted to them, that she had not been seriously injured, but that upon the advice of counsel she had concluded to simulate injuries, for the purposes of this suit. These witnesses are directly contradicted by affidavits of the plaintiff and her husband, corroborated by the affidavit of her counsel. The court below overruled the motion. We are only called upon here to say whether the court below abused its discretion. We cannot say so; and not being able to see that there was it is our duty to overrule the point. 29 Cyc. 904; Trimble v. Tantlinger, 104 Iowa, 665, 69 N. W. 1045, 74 N. W. 25; Thompson v. Thompson, 88 Cal. 110, 25 Pac. 962; Good- ell v. Hall, 112 Ga. 435, 37 S. E. 725; Grace v. McKinney, 112 Ga. 425, 37 S. E. 737.

Finding no substantial error the judgment must be affirmed.

ROBINSON v. BOARD OF EDUCATION OF DISTRICT OF CABIN CREEK.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Dec. 5, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. ASSUMPSIT, ACTION OF (§ 19*)—PLEADING—DECLARATION.

Common counts in assumpsit, otherwise good on demurrer, are not rendered bad and subject to demurrer, because it may appear from a special count of the declaration that the contract, pleaded and relied on therein, is executory and not provable under the common counts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assumpsit, Action of, Cent. Dig. §§ 81-99; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

2. ASSUMPSIT, ACTION OF (§ 19*)—PLEADING—DECLARATION.

Nor will such common counts be rendered demurrable, because by reference to the bill of particulars filed with the declaration, it appears that the same is for services contracted for, but not yet rendered, under an executory contract, pleaded in the special count. A bill of particulars is no part of the declaration. Riley v. Jarvis, 43 W. Va. 43, 26 S. E. 366; Clarke v. O. R. R. Co., 39 W. Va. 732, 20 S. E. 696.

3. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 63*)—OFFICERS—DISTRICT SUPERINTENDENT—DISCHARGE—REMEDIES.

A teacher employed as district superintendent, by the board of education thereof, as provided by section 163, c. 45, Code Supp. 1909 (section 163, c. 27, Acts 1908), may immediately upon his discharge without good cause, or the repudiation of the contract by such board, sue for damages for a breach of the contract by defendant. Rhoades v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 49 W. Va. 494, 39 S. E. 209, 55 L. R. A. 170, 87 Am. St. Rep. 826; Cutter v. Gillette, 163 Mass. 95, 39 N. E. 1010; Davis v. Grand Rapids Furn. Co., 41 W. Va. 717, 24 S. [Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. § 152; Dec. Dig. § 63.*]

4. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 63*)—OFFICERS—DISTRICT SUPERINTENDENT—EMPLOYMENT.

The special count of the declaration in this case, otherwise good, charging among other things, that the board of education of the district "at a regular meeting thereof" held therein on a day specified, "according to law," "entered into a certain verbal contract" with plaintiff, whereby it employed him as district superintendent for the time and for the price stipulated, is not rendered bad on demurrer by the charge that such contract was a verbal one. A board of education, by proper action at a regular meeting, may by verbal contract, legally employ a district superintendent, the statute authorizing such employment not requiring the contract to be in writing. 28 Oyc. 666, and cases cited in notes; 2 Dillon Mun. Corp. (5th Ed.) section 783.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. § 149; Dec. Dig. § 63.*]

5. ASSUMPSIT, ACTION OF (§ 19*)—PLEADING—SPECIAL COUNTS.

If a special count contains matter sufficient to entitle plaintiff to a recovery, the fact that it also contains other matter not constituting good ground of action will not render the count bad on demurrer. The good is not vitiated by the bad. This point is applicable to the item of $75.00, alleged expenses incurred by plaintiff in attending school preparatory to the execution of his contract for service. Duty v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 73 S. E. 331, decided this term, and cases cited.

Error from Circuit Court, Kanawha County.

Action by O. K. Robinson against the Board of Education of the District of Cabin Creek in the County of Kanawha. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Jones, Murphy & Ballard, for plaintiff in error. Mollohan, McClintic & Mathews, for defendant in error.

MILLER, J. The court below having in disregard of these well grounded rules sustained defendant's demurrer to the declaration and to each count thereof, and dismissed plaintiff's action, the judgment below must be reversed and the case remanded to that court to be there further proceeded with in accordance with these principles, and further according to the rules and practices governing courts of law. Judgment reversed and case remanded.

THERMAL BELT SANITORIUM CO. v. ROYAL INS. CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 23, 1911.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 450*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—FIRE INSURANCE—DESCRIPTION.

The description of the insured property was as follows: "$2,000.00—on the two-story frame metal-roof building with adjoining and communicating additions including foundations, piping and plumbing, fixed heating and lighting apparatus and all permanent fixtures as a part of such building while occupied as a sanatorium, situate detached in the town of T." Held, that the description of the property insured was sufficiently ambiguous to admit parol evidence as to whether it was meant to include certain cottages about 10 feet from the two-story building described and forming a semicircle around it, and connected thereby with an electric bell and water supply system, though a former policy had insured the main building and the cottages separately in different amounts.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1051*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSIONS OF EVIDENCE.

Since title in insured is presumed from his possession and control of the insured property and the issuance of a policy thereon, it was not reversible error in an action on the policy to permit a witness to say that plaintiff owned the property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4169; Dec. Dig. § 1051.*]

3. INSURANCE (§ 646*)—FIRE INSURANCE—OWNERSHIP OF PROPERTY—EVIDENCE.

Title in insured to the insured property is presumed prima facie from his possession and control thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1646; Dec. Dig. § 646.*]

4. INSURANCE (§ 646*)—FIRE INSURANCE—OWNERSHIP OF PROPERTY—EVIDENCE.

The issuance of a policy to insured on certain property is presumptive evidence of title in him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1646; Dec. Dig. § 646.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Polk County; Lane, Judge.

Action by the Thermal Belt Sanatorium Company against the Royal Insurance Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The evidence tended to show that plaintiff corporation held two concurrent fire insurance policies alleged to cover its main building and four cottages situate near the same, and "that on May 5, 1909, a fire occurred which destroyed one of the cottages and also damaged the main building. Defendant resisted recovery for destruction of the cottage, claiming that same was not covered by the descriptive terms of the policy. The following is the description, which it seems was typewritten, and annexed to each of the policies: "$2,000.00—on the two story frame metal-roof building, with adjoining and communicating additions, including foundations, piping and plumbing, fixed heating and lighting apparatus and all permanent fixtures as a part of said building while occupied as a sanatorium, situate detached in the town of Tryon." And in reference thereto, and over defendant's objection, this, with other evidence, was admitted, being the relevant part of a conversation between the general manager of plaintiff company and the insurance agent in reference to the acceptance of the policies and at the time same were delivered: "Q. Did you have any conversation with Mr. Engle about the policies? A. Yes. Q. What was it? (Objection by defendant. Overruled and exception). A. I read over the typewritten portion of the contract, and said: 'I don't like this adjoining and communicating. It is not right, because the buildings are not adjoining.' Mr. Engle said the insurance companies considered buildings as close together as those were adjoining and communicating when used for the same purpose. (Defendant's objection to this answer overruled, and defendant excepts.) Q. How many buildings were there in the plant? A. Five. Q. What did they consist of? (Defendant's objection overruled, and defendant excepts.) A. Consisted of a main building, or administration building, and four cottages. These cottages were used for the sick patients' rooms, and the main building for the nurses and doctors, housekeeper, dining room, kitchen, and office room. Q. Were there any kitchens in the cottages? (Defendant's objection overruled. Defendant excepts.) A. No. Q. What was in the cottages? (Defendant's objection overruled. Defendant excepts.) A. First a sun room on the outside, a hall, four bedrooms, bathroom, and trunkroom. Q. How far were they from the main building? (Defendant's objection overruled. Defendant excepts.) A. About 15 or 20 feet. Q. Was there any communication with the main building? A. An annunciator system running to the main building. (Defendant's objection overruled. Defendant excepts.) These were for the patients to summon the nurses from the nurses' rooms. There was a button in each room, with an electric wire communicating with the bell in the main building. Q. Were there any laundries in the cottages? A. No. Q. Was it possible for anybody to use the cottages independent of the main building, as a separate establishment? A. No. (To all of the foregoing evidence the defendant in apt time objected. Objection overruled, and defendant excepted.) Q. Going back to the main building, describe that. A. The main building was a two-story building, the first floor consisting of a porch running around three sides, a hall and writing room, or office, reception room, dining room, pantry, and the housekeeper's room. Q. What was the shape of this building apart from the porches? A. It was an oblong building. Q. Were there any additions to that building? A. No; there were no additions to the main building proper. It was one building, oblong in shape. Q. Do you recollect a fire occurring in your property there? A. Yes. Q. About when was that fire? A. It occurred about the 5th of May, 1909. Q. What was destroyed in that fire, if anything? A. One of the cottages and the main building and another cottage was damaged."

There was other testimony more fully describing the physical placing of the cottages and their purpose and uses in relation to the plant. On the trial a witness, E. Brownlee, having an interest in the property and its management, was allowed, over defendant's objection, to say that the property was owned by plaintiff, the Thermal Belt Sanatorium Company. In this connection it appeared that plaintiff was in possession and control and management of the property when same was insured and at the time of trial. There was verdict for plaintiff for amount of loss.

Judgment, and defendant excepted and appealed.

A. S. Barnard, for appellants. Harkins & Van Winkle, for appellee.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts as above). The descriptive words of this policy and the physical placing of the cottages and their use and purpose in connection with the plant and its operation are made to appear further as follows: "The location of the buildings is on top of the hill above the town, consisting of one administration building, which is a two-story, frame, metal-roof building, longer than wide, with nothing in the way of a lean-to nailed to the building. The rest of the sanatorium property consisted of four cottages, one-story, metal-roof, consisting of four rooms, bath and trunk room, located in a semicircle, two cottages, No. 1 and No. 4, about 20 feet from each corner of the main building, the other cottages about 20 feet distant from each other, making a half circle around the front of the main building. They have an electric bell system. There was a series of wires running from each room of each cottage to the hall of the administration building, and there was also a water supply system, extending from a tank on the upper part of the grounds to the main building, and from the main building to all the cottages, one continuous system. Also a sewerage system accommodating all four cottages, one line going from the main building to a cesspool, and a line going from each of the cottages to the main line. There was a push button in each room so that when the patients needed assistance they could ring the bell in the main building. Q. What were those cottages used for? A. Sleeping rooms for the patients. Q. Used for any other purpose? A. No. Q. Were there any kitchens, dining rooms, or laundry in these cottages? A. No. Q. How were they used in connection with the main building? (Defendant's objection overruled. Defendant excepts.) A. Used as sleeping rooms for patients. The patients used those for bedrooms, and went to the main building for meals if well enough. (Defendant's objection overruled. Defendant excepts.) And for the consultation with physicians, but, if not well enough, the meals were sent out from the main building, and, if in their bed, the doctors and nurses visited them in their rooms." On this or similar facts there is authority tending to support the position that the cottages would come within the descriptive terms of the policies as a matter of law. Massey v. Belisle, 24 N. C. 170; Marsh v. Insurance Co., 71 N. H. 253, 51 Atl. 898; Mat- thews v. Kimball, 70 Ark. 451, 66 S. W. 651, 69 S. W. 547.

[1] But in any event and this, in our opinion, is the more correct view, the words are so far ambiguous as to permit the parol testimony in aid of the description and so as to carry out the true intent and agreement of the parties. Railroad v. Railroad, 147 N. C. 382, 61 S. E. 185, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 223, 125 Am. St. Rep. 550; Ward v. Gay, 137 N. C. 400, 49 S. E. 884; Merriam v. U. S., 107 U. S. 441, 2 Sup. Ct. 536, 27 L. Ed. 531; Sargent v. Adams, 3 Gray (Mass.) 72, 63 Am. Dec. 718; Robinson v. Insurance Co., 87 Me. 399, 32 Atl. 996; Lumber Co. v. Insurance Co., 145 Mich. 558, 108 N. W. 1088. Insurance Co. v. Tye, 1 Ga. App. 380, 58 S. E. 110, an authority much relied upon by defendant, could well be distinguished from the case presented here. The decision proceeds upon the supposition that, under certain conditions, parol evidence could be received with the view and purpose of changing the conclusion reached. "When we consider the relevant facts in evidence, the position of the cottages, only twenty feet away, the physical connections between these and the main building in reference to water, light, sewerage," etc., the inseparable identity of use and with nothing to fill the descriptive words, "adjoining and communicating additions," except the cottages, there is assuredly no error to defendant's prejudice in referring the question to the jury as to whether the policy did and was intended to cover and protect the cottages. The position is not affected by the fact that a former policy had insured the main building and the cottages in separate and different amounts. This is an opposing fact, bearing on the weight of the testimony objected to, and did not affect its competency. It was this fact which called forth the protest of plaintiff's officials as to the insufficiency of the descriptions, and which was quieted by the assurances of the company's agent that the description as written would include the cottages.

[2] There was no reversible error in permitting the witness to say that plaintiff was the owner of the property.

[3, 4] This is a case where title is presumed prima facie from the possession and control of the property, and, further, the issuance of the policy to the insured was itself prima facie evidence of title—conclusive for the purposes of such an action as this unless in some way questioned or impeached. 19 Cyc. p. 941.

There is no error, and the judgment for plaintiff is affirmed.

No error.

MEANS v. McPHAIL†

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 10, 1911.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1010*)—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—FINDINGS OF FACT.

Where there is some evidence in support of the conclusions of fact in a law case, the appeal will be dismissed, because presenting only questions of fact, though exceptions raised questions of law, on the ground that there was no evidence to sustain the findings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1010.*]

On petition for rehearing. Dismissed.

For former opinion, see 71 S. E. 1009.

PER CURIAM. The court dismissed the appeal herein on the ground that the exceptions present only questions of fact in a law case, which this court had no power to review. The petition for rehearing points out that two of the exceptions raise questions of law, to wit, that there was no evidence to sustain certain findings material to plaintiffs' case. While this is true, the court did not overlook that fact, but duly considered the point made by the exceptions. Finding, however, that the record did contain some evidence in support of the conclusions of the circuit court, the court, without stating the intermediate step, announced merely the result.

There is, therefore, no ground for a rehearing, and the petition is dismissed, and the stay of remittitur revoked.

BENNETT v. CHARLESTON UNION STATION CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 8, 1912.)

1. DAMAGES (§ 91*)—PERSONAL INJURIES—PUNITIVE DAMAGES—"RECKLESS DISREGARD."

Where an engine, running at an unusually high speed in a railroad yard, struck coaches on a side track, injuring a car cleaner therein, and the engine came so fast that it knocked the coaches from a stationary position a car and a half in length, and damaged the engine and the coaches, punitive damages were authorized, within the rule permitting punitive damages where the wrongdoer acts in a "reckless disregard" of another's rights.

2. DAMAGES (§ 132*)—PERSONAL INJURIES—EXCESSIVE DAMAGES.

Where a car cleaner sustained a serious and permanent injury to her head, right hip, right shoulder, and left leg, and the jury were authorized to award punitive damages, a verdict for $1,750 would not be set aside as excessive.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Charleston County; Ernest Gary, Judge.

Action by Alice Bennett against the Charleston Union Station Company and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. Huger Fitzsimons, for appellants. Logan & Grace, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for damages, alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff, through the wrongful acts of the defendants.

The allegations of the complaint, material to the questions presented by the exceptions, are as follows: "That on or about the 10th day of May, 1910, the plaintiff above named, Alice Bennett, was in the employ of said Charleston Union Station Company, one of the defendants herein, as a car cleaner. That on or about said 10th day of May, 1910, and at or about the hour of 9 o'clock p. m., the said Alice Bennett was at work as a car cleaner, scrubbing out a car which had just come in from the city of Augusta. That while the said plaintiff was about her duties scrubbing out said car an engine and tender suddenly came down and upon said car, in which the said plaintiff was at work, struck said car with great force and violence, and threw the plaintiff to the floor of the car, causing her serious and permanent injuries to her head, right hip, right shoulder, and left leg. That the injuries to the plaintiff, as aforesaid, as she is informed and believes, were caused by the joint and concurrent negligence, carelessness, recklessness, and wantonness of said defendant corporation, their agents and servants, in the following particulars, to wit: (a) In causing and allowing an engine and tender to come down and upon the said car in which plaintiff was at work, without notice or warning to the said plaintiff. (b) By causing and allowing a switch to be wrongfully turned, so that an engine and tender could come down and upon the car in which said plaintiff was working, without notice or warning to said plaintiff of the approach of said engine and tender. (c) By failing and omitting to take any precautions, by setting out lights, or otherwise, to prevent said engine and tender from coming down and upon the car in which said plaintiff was at work." The defendants denied the allegations of negligence and recklessness.

At the close of the plaintiff's testimony, the defendants' attorney made a motion for a nonsuit, "so far as the cause of action for punitive damages is concerned, certainly so far as the Union Station is concerned, on the ground that there is a total absence of testimony to sustain the cause of action for punitive damages." The motion was refused. At the close of all the testimony, the defendants' attorney made a motion for the direction of a verdict on the same ground, which was also refused. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $1,750. A motion for a new trial was made, on the grounds "that the damages were excessive, that there was no evidence to support the verdict, and that it was contrary to the charge of the judge." This motion was likewise refused, and the defendants appealed.

[1] The first proposition argued by the appellants' attorney is that there was no testimony as to punitive damages.

H. B. Tant, as witness for the plaintiff, testified as follows: "Q. What was your position on May 10, 1910? A. I was a telegraph operator at Vardels for the Coast Line. Q. Is that the entrance for the switch that controls tracks No. 7 and No. 10? A. Yes, sir. Q. Will you tell the jury what you know about this accident? A. I was working there, controlling the switches from the tower, governing the movement of trains, and an engine came in that wanted to go to the roundhouse, and I lined up the switches for it to go, and was under the impression they were right; but I found I had left one wrong, and the engine went through it at a very high rate of speed, and hit some coaches in the side track. Q. What engine was that? A. I am not positive, but I think it was a C. & W. C. engine. Q. Was that engine running at a high rate of speed? A. Yes, sir; it was running at an unusually high rate of speed. Q. Would you say at reckless rate of speed for the yard? A. It looked that way to me. Q. When you saw this accident was unavoidable, what did you do? A. I could not do anything; I was powerless to do anything. If the engine had been running at the speed that the rules of the company require. I could have changed my switches and avoided it, but it was running at such a high rate of speed it made it dangerous for me to interfere with the switches. Q. What did you do? A. Just as soon as it struck, I went down; I thought there was terrible damage done, and went down there to see. Q. Did it make any noise when it struck? A. Made a terrible noise. Q. Was there any damage done to the engine and cars? A. Yes, sir. Q. How far did it knock this train? A. I think it knocked it pretty near the length of a coach and a half. Q. There were five or six cars? A. I think six or eight. Q. And this engine came on them so fast that it knocked them from a stationary position a car and a half? A. Yes, sir. Q. Was the engine smashed? A. Pretty badly. Q. And so were the cars? A. Yes, sir."

In the case of Tolleson v. Railway, 88 S. C. 7, 70 S. E. 311, the principle was announced that, "not only is the conscious invasion of the rights of another, in a wanton, willful, and reckless manner, an act of wrong, but that the same result follows when the wrongdoer does not actually realize that he is invading the rights of another, provided the act is committed in such a manner that a person of ordinary prudence would say that it was a reckless disregard of another's rights."

The exceptions raising this question are overruled.

[2] The appellants' second proposition is that there was no testimony to support the verdict, at least the verdict was so grossly excessive as to show plainly it was not founded on testimony. There was testimony tending to show that the plaintiff sustained the injuries alleged in the complaint, and, as it has been determined that there was testimony tending to show recklessness on the part of the defendants, we see no reason for disturbing the verdict on the ground of caprice or passion on the part of the jury. Judgment affirmed.

JONES, C. J., and WOODS, J., concur. HYDRICK, J., did not sit in this case.

MONROE v. MARTIN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 15, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 134*)—CONTRACTS (§ 76*)—CONSIDERATION.

A written agreement, made by the payee of a promissory note with the maker thereof, evidencing a part of the contract between them, stipulating that the maker is never to be sued on the note, relieves the maker from all liability upon the note; and a subsequent voluntary promise of the maker to pay the note, made without consideration, to the executor of the payee, is a nudum pactum, and not enforceable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. §§ 325-329½; Dec. Dig. § 134; Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 357-381; Dec. Dig. § 76.*]

2. EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF (§ 12*)—REVIEW—BRIEF OF EVIDENCE.

Where a bill of exceptions is sued out to the overruling of a motion for new trial, only the evidence as contained in the approved brief of the evidence can be brought to this court, and a new and distinct compendium of the evidence cannot be legally incorporated in the bill of exceptions. Whether the brief of evidence, which was approved and filed as part of the motion for new trial and duly certified to this court, was in strict conformity with the rule upon the subject of preparation of briefs of evidence, is unnecessary to be decided, as a consideration of the evidence is not necessary for the consideration of the point of law ruled in the previous headnote.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Exceptions, Bill of, Cent. Dig. § 13; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

Error from Superior Court, Calhoun County; Frank Park, Judge.

Action by R. B. Martin, executor, against L. D. Mouroe. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

J. L. Boynton and Calhoun & Rambo, for plaintiff in error. W. D. Sheffield and J. R. Pottle, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. The nature of this action and the pleadings are amply stated in the opinion of the court rendered when the case was formerly before this court. Martin v. Monroe, 107 Ga. 330, 33 S. E. 62. The suit was on a promissory note, brought by the executor of the payee against the maker, who pleaded a contemporaneous written agreement between himself and the payee, containing a covenant never to sue the note. This court held, on the occasion referred to, that "a written agreement made by the payee of a promissory note with the maker thereof, contemporaneously with the execution and delivery of the note to the former, and evidencing a part of the contract then entered into between the parties, stipulating that the maker 'is not to be sued on said note, and it is entirely discretionary with him whether he ever pays said note or not,' in effect relieves the maker from all liability upon the note as to the payee thereof or his legal representative."

[1] 1. On a later trial the plaintiff amended his petition by alleging that on three stated occasions the defendant "recognized the validity of said note and promised your petitioner to pay the same to him." With respect to such amendment the court charged the jury: "If the jury believe from a preponderance of the evidence that J. J. Monroe did agree, in an instrument signed at the same time the note sued on was signed, that L. D. Monroe should never be sued on said note, still if, after the death of J. J. Monroe, the defendant L. D. Monroe did expressly agree to pay said note to the executor of J. J. Monroe, the moral obligation resting on the defendant to pay the debt would be sufficient to sustain the new contract and promise to pay said note, and the defendant would be liable to pay said note, notwithstanding the previous contemporaneous agreement referred to before." This instruction was erroneous. The effect of the instrument pleaded by the defendant was to relieve him of all liability on the note; and if this instrument evidenced a part of the contract by which the note was given, then there never existed any liability by virtue of the note. Every contract must rest upon a good or a valuable consideration. "A good consideration is such as is founded on natural duty and affection or on a stronger moral obligation." Civil Code 1910, § 4243. In Davis v. Morgan, 117 Ga. 507, 43 S. E. 733 (61 L. R. A. 148, 97 Am. St. Rep. 171), it was held that the strong moral obligation referred to in the Code section is one supported either by some antecedent legal obligation, though unenforceable at the time, or by some present equitable duty. A promise to pay a debt barred by the statute of limitations or discharged by bankruptcy are instances of an unenforceable antecedent obligation; and the Code declares, with respect to such promises, that the "new promise revives or extends the original liability; it does not create a new one." Civil Code 1910, § 4386. As was said by Cobb, J., in Davis v. Morgan, supra: "When one receives a naked promise, and such promise is broken, he is no worse off than he was. He gave nothing for it, he has lost nothing by it, and on its breach he has suffered no damages cognizable by the court. No benefit accrued to him who made the promise, nor did any injury flow to him who received it. Such promises are not made within the scope of transactions intended to confer rights enforceable at law." The court's instruction was that the facts set up in the defendant's plea would be availed by his voluntary promise to pay the note, although the only consideration of the alleged new promise was the strong moral obligation to pay the note. If the defendant's plea be true, there never was any obligation on the part of the maker to pay the note, and the court's instruction was harmful.

[2] 2. A motion for a new trial was made, and an approved brief of evidence was filed. In the bill of exceptions the brief of evidence was greatly condensed. Counsel moved to disregard the evidence as contained in the bill of exceptions, because it had no legal place therein. We agree with counsel that, where a motion for new trial is made, a brief of the evidence in the case is an indispensable part of the motion, and such brief, when approved and filed, becomes a part of the record; and in reviewing the rulings made on the trial, as complained of in the motion, the reviewing court cannot look to any other source as to what evidence was adduced on the trial. The brief of evidence as approved was duly certified to this court, and counsel moved to disregard it also, because it was not made up as required by the statute; it containing the stenographic report of the trial of the case. This court has frequently pointed out the necessity of a compliance with the act of the General Assembly in the preparation of briefs of evidence. Only relevant and material evidence should be included, and repetitions should be avoided. But we do not find it necessary to examine the brief of evidence in ruling upon the controlling points in this case. Where points of law are made in the record, and they can be passed on without reference to the evidence, this court will decide them. The instruction, which we hold to be erroneous, does not require a consideration of the evidence to demonstrate the necessity of another trial.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

HARDMAN v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 12, 1911.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Counsel for the plaintiff in error says in his brief filed in this court that the only point insisted on for a reversal of the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial is that the verdict is without evidence to support it. After a careful study of the evidence, we are of the opinion that it was sufficient to support the verdict.

HARRIS et al. v. HUSON ICE & MACHINE WORKS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 13, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. SALES (§ 355)—REMEDIES OF SELLER—ACTION FOR PRICE—EVIDENCE.

Where A. sold to B. "one Columbus Iron Works ice plant, complete, secondhand, with a guaranteed capacity of six tons of ice per day of 24 hours, said ice machinery being now located on cars at Ocilla, Ga.," and the purchaser defended an action on notes given for the purchase money upon the ground, inter alia, that the machinery delivered was not a Columbus Iron Works plant, but consisted of various parts of machinery of other manufacturers assembled together, it was competent for the plaintiff to prove that, though some of the minor parts of the machinery were not manufactured by the Columbus Iron Works, yet the substituted parts correlated with the whole, and were not of such character as to alter the distinctive character of the machinery as a "Columbus Iron Works plant," and were equal in efficiency in all respects to the parts for which they were substituted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Dec. Dig. § 355.*]

2. CONTENTION OF PARTIES FAIRLY SUBMITTED—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE.

The contentions of the defendants, as made by the pleadings and evidence, were fairly submitted, the charge was adjusted to the case, and the evidence is sufficient to support the verdict.

Error from Superior Court, Irwin County; U. P. Whipple, Judge.

Action by the Huson Ice & Machine Works against W. M. Harris and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Eason & Bull and R. M. Bryson, for plaintiffs in error. H. J. Quincey and Fulwood & Murray, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. The plaintiff sold to the defendants a secondhand ice plant, which was to be delivered to them f. o. b. Abbeville, Ala. The machinery was shipped by the plaintiff to the defendants at Ocilla, Ga., in accordance with the contract of sale. When it arrived in Ocilla a dispute arose between the defendants and the railroad company over the freight charges, and the machinery was allowed to remain on the cars for several months and until after the first payment under the contract of sale fell due. The plaintiff then entered into a second agreement with the defendants, which was reduced to writing, wherein the first contract of sale was abrogated, and the plaintiff contracted to sell to the defendants "one Columbus Iron Works ice plant, complete, secondhand, with a guaranteed capacity of six tons of ice per day of 24 hours, said ice machinery being now located on cars at Ocilla, Ga.," and the defendants contracted to pay $3,000, evidenced by three promissory notes, and also agreed to pay $120.50 in consideration of being relieved of liability on their former contract, which last-named sum was also evidenced by their note. The defendants having defaulted in the payment of their several notes, suit was instituted thereon, and they pleaded that the plaintiff agreed to superintend the construction of the ice plant, and to demonstrate that its capacity to make ice came up to the warranty; that the machinery was installed under the superintendence of the plaintiff, and after several tests it was found incapable of making six tons of ice per day; that several important parts of the machinery were never supplied; that in the course of the installation they discovered that the machinery was not a Columbus Iron Works plant, but was made up of several parts of machinery of different manufacturers to such an extent that the aggregate plant did not possess the distinctive character of a Columbus Iron Works plant; that upon discovering that the machinery was not a Columbus Iron Works plant, and upon the failure of the plaintiff to demonstrate the guaranteed capacity of the ice plant, they tendered it back to the plaintiff and demanded a rescission of the contract; that upon the refusal of the plaintiff to rescind the contract and take back the machinery they operated it at a loss, and were never able to produce ice in excess of four tons per day; that they had sustained damage connected with the purchase and operation of the machinery in sundry amounts; and judgment against the plaintiff for these sums was prayed.

[1] 1. The evidence was conflicting as to whether or not there had been an acceptance of the machinery by the plaintiff, as to whether there was a failure of the warranty as to the capacity of the machinery, and as to whether the machinery was of the character described in the contract of sale. Upon the latter feature the plaintiff offered proof tending to show that the main machinery was that manufactured by the Columbus Iron Works, and that, though certain minor parts were manufactured by other manufacturers, these parts were equal in every respect in quality and adaptability to those for which they were substituted, and that the plant which they delivered was a Columbus Iron Works plant. Objection was made to testimony tending to show that there was no difference in efficiency between a certain part of the machinery which had been supplied and the part which it substituted; the objection being that the written contract of sale described the subject-matter of the sale as a Columbus Iron Works plant, and this testimony tended to vary the terms of the written contract. Specific goods may be sold by description, and if the specific existing chattel is sold by description, and does not correspond with that description, the seller fails to comply, not with a warranty or collateral agreement, but with the contract itself, by breach of a condition precedent. And the question is whether the descriptive statement is an identification of the chattel or whether it amounts to a collateral warranty. Benjamin on Sales, §15.

The subject-matter of this sale was a secondhand ice plant on the cars at a place where the purchaser had ordered it under a previous contract. The purchasers contracted to buy that particular machinery, and the description that it was of a particular manufacture was probably intended more as a collateral warranty of the character of the chattel than for purposes of identification. If the specific name of the ice plant be treated as matter of description, then it becomes a question of identifying the article as that described, and parol adminicular proof is admissible for that purpose. This inquiry is broad enough to include an investigation as to what constitutes the article as described. In the sale of secondhand machinery of a particular manufacture, it is competent to show that a minor part is an adequate substitute for the original, and that, notwithstanding such substitution, the machinery still preserves the distinctive characteristic of its original manufacture. If a secondhand Baldwin locomotive is sold, a delivery of a Baldwin locomotive would satisfy the description, although it may be equipped with a bell or whistle of a different manufacture. If we treat the words "Columbus Iron Works plant" as words of collateral warranty, then it is competent to inquire whether the substituted parts were of such character as to change the distinctive character of the chattel, so as to amount to a breach of the warranty. The English case of Weller v. Schilizzi, 25 L. J. O. P. 89, is clear authority on this point. There A. undertook to supply B. with certain parcels of linseed, which he warranted should be "Calcutta linseed," and supplied him with linseed containing 15 per cent. of other seeds. It was proved that Calcutta linseed, at the time the contract was made, contained usually from 2 to 3 per cent. of other seeds, and it was held that it was proper to inquire whether the mixture of 15 per cent. of other seeds was such an adulteration or admixture of foreign substances as to alter the distinctive character of the article and prevent its being salable as "Calcutta linseed." The testimony to which objection was made was clearly relevant.

[2] 2. Several assignments of error complain that the court failed to properly submit the various contentions of the defendants, and that the evidence did not authorize an instruction on the legal effect of an acceptance of the machinery. We do not think these criticisms are meritorious. The charge was fair, full, and adjusted to the various issues made by the pleadings and evidence, and has the indorsement of the trial judge, and no sufficient reason is made to vacate it.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

MADISON SUPPLY & HARDWARE CO. v. BROWN CARRIAGE CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 13, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

SALES (§ 176*)—PERFORMANCE OF CONTRACT—WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS.

A promissory note was given for certain personal property, which was paid voluntarily by the maker thereof (it not appearing that the note had been transferred before maturity), who subsequently purchased personal property from the same vendor, for the avowed purpose of refusing to pay therefor, and of pleading a set-off and partial failure of consideration to the first purchase, because of alleged defects in the property first purchased, which were known to the buyer at the time he paid the note given for the purchase price thereof. Held, that the buyer waived any defects in the property first purchased, and could not set up same as a defense in an action on open account brought by the seller against him for the recovery of the purchase price of the personalty last bought. Edison General Electric Co. v. Blount, 96 Ga. 272, 23 S. E. 806; Atlanta, etc., Bottling Co. v. Hutchinson, 109 Ga. 550, 35 S. E. 124; Tuttle v. Stovall, 134 Ga. 331, 67 S. E. 806.

(a) In addition to the general grounds, the only assignments of error relate to the giving or failure to give certain charges to the jury. We find no error in these assignments; and, besides, in this case the verdict in favor of the defendant in error was demanded.

LUKE et al. v. HILL.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 12, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 632*)—CONCLUSIVENESS—PERSONS CONCLUDED—STRANGERS.

A decree in a suit for annulment of marriage, based on the nonage of one of the parties, in so far as it establishes the status or marital relation, is to be regarded as a judgment quasi in rem; but, beyond the adjudication of the status, the decree is binding only on parties and privies. In a cause of action between the defendant in the annulment suit and strangers, arising before the decree of annulment, and based on the legality of his marriage, he is not estopped from contesting with them the truth of the ground on which the decree was prayed.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1058*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

The rejection of a certain part of a witness' testimony will not require a new trial, where it appears from the brief of evidence that in another part of his testimony the same witness delivered substantially the same testimony.

4. TRIAL (§ 296*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION AS A WHOLE.

In a suit for malicious prosecution, where the defendants offer testimony that they acted under advice of counsel, it is not error for the court to charge, in the language of Civil Code 1910, § 4958, that clients are not relieved from liability for damages on the ground that they acted under the advice of counsel, but are entitled to redress from them for unskillful advice; the court further charging that advice of counsel may be considered in mitigation of damages.

5. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 64*)—PROBABLE CAUSE—EVIDENCE.

The committal of a defendant by a magistrate is prima facie, but not conclusive, evidence of probable cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. §§ 151-153; Dec. Dig. § 64.*]

6. TRIAL (§ 236*)—INSTRUCTIONS—IMPEACHMENT OF WITNESS.

Where a witness is sought to be impeached because of a previous contradictory statement, the primary question for the jury is to ascertain whether the witness attacked made the alleged contradictory statement; and, if he did so, the next question is its effect on his testimony. The excerpt from the charge was not subject to the criticism made upon it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 236.*]

7. INSTRUCTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The other charges complained of were not subject to the exceptions made against them. The evidence supported the verdict, and no sufficient reason appears for the grant of a new trial.
